The Emperor receiving these proposals, communicated them to the Elector of Saxony and the Duke of Bavaria, who returned both the same answer, as if they had given each other the word, namely, they advised him to omit nothing to restore Peace to Germany: loose expressions without any meaning, but which however gave occasion to believe they were inclined to Peace. After this the Emperor writ a Letter to the Infanta, which was imparted to Digby, telling her, that at her request, and out of his great regard for the King of England, who had shown so much prudence, sincerity, and moderation, he was resolved to treat of a Truce, on the conditions proposed by the English Ambassador himself. Adding, that during the Truce, conferences might be held, to try to come to a Peace. Thus James was obliged either to sit still and expect the event of these conferences, or to break with the Emperor and Spain, when the Peace seem'd to be upon the point of conclusion, to which it was well known he would not easily be determined.

Some time after, the Emperor, whether to gain time, or, to be freed from Digby's importunities, told him, he intended to grant a Truce for the Palatinate, if the Duke of Bavaria would consent to it. Nay, he advised him to go and negotiate the Truce with the Duke. Digby leaving Vienna the 11th of September, came into the Upper-Palatinate, where the Duke of Bavaria then was, at the time Mansfeldt was concluding the forementioned Truce with Tilly. When Digby talked of a Truce, the Duke told him, There was no need to labour for a Truce, for the Wars were at an end, in that Mansfeldt; nor did he doubt of keeping both Palatinates in Peace, till the Emperor and Palgrave were agreed. The Emperor hearing by Digby this answer, writ him word, that the face of affairs being altered in the Upper-Palatinate, by Mansfeldt's fault, who had entered that Country with his Troops, the Duke of Bavaria was under a necessity of raising an Army to drive him thence, and it was not reasonable he should be at that charge to no purpose. Then it was that Digby, having informed the King of the state of affairs in Germany, brought the Lower-Palatinate, where his coming saved Frankendal. After that, he borrowed, upon his own credit, ten thousand pounds Sterling, to pay the English Troops, who had for a long time received nothing.

The King being informed, by his Ambassador's Letter, of the Duke of Bavaria's answer, wrote to the Emperor, to complain of the invasion of the Palatinate, and to tell him, in what manner he conceived, the Elector Palatine was to give him satisfaction, in order to fix the sense of the world. 1. That he should renounce the Crown of Bohemia. 2. That as Prince of the Empire he should submit to his Imperial Majesty. 3. That he should ask pardon on his knees. 4. That for the future, he should remain quiet, and raise no disturbance in the Empire. 5. That he should be reconciled to all the Princes. 6. That if this was not sufficient, he would undertake to procure what other terms should be deemed reasonable. Lastly, He told him, that if he could not obtain his Son-in-law's pardon by fair means, he was resolved to have recourse to arms. The Emperor, without being frightened at this menace, still continued to amuse him, and the better to persuade him he was inclined to Peace, he dispatched Count Schwartzzenberg to settle with him the conditions of a Truce. The Count was very magnificently received at London. But before I speak of the success of his Embassy, I must relate what passed in England till the end of the year.

The King had farther adjourned the two Houses from the 14th of November to the 8th of February 1622. But Digby's return occasioned his ordering them to meet the 20th of November. As he was a little indisposed, he commanded the Lord Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, and the Lord Digby, to acquaint the Parliament with his intentions. The Lord Keeper said, that since the last adjournment the King had taken great care of the nation, reforming by his Proclamations thirty-seven several grievances complained of by the People, without demanding any thing in return for these Favours, as was usual in former times. That he had reassembled the Parliament, upon the declaration of the Commons to assist him powerfully in the recovery of the Palatinate. That he had used his endeavours to procure a good Peace, but with little success, as the Lord Digby would inform them. Then, he put them in mind, that the King had advanced forty thousand pounds to keep together an army in the Lower-Palatinate: But, continued he, unless the Parliament take further Resolution, and imitate rather ancient than modern Principles, and be more expeditious in what they do, his Majesty's endeavours will fall to the ground. He concluded with saying, the King had resolved to continue the Session till seven or eight days before Christmas, and renew it the 8th of February.

The Lord Digby, speaking next, gave a brief account Digby's of his Embassy to Vienna, and said, he plainly discovered, it was the Emperor's intent to give the Upper Palatinate to the Duke of Bavaria. Adding, that a good sum of Money was absolutely necessary, both to keep Count Mansfeldt's army together, and to send a strong supply of English Troops to the Palatinate.

The Lord-Treasurer said, the King's coffers were empty, his Treasury being exhausted by the sums employed in the defence of the Palatinate. Nevertheless, though the King declared for War, he was resolved to conclude the Spanish Marriage, hoping by that means to break the breach.

'Tis certain, the King had no design to go to War, since it could be only with the Spaniards, whom he considered as his best friend, and with whom he was going to 1621. be allied by his Son's marriage with the Infanta. But he made as if he intended to take arms, in case he was obliged to it. To that end, it was necessary, in his opinion, to prepare betimes, and begin with sending money to Mansfeldt, to pay his Troops and continue the war in the Palatinate, till the success of the Negotiations at Vienna and Madrid should be known. The King would therefore have it supposed, as a thing certain, that in case these Negotiations were fruitless, he was bent to begin the War, and vigorously support it. Consequently, he demanded money to enable him to make the necessary preparations, and, in a word, required, that the affair should be left entirely to his management. Indeed, Parliaments are wont to act thus, when they think the King is undertaking a just and necessary War. So James proceeded upon the usual custom and method of the Parliament. There was only one objection to be made, on which however no man durst speak his mind freely, namely, that the conduct of former Parliaments was grounded upon their good opinion of their Kings, and their confidence in them. But the Commons had no such confidence in James I. He demanded money for a War, to which they were persuaded, he had no inclination. And therefore they could not help fearing, that the money which should be granted him, would be employed otherways than in a War with Spain. On the other hand, the Commons were taken in their own nets. To show that the delay of a War, deemed necessary by all the world, did not proceed from them, they had promised to put the King in condition to begin and pursue it vigorously. But when this promise came to be performed, their little confidence in the King, made them very reserved. It was necessary however to satisfy the publick, and show, they meant to keep their promise, provided they could be certain, it would be for the advantage of the State. To this end, they resolved to make a Remonstrance to the King, and represent to him what they thought requisite in the present juncture. Not that they expected the King would grant their requests, but to leave him without excuse, in case he refused them, which was scarce to be doubted. Such were the effects, the distrust between the King and Parliament began to produce. Instead of using their joint endeavours for the publick good, each strove to take advantage of the other. For the better understanding the events of this Reign, which were the origin and spring of the troubles in the next, it will not be improper to insert the whole Remonstrance, notwithstanding its length.

p. 58.

WE your Majesty's most humble and loyal Subjects, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeesses, now assembled in Parliament, who represent the Commons of your Realm, full of hearty sorrow, to be deprived of the comfort of your Royal presence, or the rather, for that it proceeds from the want of your health, wherein we all unfeignedly do suffer; in all humble manner, calling to mind your gracious answer to our former petition concerning Religion, which, notwithstanding your Majesty's pious and princely intentions, hath not produced that good effect, which the danger of these times doth seem to us to require: and finding how ill your Majesty's goodness hath been requited by Princes of different Religion, who, even in time of Treaty, have taken opportunity to advance their own ends, tending to the subversion of Religion, and disadvantage of your affairs, and the estate of your Children; by reason whereof, your ill-afflicted Subjects at home, the Popish Recusants, have taken too much encouragement, and are dangerously increased in their number, and in their infolencies. We cannot but be sensible thereof, and therefore humbly represent what we conceive to be the causes of so great and growing mischiefs, and what be the remedies.

" I. The vigilancy and ambition of the Pope of Rome, and his dearest Son, the one aiming at as large a temporal Monarchy, as the other at a spiritual Supremacy.

" II. The devilish positions and doctrines, whereon Popery is built, and taught with Authority to their Followers, for advancement of their temporal ends.

" III. The distressed and miserable estate of the Professors of true Religion in foreign parts.

" IV. The disastrous accidents to your Majesty's Children abroad, expressed with rejoicing, and even with contempt of their persons.

" V. The strange confederacy of the Princes of the popish Religion, aiming mainly at the advancement of theirs, and subverting of ours, and taking the advantages conducing to that end upon all occasions.

" VI. The great and many Armies raised, and maintained at the charge of the King of Spain, the chief of that League.

" VII. The expectation of the popish Recusants of the match with Spain, and feeding themselves with great hopes of the consequences thereof.

" VIII. The interposing of foreign Princes, and their Agents, in the behalf of popish Recusants, for continuance and favour unto them.

" IX. The open and usual resort to the Houses, and which is worse, to the Chapels of foreign Ambassadors.

" X. Their more than usual concourse to the City, and their frequent conventicles and conferences there.

" XI. The education of their Children in many several Seminaries and Houses of their Religion in foreign parts, appropriated to the English Fugitives.

" XII. The grants of their just forfeitures intended by your Majesty, as a reward of service to the Grantees; but, beyond your Majesty's intention, transferred or compounded for, at such mean rates, as will amount to less than a toleration.

" XIII. The licentious printing and dispersing of popish and seditious Books, even in the time of Parliaments.

" XIV. The swarms of Priests and Jesuits, the common incendiaries of all Christendom, dispersed in all parts of your Kingdom.

" And from these causes, as bitter roots, we humbly offer to your Majesty, that we foresee and fear there will necessarily follow very dangerous effects both to Church and State. For,

" I. The popish Religion is incompatible with ours in respect of their positions.

" II. It draweth with it an inviolable dependency on foreign Princes.

" III. It openeth too wide a gap for popularity, to any who shall draw too great a party.

" IV. It hath a restless Spirit, and will strive by these gradations; if it once get but a connivance, it will press for a Toleration; if that should be obtained, they must have an equality; from thence they will aspire to Superiority, and will never rest till they get a subversion of the true Religion.

" The remedies against these growing Evils, which, in all humility we offer unto your most excellent Majesty, are these,

" I. That seeing this inevitable necessity is fallen upon your Majesty, which no wisdom or Providence of a peaceful and pious King can avoid, your Majesty would not omit this just occasion, speedily and effectually to take your sword into your hand.

" II. That once undertaken upon so honorable and just grounds, your Majesty would resolve to pursue, and more publicly avow the aiding of those of our Religion in foreign Parts, which, doubtless, would reunite the Princes and States of the Union, by these disalters disheartened and disbanded.

" III. That your Majesty would propose to your self to manage this war with the best advantage, by a diversion or otherwise, as in your deep Judgment shall be found fittest, and not to rest upon a war in these Parts only, which will consume your Treasure, and discourage your people.

" IV. That the bent of this war, and point of your sword, may be against that Prince, (whatsoever opinion of potency he hath) whose Armies and Treasures, have first diverted, and since maintained the war in the Palatinate.

" V. That for securing of our Peace at home, your Majesty would be pleased to review the parts of our petition, formerly delivered unto your Majesty, and hereunto annexed, and to put in execution, by the care of choice Commissioners to be thereunto especially appointed, the Laws already, and hereafter to be made, for preventing of dangers by popish Recusants, and their wonted evasions.

" VI. That to frustrate their hopes for a future age, our most noble Prince may be timely and happily married to one of our own Religion.

" VII. That the Children of the Nobility and Gentry of this Kingdom, and of others ill-affected and suspected in their Religion now beyond the Seas, may be forthwith called home by your means, and at the charge of their parents or governors.

" VIII. That the Children of popish Recusants, or such whose wives are popish Recusants, be brought up, during their minority, with Protestant School-masters and Teachers, who may sow, in their tender years, the seeds of true Religion.

" IX. That your Majesty will be pleased speedily to revoke:

revoke all former Licences for such Children and Youth to travel beyond the Seas, and not grant any such Licence hereafter.

"X. That your Majesty's learned Council may receive commandment from your Highness, carefully to look into former grants of Recufants lands, and to avoid them, if by Law they can; and that your Majesty will stay your hand from passing any such grants hereafter.

"This is the sum and effect of our humble Declaration, which we (no ways intending to press upon your Majesty's undoubted and regal Prerogative) do, with the fulness of our duty and obedience, humbly submit to your most princely consideration: The glory of God, whose cause it is; the zeal of our true Religion, in which we have been born, and wherein (by God's grace) we are resolved to die; the safety of your Majesty's person, who is the very life of your People; the happiness of your children and posterity; the honour and good of the Church and State, dearer unto us than our own lives, having kindled these affections, truly devoted to your Majesty.

"And seeing, out of our duty to your Majesty, we have already resolved to give, at the end of this Session, one entire Subsidy, for the present relief of the Palatinate only, to be paid in the end of February next, which cannot well be effected, but by passing a Bill in a parliamentary course before Christmas; we most humbly beseech your Majesty, (as our assured hope is) that you will then also vouchsafe to give life by your royal assent, to such Bills, as before that time shall be prepared for your Majesty's honour, and the general good of your people: And that such Bills may be also accompanied (as hath been accustomed) with your Majesty's gracious pardon, which proceeding from your own mere grace, may, by your Highness's direction, be drawn to that latitude and extent, as may best sort with your Majesty's bounty and goodness. And that not only felons and criminal offenders may take benefit thereof, but that your good subjects may receive ease thereby. And if it shall stand with your good pleasure, that it may extend to the relief of the old debts and duties to the Crown, before the first year of your Majesty's Reign, to the discharge of Alienations without licence, and misusing of Liveries, and Oustre le Main, before the first summons of this Parliament, and of concealed wardships, and not suing of liveries, and Oustre le Main, before the twelfth year of your Majesty's Reign: Which gracious favour would much comfort your good subjects, and ease them from vexation, with little loss or prejudice to your own profit.

"And we by our daily and devout prayers to the Almighty, the great King of Kings, shall contend for a blessing upon our endeavours; and for your Majesty's long and happy Reign over us; and for your children's children after you, for many and many generations."

The King had taken great care, at the opening of this Parliament, to mark out the bounds which the Commons were not to exceed. Above all things, he intimated to them, that they ought not to give him advice without being asked. They neglected this charge very much in their Remonstrance, and plainly showed, they did not believe it belonged to the King to determine, how far the duty of the Parliament should extend. The King's principles were so different from those of the Commons, that it is no wonder their inferences were directly contrary. The King did not expect, the Commons should advise him; and the Commons pretended, it was their indispensable duty to represent to him the dangers of the Church or State, with the properest remedies. The King rested upon the Prerogative Royal, but the Commons did not agree to the extent, he gave this Prerogative, by virtue whereof he pretended to hinder them from taking care of the Church and State when they were in danger, or their concerns neglected. It is very difficult, not to say impossible, to mark out the bounds of the Royal Prerogative, as well as of the privilege and duty of the Nation's Representatives, in all cases which may occur. So, without undertaking to decide this point, I shall only say, the Commons distrust made them take an extraordinary course, which doubtless they would not have followed, had they been to deal with a Prince more esteemed. On the other hand, it cannot be denied, the King gave great occasions of suspicion and jealousy, in affecting to establish his Prerogative upon general principles, which will never be received in England, without the proper restrictions to the nature of the English Constitution.

But the attempt upon the Royal Prerogative was not the only thing that offended the King. The Remonstrance contained, what could not but be very disagreeable to him, since, in obscure terms, he was taxed with neglecting the welfare of Religion and the Nation; with tolerating Recufants; with having no design to engage in a war for the recovery of the Palatinate, though he desired money for that purpose; with granting Licences prejudicial to the Kingdom; and lastly, with having little or no concern for the interest of Religion, in marrying the Prince his Son with a Spanish Princess. The Commons not daring to speak their thoughts freely on this occasion, were contented with giving intimations. The King perceived it, but forbore, in his own vindication, to enter into particulars, which would not have been for his advantage. It was much more agreeable to his interest and dignity, to hinder so ungrateful a Remonstrance from being presented to him. And that was the course he took. As soon as he heard the Remonstrance was ready, he sent the following letter to the Speaker.

To our Trusty and Well-beloved Sir Thomas Richardson, Knight, Speaker of the House of COMMONS.

Mr. Speaker,

"WE have heard by divers reports, that you have called by our message to the Houses of Parliament, some fiery and popular spirits of some of the House of Commons, to argue and debate publicly of the matters far above their reach and capacity, tending to our High dishonour, and breach of Prerogative Royal. These are therefore to command you, to make known, in our name, unto the House, That none therein shall presume henceforth to meddle with any thing concerning our Government, or deep matters of State; and namely, not to deal with our dearest Son's match with the Daughter of Spain, nor to touch the honour of that King, or any other our friends and confederates; and also not to meddle with any man's particulars, which have their due motion in our ordinary Courts of Justice. And whereas, we hear they have sent a message to Sir Edward Sandys, to know the reasons of his late restraint, you shall in our name resolve them, That it was not for any misdemeanor of his in Parliament; but to put them out of doubt of any question of that nature that may arise among them hereafter, you shall resolve them in our name, that we think our self very free and able to punish any man's misdemeanors in Parliament, as well during their sitting, as after: which we mean not to spare hereafter, upon any occasion of any man's insolent behaviour there that shall be misfitted unto us: And if they have already touched any of these points, which we have forbidden, in any Petition of theirs, which is to be sent unto us, it is our pleasure that you shall tell them, That except they reform it before it come to our hands, we will not deign the hearing, nor answering of it."

Dated at New-Market, Dec. 3. 1621.

This Letter being read and examined in the House, the Commons did not think proper to keep silence, but to tell the King see, his threats should not deter them from doing their duty, as they pretended. They drew therefore a Petition, which was presented to the King with the foregoing Remonstrance. The Petition ran thus:

Most Dread and Gracious Sovereign.

"WE your most humble Knights, Citizens, and Burghesses assembled in the Commons House of Parliament, full of grief and unspeakable sorrow, through the true sense of your Majesty's displeasure, expressed by your Letter lately sent to our Speaker, and by him related and read unto us: Yet comforted again with the assurance of your grace and goodness, and of the sincerity of our own intentions and proceedings, whereon with confidence we can rely, in all humbleness beseech your most excellent Majesty, that the loyalty and dutifulness of as faithful and loving Subjects as ever served, or lived under a gracious Sovereign, may not undeservedly suffer by the mis-information of partial and uncertain reports, which are ever unfaithful intelligencers: But that your Majesty would, in the clearness of your own judgment, first vouchsafe to understand from our selves, and not from others, what our humble Declaration and Petition (resolved upon by the universal voice of the House, and proposed with your gracious favour to be presented unto your sacred Majesty) doth contain. Upon what occasion we entered into consideration of those things which are therein contained, with what dutiful respect to your Majesty, and your service, we did consider thereof, and what was our true intention thereby. And that when 1621. " your Majesty shall thereby truly discern our dutiful affections, you will, in your royal judgment, free us from those heavy charges, wherewith some of our Members are burthened, and wherein the whole house is involved.

" And we humbly beseech your Majesty, that you would not hereafter give credit to private reports, against all or any of the Members of our house, whom the whole have not censured, until your Majesty have been truly informed thereof from our selves: And that in the mean time, and ever, we may stand upright in your Majesty's grace and good opinion, than which no worldly consideration is or can be dearer unto us.

" When your Majesty had reassembled us in Parliament by your royal commandment, sooner than we expected, and did vouchsafe, by the mouths of three honourable Lords, to impart unto us the weighty occasions moving your Majesty thereunto, and from them we did understand these particulars,

" That notwithstanding your princely and pious endeavours to procure peace, the time is now come, that Janus's Temple must be opened.

" That the voice of Bellona must be heard, and not the voice of a turtle.

" That there was no hope of peace, nor any truce to be obtained, no not for a few days.

" That your Majesty must either abandon your own Children, or engage yourself in a war, wherein consideration is to be had, what foot, what horse, what money will be sufficient.

" That the Lower Palatinate was seized upon by the army of the King of Spain as executor of the Ban there in quality of Duke of Burgundy, as the Upper Palatinate was by the Duke of Bavaria.

" That the King of Spain, at his own charge, had now at least five armies on foot.

" That the Princes of the union were disbanded, but the Catholick League remained firm, whereby those Princes so disaffected, were in danger, one by one, to be ruined.

" That the estate of those of the Religion in foreign parts was miserable; and that out of these considerations we were called to a war, and forthwith to advise for a supply of keeping the forces in the Palatinate from disbanning, and to foresee the means for raising and maintaining the body of an army, for the war against the Spring. We therefore, out of our zeal to your Majesty and your posterity, with more alacrity and celerity than ever was precedent in Parliament, did address our selves to the service commended unto us. And although we cannot conceive that the honour and safety of your Majesty and your posterity, the patrimony of your Children invaded, and possessed by their enemies, the welfare of Religion and state of your Kingdoms, are matters at any time unfit for the deepest consideration, in time of Parliament: And although before this time we were in some of these points silent, and yet being now invited thereunto, and led on by so just an occasion, we thought it our duties to provide for the present supply thereof, and not only to turn our eyes on a war abroad, but to take care for the securing of our Peace at home, which the dangerous increase and insolency of Popish Recusants, apparently, visibly, and sensibly did lead us unto. The consideration whereof did necessarily draw us truly to represent unto your Majesty, what we conceive to be the causes, what we feared would be the effects, and what we hoped might be the remedies of these growing evils; among which, as incident and unavoidable, we fell upon some things which seem to touch upon the King of Spain, as they have relation to Popish Recusants at home, to the wars by him maintained in the Palatinate against your Majesty's Children, and to his several armies now on foot; yet, as we conceived, without touch of dishonour to that King, or any other Prince your Majesty's confederate.

" In the discourse whereof, we did not assume to our selves any power, to determine of any part thereof, nor intend to encroach or intrude upon the sacred bounds of your royal authority, to whom, and to whom only we acknowledge it doth belong to resolve of Peace and War, and of the marriage of the most noble Prince your Son: But as your most loyal and humble Subjects and Servants, representing the whole Commons of your Kingdom (who have a large interest in the happy and prosperous Estate of your Majesty, and your royal Posterity, and of the flourishing Estate of our Church and Commonwealth) did resolve, out of our cares and fears, truly and plainly to demonstrate these things to your Majesty, which we were not assured could otherwise come so fully and clearly to your knowledge; and that being done, to lay the same down at your Majesty's feet, without expectation of any other 1621. " answer of your Majesty, touching these higher points, than what at your good pleasure, and in your own time should be held fit.

" This being the effect of that we had formerly resolved upon, and these the occasions and reasons inducing the same, our humble suit to your Majesty and confidence is, That your Majesty will be graciously pleased to receive, at the hands of these our Messengers, our former humble Declaration and Petition, and vouchsafe to read, and favorably to interpret the same: and that to so much thereof as containeth our humble Petition concerning Jesuits, Priests, and Popish Recusants, the passage of Bills, and granting your royal pardon, you will vouchsafe an answer unto us.

" And whereas your Majesty, by the general words of your Letter, seemeth to restrain us from intermeddling with matters of Government, or particulars which have their motion in the Courts of Justice, the generality of which words, in the largeness of the extent thereof (as we hope beyond your Majesty's intention) might involve those things, which are the proper subject of Parliamentary occasions and discourse.

" And whereas your Majesty doth seem to abridge us of the antient liberty of Parliament, for freedom of Speech, jurisdiction, and just censure of the house, and other proceedings there, (wherein, we trust in God, we shall never transgress the bounds of loyal and dutiful Subjects) a liberty which we assure ourselves, so wise and so just a King will not infringe, the same being our antient and undoubted Right and inheritance received from our Ancestors; without which we cannot freely debate, nor clearly discern of things in question before us, nor truly inform your Majesty; in which we have been confirmed by your Majesty's most gracious former Speeches and Messages. We are therefore now again enforced in all humbleness to pray your Majesty to allow the same, and thereby to take away the doubts and scruples, your Majesty's late Letter to our Speaker hath wrought upon us.

" So shall we your loyal and loving Subjects ever acknowledge your Majesty's justice, grace and goodness, and be ready to perform that service to your Majesty, which in the true affection of our hearts we profess, and pour out our daily and devout Prayers to the Almighty for your Majesty's long life, happy and religious Reign, and prosperous Estate, and for your royal Posterity after you for ever."

This Petition, with the Remonstrance annexed, was sent to the King by twelve Members, at the head of whom the House affected to set Sir Richard Weston, a Privy-Counsellor, a known Papist, and thought to be the person that most incensed the King against the Commons. Then the House resolved to proceed to no other affair, till they had an answer to their Petition. The King received the twelve Members very roughly. Some say, he called for twelve chairs for them, saying, Here are twelve Kings come to me. He received from them the last Petition, but rejected the Remonstrance, with the copy of the Petition already presented to him against the Recusants. Some days after he sent the Commons an answer in writing. As nothing can better discover that Prince's delings and character than his Speeches, though generally very long, the Reader perhaps will be glad to see the answer at length.

" WE must here begin in the same fashion that we would have done, if your first Petition had come to our hands, before we had made a stay thereof; which is to repeat the first words of the late Queen's famous memory, used by her, in an answer to an insolent proposition made by a Polonian Ambassador unto her; that is, Legatum expellabamus, Heraldum accipimus. For we had great reason to expect, that the first message from your house should have been a message of thanksgiving, for our continued gracious behaviour towards our people, since your last recess, not only by our Proclamation of grace, wherein were contained six or seven and thirty Articles, all of several points of grace to the people, but also by the labour we took for the satisfaction of both Houses, in those three Articles recommended unto us in both their names, by the right reverend Father in God, the Archbishop of Canterbury; and likewise for the good Government of Ireland, we are now in hand with at your request; But not only have we heard no news of all this, but contrary, great complaints of the danger of Religion within this Kingdom, tacitly implying our ill-Government in this point. And we leave you to judge, whether it be your duties, that are the representative body of our people, so to displease them with our Government; whereas by the contrary it is your duty, with all your endeavours,

"Now whereas, in the very beginning of this your apology, you tax us in fair terms of trusting uncertain reports, and partial informations concerning your proceedings, we wish you to remember, that we are an old and experienced King, needing no such lessons, being in our conscience free of any King alive, from hearing or trusting idle reports, which so many of your House as are nearest us can bear witness unto you, if you would give as good ear to them, as you do to some tribunitial orators among you: And for proof in this particular, we have made your own Messengers confer your other petitions sent by you, with the copy thereof, which was sent us before: Between which there is no difference at all; but that since our receiving the first copy, you added a conclusion unto it, which could not come to our hands till it was done by you, and your messenger sent, which was all at one time. And if we had no copy of it beforehand, we must have received your first Petition, to our great dishonour, before we had known what it contained, which would have enforced us to return you a far worse answer than now we do; for then your messengers had returned with nothing, but that we have judged your Petition unlawful and unworthy of an answer: For as to your conclusion thereof, it is nothing but Protlatia contraria factis; for in the body of your Petition, you usurp upon our Prerogative royal, and meddle with things far above your reach; and then in the conclusion you protest the contrary; as if a robber would take a man's purse and then protest he meant not to rob him. For first, you presume to give us your advice concerning the match of our dearest Son with some Protestant (we cannot say Prince, for we know none of these fit for him) and dissuade us from his match with Spain; urging us to prevent War with that King: and yet in the conclusion, forsooth, ye protest ye intend not to press upon our most undoubted and regal Prerogative; as if the petitioning of us in matters that yourselves confess ye ought not to meddle with, were not a meddling with them.

"And whereas ye pretend, that ye were invited to this course by the Speeches of three honourable Lords; yet by so much as yourselves repeat of the Speeches, nothing can be concluded, but that we were resolved by War to regain the Palatinate, if otherwise we could not attain unto it. And you are invited to advise forthwith upon a supply, for keeping the forces in the Palatinate from disbanding, and to foresee the means for the raising, and maintenance of the body of an army for that War against the spring. Now, what inference can be made upon this, that therefore we must presently denounce War against the King of Spain, break our dearest Son's match, and match him to one of our Religion, let the world judge. The difference is no greater, than if we would tell a Merchant, that we had great need to borrow money from him for raising an army; that thereupon it would follow, that we were bound to follow his advice in the direction of the War, and all things depending thereupon: But yet not contenting yourselves with this excuse of yours, which indeed cannot hold water, ye come after to a direct contradiction to the conclusion of your former Petition, saying, that the honour and safety of us and our posterity, and the patrimony of our Children, invaded and possessed by their enemies, the welfare of religion, and State of our Kingdoms, are matters at any time not unfit for your deepest considerations in Parliament. To this generality, we answer with the Logicians, that where all things are contained, nothing is omitted. So as this plenipotencie of yours, invests you in all power upon earth, lacking nothing but the Pope's to have the keys also both of heaven and purgatory: And to this vast generality of yours, we can give no other answer; for it will trouble all the best Lawyers in the House to make a good commentary upon it: For so did the Puritan ministers in Scotland bring all kinds of causes within the compass of their jurisdiction, saying, that it was the Church's office to judge of slander, and there could no kind of crime or fault be committed, but there was a slander in it, either against God, the King, or their Neighbour; and by this means they hooked in to themselves the cognizance of all causes: or like Bellarmino's distinction of the Pope's power over all Kings, in ordine ad Spiritualia, whereby he gives them all temporal jurisdiction over them.

"But to give you a direct answer to the matter of War for which you are so earnest. We confess, we rather expect you should have given us great and hearty thanks, for the so long maintaining a settled Peace in all our Dominions, when as all our neighbours about are in a miserable combustion of War; but, Dulce bellum in- exportis. And we indeed find by experience, that a number of our Subjects are so pampered with Peace, as they are desirous of change, though they know not what.

"It is true, that we have ever professed, and in that minde with God's grace, we will live and die, that we will labour by all means possible, either by treaty or by force to restore our Children to their ancient dignity and inheritance: And whatsoever christian Princes or Potentates will set themselves against it, we will not spare any lawful means to bring our so just and honourable purpose to a good end; neither shall the match of our Son, or any other worldly respect, be preferred to this our resolution. For by our credit and intervention with the King of Spain, and the Arch-Duchess and her Husband, now with God, we preserved the Lower Palatinate one whole year from any further conquering in it, which in eight days space, in that time might have easily been swallowed up by Spinola's army without any resistance. And in no better case was it now at our Ambassador the Lord Digby's coming throu' Heidelberg, if he had not extraordinarily succoured it.

"But because we conceive that ye couple this War of the Palatinate with the cause of Religion, we must a little unfold your eyes herein.

"The beginning of this miserable War, which hath set all Christendom on fire, was not for Religion, but only caused by our Son-in-law his hasty and harsh resolution, following evil counsel, to take to himself the Crown of Bohemia.

"And that this is true, himself wrote Letters unto us at that time, desiring to give assurance both to the French King, and State of Venice, that his accepting of the Crown of Bohemia had no reference to the cause of Religion, but only by reason of his Right of Election, (as he called it.) And we would be sorry that that aspersion should come upon our Religion, as to make it a good pretext for dethroning of Kings, and usurping their Crowns; and we would be loth that our People here should be taught that strange doctrine: No, let us not so far wrong the Jesuits, as to rob them of their sweet positions and practice in that very point.

"And upon the other part, we assure ourself so far of your charitable thoughts of us, that we would never have constantly denied our Son-in-law both the title and assistance in that point, if we had been well persuaded of the justice of his quarrel. But to conclude; this unjust usurpation of the Crowns of Bohemia and Hungaria from the Emperor, hath given the Pope and all that Party too fair a ground, and opened them too wide a gate for curbing and oppressing of many thousands of our Religion, in divers parts of Christendom.

"And whereas you excuse your touching upon the King of Spain, upon occasion of the incidents by you repeated in that place, and yet affirm, that it is without any touch to his honour; we cannot wonder enough that you are so forgetful both of your words and writs: For in your former Petition ye plainly affirm, that he affects the temporal monarchy of the whole earth; than which there can be no more malice uttered against any great King, to make all other Princes and Potentates both envy and hate him; but if ye list it may easily be tried, whether that Speech touched him in honour or not, if ye shall ask him the question, whether he means to assume to himself that title or no, for every King can best judge of his own honour. We omit the particular ejaculations of some foul-mouthed orators in your House, against the honour of that King's crown and state.

"And touching your excuse of not determining any thing concerning the match of our dearest Son, but only to tell your opinion, and lay it down at our feet. First, we desire to know, how you could have presumed to determine in that point, without committing of High-Treason. And next you cannot deny but your talking of his match after that manner, was a direct breach of our commandment, and declaration out of our own mouth, at the first setting down of this Parliament, where we plainly professed that we were in treaty of this match with Spain; and wished you to have that confidence in our religion and wisdom, that we would so manage it, as our religion should receive no prejudice by it: And the same we now repeat unto you, professing that we are so far engaged in that match, as we cannot in honour go back, except the King of Spain perform not such things as we expect at his hands. And therefore we are sorry, that ye should shew to have so great distrust in us, as to conceive that 1621. " we should be cold in our religion ; otherwise we cannot imagine how our former publick Declaration should not have stopped your mouths in this point.

" And as to your request, that we would now receive your former Petition ; we wonder what could make you presume that we would receive it, whereas in our former Letter we plainly declared the contrary unto you.

" And therefore we have justly rejected that suit of yours : For what have you left unattempted in the highest points of Sovereignty, in that Petition of yours, except the striking of Coin ? For it contains the violation of leagues, the particular way how to govern a War, and the marriage of our dearest Son, both negative with Spain, nay, with any other Popish Princes : and also affirmatively, as to the matching with one of our Religion ; which we confess is a strain beyond any providence or wisdom God hath given us, as things now stand.

" These are unfit things to be handled in Parliament, except your King shall require it of you : For who can have wisdom to judge of things of that nature, but such as are daily acquainted with the particulars of Treaties, and of the variable and fixed connexion of affairs of State, together with the knowledge of the secret ways, ends, and intentions of Princes in their several Negotiations ? Otherwise, a small mistaking of matters of this nature may produce more effects than can be imagined : and therefore, Ne juxta altera crepidam. And besides, the intermeddling in Parliament with matters of Peace or War, and marriage of our dearest Son, would be such a diminution to us, to our Crown in foreign Countries, as would make any Prince neglect to treat with us, either in matters of Peace or Marriage, excepting they might be assured by the assent of the Parliament. And so it proved long ago with the King of France (1), who upon a trick procuring his State to dissent from some Treaty which before he had made, was after refused treating with any other Princes, to his great reproach, unless he would first procure the assent of his Estates to their proposition. And will you cast your eyes upon the late times, you shall find that the late Queen of famous memory, was humbly petitioned by a Parliament to be pleased to marry : But her answer was, That she liked their Petition well, because it was simple, not limiting her to place or person, as not bestowing her liking to their fancies ; and if they had done otherwise, she would have thought it a high presumption in them. Judge then what we may do in such a case, having made our publick declaration already (as we said before) directly contrary to that which you have now petitioned.

" Now to the points in your Petition, whereof you desire an answer, as properly belonging to the Parliament : The first and the greatest point is that of Religion ; concerning which, at this time, we can give you no other answer than in general ; which is, That you may rest secure, that we will never be weary to do all we can for the propagation of our Religion, and repressing of Popery : But the manner and form you must remit to our care and providence, who can best consider of times and seasons, not by undertaking a publick war of Religion thro' all the world at once, (which how hard and dangerous a task it may prove, you may judge.) But this puts us in mind, how all the world complained the last year of plenty of Corn ; and God sent us a cooling-card this year for that heat : And so we pray God, that this desire among you of kindling wars (shewing your weariness of peace and plenty) may not make God permit us to fall into the miseries of both. But as we already said, our care of Religion must be such, as on the one part we must not, by the hot persecution of our Recusants at home, irritate foreign Princes of contrary Religion, and teach them the way to plague the Protestants in their Dominions, with whom we daily intercede, and at this time principally, for ease to them of our profession that live under them ; yet upon the other part, we never mean to spare from due and severe punishment any Papist that will grow insolent for living under our so mild Government. And you may also be assured, we will leave no care untaken, as well for the education of the youth at home, especially the children of Papists, as also for preserving at all times hereafter the youth that are or shall be abroad, from being bred in dangerous places, and so poisoned in Popish Seminaries.

" And as in this point, namely, the good education of popish youth at home, we have already given some good

" proofs, both in this Kingdom and in Ireland, so will we be well pleased to pass any good Laws that shall be made, either now, or at any time hereafter to this purpose.

" And as to your request of making this a Session, and granting a general Pardon ; it shall be in your defaults, if we make not this a Session before Christmas.

" But for the Pardon, ye crave such particulars in it, as we must be well advised upon, lest otherwise we give you back the double or treble of that we are to receive by your entire Subsidy, without fifteen. But the ordinary course we hold fittest to be used still in this case, is, That we should of our free grace fend you down a Pardon from the Higher-House, containing such points as we shall think fittest, wherein, we hope, ye shall receive good satisfaction.

" But we cannot omit to shew you, how strange we think it, that ye should make so bad and unjust a commentary upon some words of our former Letter, as if we meant to restrain you thereby of your ancient Privileges and Liberties in Parliament. Truly, a scholar would be ashamed so to misplace and misjudge any sentences in another man's book. For, whereas in the end of our former Letter, we discharge you to meddle with matters of Government, and mysteries of State, namely, matters of war or peace, or our dearest Son's match with Spain; by which particular denominations we interpret and restrain our former words : And then, after we forbid you to meddle with such things as have their ordinary course in Courts of Justice ; ye couple together those two distinct sentences, and plainly leave out those words, Of mysteries of State ; so as ye cry, à bene divisi ad male conjuncta : For of the former part concerning mysteries of State, we plainly restrain our meaning to the particulars that were after mentioned ; and in the latter, we confess we meant it by Sir Edward Coke's foolish business (2). And therefore it had well become him, especially being our servant, and one of our Council, to have complained unto us, which he never did, though he was ordinarily at Court since, and never had access refused unto him.

" And although we cannot allow of the stile, calling it Your antient and undoubted Right and Inheritance ; but could rather have wished, that ye had said, That your Privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our Ancestors and us ; (for most of them grow from Precedents, which rather shew a Toleration than Inheritance.) yet we are pleased to give you our royal assurance, that as long as you contain yourselves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful Liberties and Privileges, as ever any of our Predecessors were ; nay, as to preserve our own Royal Prerogatives, so as your House shall only have need to beware to trench upon the Prerogative of the Crown ; which would enforce us, or any just King, to retrench them of their Privileges, that would pare his Prerogative, and flowers of the Crown : But of this, we hope, there shall never be cause given."

The last part of the King's answer was so clear, as to want no explication. He had contented himself hitherto with insinuating certain Principles, the consequences whereof he had carefully concealed, and thereby seemed to reserve to himself the power either of admitting these consequences, in their utmost extent, or with restrictions, or of denying them according as occasion should require. But now, whether he gave way to his passion, or was glad at last to speak his thoughts clearly, not to be constrained any longer to use doubtful expressions, which very often were pretended not to be understood, he put the Commons under a necessity either of granting his pretensions, or opposing them openly. But, if I may venture to say it, he committed an inexcusable error, in not dissolving the Parliament, before the Commons had time to debate upon his answer. He would thereby have established his pretensions without incurring the vexation of an open and publick opposition, which he must have expected, unless he was willfully blind. The Commons having read the answer, the consequences whereof they plainly perceived, and knowing the Parliament was going to be dissolved or prorogued, drew up the following Protestation.

" THE Commons now assembled in Parliament, being justly occasioned thereunto, concerning fundamental liberties, franchises, and privileges of Parliament,

The Commons first sat down, W. 47. Annals of James I.

(1) Francis I.
(2) Francis I. had a design formed by Chancellor Bacon, one Lepson, and Goldsmith, against Sir Edward Coke, after he was discharged from being Chief Justice, namely, to exhibit an Information against him in the Star-Chamber, or send him into Ireland. This business was debated in the House of Commons. Coke, p. 118.

(3) The Lord Keeper Williams advised, that the harshness of this answer might be mitigated and softened, for he could never bear, that there should be a misunderstanding between the King and his People, if it were possible to prevent it. Philips, p. 98.

" amongst others here mentioned, do make this protestation following, that the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdiction of Parliament, are the ancient and undoubted birth-right and inheritance of the Subjects of England; and that the arduous and urgent affairs concerning the King, State, and defence of the Realm, and of the Church of England, and the maintenance and making of Laws, and redress of mischiefs and grievances which daily happen within this Realm, are proper subjects and matter of counsel and debate in Parliament: and that in the handling and proceeding of those businesses, every Member of the House of Parliament hath, and, of right, ought to have, freedom of speech, to propound, treat, reason, and bring to conclusion the same; and that the Commons in Parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of these matters in such order, as in their judgments shall seem fittest; and that every Member of the said House hath like freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment, and molestation (other than by censure of the House itself) for, or concerning, any speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the Parliament or Parliament-business: And that if any of the said Members be complained of, and questioned for any thing done or said in Parliament, the same is to be shewed to the King by the advice and assent of all the Commons assembled in Parliament, before the King give credence to any private information."

The King being informed of this Protestation, called a Council, and came in person, to cause what is contained in the following Memorial, to be ordered.

Whitehall, Dec. 30, 1621.

" HIS most excellent Majesty coming this day to the Council, the Prince his Highness, and all the Lords, and others of his Majesty's Privy-Council sitting about him, and all the Judges then in London, which were fix in number, there attending upon his Majesty; the Clerk of the Commons House of Parliament was called for, and commanded to produce his Journal-Book, wherein was noted, and entries made of most passages that were in the Commons House of Parliament; and amongst other things, there was written down, the form of a Protestation, concerning sundry liberties, privileges, and franchises of Parliament; with which form of Protestation his Majesty was justly offended. Nevertheless, his Majesty, in a most gracious manner, there expressed, that he never meant to deny that House of Commons any lawful Privileges that ever they had enjoyed; but whatsoever Privileges or Liberties they had by any Law or Statute, the same should be inviolably preserved unto them; and whatsoever Privileges they enjoyed by custom, or uncontrolled and lawful precedent, his Majesty would be careful to preserve. But this Protestation of the Commons House, so contrived and carried as it was, his Majesty thought fit to be razed out of all Memorials, and utterly to be annihilated, both in respect of the manner by which it was gained, and the matter therein contained. For the manner of getting it, first in respect of the time: For, after such time as his Majesty, out of his Princely grace, and to take away all mistakings, had directed his Letter to Secretary Calvert, dated at Royston, 16 December, and therein had so explained himself in the point of maintaining the Privileges of the House of Commons, as that most of the said House rested fully satisfied, and freed from any scruple of having their Liberties impeached; and after that, by his Majesty's Letters, directed to the Speaker, dated 18th December, being Tuesday, his Majesty, at the humble suit of the House of Commons, condescended to make this meeting a Session before Christmas, and for that purpose had assigned Saturday following. Now upon this very Tuesday, and while the messengers from the House of Commons were with his Majesty at Theobalds, to return thanks unto his Majesty, and therewith an excuse from them not to make it a Session, in respect of the strait of time whereunto they were driven; which deferment his Majesty admitted of at their desires, and thereupon gave orders for the adjournment of the Parliament until the 8th of February next, which was the first day formerly appointed by his Majesty for the meeting together of the Parliament: and whilst their messengers were with his Majesty, and had received a gracious answer to return unto their Houses; even that afternoon, a Committee was procured to be made for taking their Liberties into consideration; and this afternoon a Protestation was made (to whom, appears not) concerning their Liberties; and at fix a clock at night, by Candle-light, the same Protestation was brought into the House by the Committee, and at that time of night it was called upon to be put to the question, there not being the third part of the House then present; whereas in all matters of weight, their usual custom is, to put nothing of importance to the question, till the House be full: and at this time many of them that were present, expected the question would have been deferred to another day, and a fuller House; and some then present stood up to have spoken to it, but could not be seen or heard in that darkness and confusion. Now for the matter of the Protestation, it is penned in such ambiguous and general words, as may serve for future times to invade most of the Rights and Privileges annexed to the Imperial Crown; the claim of some Privileges being grounded upon the words of the Writ for assembling the Parliament, wherein some words, viz. Arduis Regni, are cunningly mentioned; but the word quidam, which restraineth the generality to such particular cases, as his Majesty pleased to consult with them upon, is purposely omitted (1).

These things considered, his Majesty did, this present day, in full assembly of his Council, and in the presence of the Judges, declare the said Protestation, to be invalid, annulled, void, and of no effect: and did further, manu sua propria, take the said Protestation out of the Journal-Book of the Clerk of the Commons House of Parliament, and commanded an Act of Council to be made thereupon, and this Act to be entered in the Register of Council Causes."

Six days after, the King dissolved the Parliament by Proclamation, declaring, he was not obliged to give an account thereof to any, since the dissolving of the Parliament, when he pleased, was confided in his power (2). That however, he was willing to inform the publick, it was because the Commons took the liberty not only to treat of his High Prerogatives which belonged not to them, but also to speak disrespectfully of foreign Princes: that they spent the time in disputing about their Privileges, without regarding the publick wants: that some ill-tempered spirits sowed tares among the corn, and by their cunning devices, had imposed upon him a necessity of discontinuing the present Parliament, without putting it to the name or period of a Session. Then, he declared, that though the Parliament was broken off, he intended to govern well, and should gladly embrace the first occasion to call another at a proper season.

This Proclamation was followed by another, forbidding under severe penalties, to talk of State-affairs, and charging the Judges in their Circuits, to put the Laws in force against licentious tongues.

But the King's resentment did not end here. Some of the Commons, who had appeared most zealous to maintain the Privileges of the House, as Sir Edward Coke (3), Sir Robert Philips, Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, Mr. Mallory, were committed to prison. Likewise Sir Dudley Digges, Sir Thomas Crew, Sir Nathaniel Rich, and Sir James Perrot, were ordered into Ireland, to execute a certain Commission, the King intending thereby to remove them from their homes, and punish them with a sort of banishment. On the other hand, the Earls of Oxford and Southampton were sent to the Tower on some studied pretence (4): but it was easy to see, it was for speaking too freely in the House of Peers, of the King's conduct.

Till the last Parliament, the King and Commons had only mutually tried each other, the one to enlarge his Prerogative, the other to preserve Privileges, which they looked upon as incontestable. But on the present occasion, there was a necessity of declaring and acting openly. The King pretended, as appears by his answer to the Petition of the Commons, that their Privileges having no other found-dation than the concession of the Kings his predecessors, it was in his power to revoke them if they gave just occasion. The Commons, on their side, pretended, they enjoyed these Privileges by ancient and undoubted Right, had received them by inheritance from their ancestors, and the King had no power to take them away. I pass over in silence the consequences which may be drawn from both these Principles, if carried as far as the general terms will allow: they are obvious to the meanest capacity. I beg leave, not to determine so difficult a point, but only to make some remarks, which, I hope, will be of use for the sequel of the History.

First, it is very difficult, in my opinion, and perhaps impossible, to establish upon fixt principles, as well the Royal Prerogatives of the Kings of England, as the Privileges of the Parliament, and of the House of Commons in particular. We must except such as are allowed on both sides, since this mutual consent is of no less force than a Law. Custom therefore and Precedent are the only foundation on which to establish their respective Rights.

The Anglo-Saxons, who conquered Britain, had no Kings in those parts of Germany, where they inhabited before their coming into England. Their Government was Aristocratical. Seven of their Chiefs, by whom Britain was conquered, assumed the title of Kings, which was never before in use among them.

It must be observed, as a very necessary point, That the dominion of these new Kings did not properly extend over the conquered People, namely, the Britons, who were almost all driven into Wales and Cornwall, but over the Conquerors themselves, among whom the subdued Country was divided. Hence it is evident, that the Right of Conquest which might be alleged in favour of these first Kings and their Successors, is wholly excluded.

It is very likely, not to say certain, that the Parliament of England is as ancient as the Monarchy, though some dispute it, but, in my opinion, without any foundation (1). At least, the time cannot be ascertained, when the Parliament first began. But it is very difficult to prove, the Commons were summoned to Parliament, and voted there.

On the other hand, it cannot be doubted, these first Kings had great Prerogatives, which were much increased by their Successors. But I believe it may be taken for granted, that in general, neither the King's Prerogatives, nor the People's Privileges, owe their original to the Laws. Consequently, they can neither be limited nor enlarged, but as warranted by Examples and Precedents. Now these Precedents are so contrary one to another, that there is no forming any fixed and certain rules. And what causes most difficulty in this matter, is the ambiguity of the terms, and first, in the word Parliament.

If the Parliament is considered as composed of the King and the two Houses, an unlimited power, with respect to the affairs of the Kingdom, may, without fear, be ascribed to it. But if the Parliament is supposed to consist only of the two Houses without the King, it cannot be denied, that its Rights are limited. The two Houses are properly the whole nation, exclusive of the King. They have their Privileges: but it belongs not to them to extend them as they please: the King's consent is necessary to that end. This is still more true, when one of the Houses acts alone, without the concurrence of the other: For then it represents but part of the Nation, who cannot lawfully claim any other rights than those which are granted either by some Law, or by the tacit consent of the King and the other House. It is very certain, that to each of the two Houses belong separate Rights and Privileges; and that the two Houses together, though parted from the King, have also their Privileges. But the question is, to know how far they reach, and whether the King alone ought to be judge.

The term Prerogative Royal is liable to no less ambiguity than the word Parliament. It is a loose and general term, which gives only a very confused idea of the thing signified. If it is a Right common to all that bear the title of King, the Prerogative Royal must be the same every where, and the Kings of England and Peland will be as absolute as the King of Persia. If it has bounds, by whom were they set? Or, what are the bounds which it cannot exceed? I believe it is no less difficult to resolve these questions, than those concerning the Privileges of the Parliament. But as the Prerogative Royal includes many particular Rights, let us examine, for instance, the Power challenged by James of revoking the Privileges of the House of Commons. From whence had he this particular Prerogative? Was it a right common to all Kings? But there are in the world Kingdoms without Parliaments or a House of Commons. Was this Prerogative as ancient as the English Monarchy? But he himself would not grant, the House of Commons to be so ancient. Was it from some Law? But he produced none. Was it by a tacit consent, or by usurpation? But the thing had never happened before. Was it, in fine, upon this general maxim, that whatever is granted by one King, may be revoked by another? But, besides that this is no undeniable Principle, especially after an uninterrupted possession for many ages, the King would have been very much puzzled to name the Kings who had granted the Commons their Privileges. Thus King James supposed, that the Prerogative was a thing fixed, incontestable, known to all the world, though nothing was more indeterminate, or of less known extent and limits.

Let us consider now what were those Rights, Liberties, Privileges, claimed by the Commons as their ancient and undoubted birth-right and inheritance. These are all uncertain and general terms, of which we cannot have a clear and distinct idea, without applying them to particular cases. But what was said concerning the Royal Prerogative, may be applied here. How came the Commons by these Rights? How far did they reach? Where were their bounds? This would be very difficult to fix. James perhaps went too far, when he would have entirely deprived the Commons of the right of representing to him the nation's Grievances, and of the liberty to debate, reason, and say in the House what was thought proper. But if, under colour of these Rights, the Commons would take upon them to advise the King upon all occasions, and speak injuriously of his Majesty in their House, upon what would they ground such Privileges?

Since therefore it is so difficult to decide the questions concerning the Prerogative Royal, and the Privileges of both Houses, or of each in particular, prudence and good policy require, that Kings and Parliaments avoid as a rock the engaging in such disputes. Accordingly, we may have observed in the perusal of this History, that the wisest, the most illustrious Kings, those whose merit is most universally acknowledged, as Edward I., Edward III., Henry V., Edward IV., Henry VIII., Elizabeth, never had any contests of this nature with their Parliaments. On the contrary, those that were least eminent for their prudence and capacity, such as Henry III., Edward II., Richard II., were ruined, for raising such sorts of disputes. James is the first, who in those latter days engaged in this quarrel. He was followed by his Son and Grandsons, and these Princes, instead of succeeding in their projects, only rendered themselves most unhappy. A wife and prudent King of England, who knows his own interest, will never quarrel with his Parliament; and a Parliament, whose sole view is the Kingdom's welfare, will take care never to question the King's just Prerogative: Nay, they will rather chuse to see it stretched a little too far, than run the risk of breaking an union, which is the sole foundation of the publick happiness. I hope I shall be forgiven this digression, which to me seems of use to inform the Reader, and help him to judge impartially of the differences which arose in this, and produced so many calamities in the following Reign.

The dissolution of the Parliament, and the little likelihood of the King's ever calling another, could not but be attended with ill consequences. The King forfeited, by this proceeding, not only the love and esteem of great part of his Subjects, but also the regard of Foreigners. When he was thus embroiled with his people, it was universally concluded he could be no longer either a friend to be relied on, or an enemy to be feared. On the other hand, the Nation could not reflect without terror, that they were going to be exposed to an arbitrary power, since there were to be no more Parliaments to keep the Prerogative-Royal within due bounds. But the worst effect produced by the rupture between the King and Parliament, was the division among the Subjects, who continually joined with the two opposite parties, which subsist to this day, with some difference, under the names of Tories and Whigs.

These two parties, which began to be formed, were contented at first with mutual disputes, in defence of the King's or the People's rights, in respect of what had caused the dissolution of the Parliament. The Royalists said, the Commons meant to make the English Monarchy a Republick. That in meddling with State-affairs, and advising the King concerning the management of the Kingdom and his own family, they showed they aspired to no less than governing the State, since they would never want pretences to give the King counsel; which if he refused to comply with, he would, by that very thing, be deprived of the necessary aids for defence of the Realm, and constrained to receive law from foreign Princes. That England was originally a Monarchy, and had ever continued upon the same foot: but the foundations were going to be undermined, by making the King subject to the Parliament. That at first Remonstrances only were made to the King; afterwards, Counsels were added; but these Counsels would soon be converted into Infrustrations, and the Instructions into Orders and Commands: In a word, if the Commons were suffered to proceed, the King would quickly become a meer Doge. That the Commons had the less right to pretend to the Government of the State, as the State had subsisted five hundred years without them, since it was about the end of Henry III's Reign, and during the Earl of Leicester's usurpation, that the Representatives of the People were first admitted into the Parliament. In short, that it was a strange thing, that under a monarchical Government, the People, or their Representatives, should tell the King how he was to govern his Kingdom: that supposing the People had such a right, it would be necessary to impart to them all the secrets of the State, and consult them about Alliances and Treaties, Peace and War. But as this had never been practised, it followed of course that the supposition was false, and the People were called to Parliament only to supply the King's wants, and to settle the taxes and impositions in a manner the least burthenome to the Subjects. That indeed, as to the Laws concerning the internal Government of the State, it was thought proper to enact them with the consent of the People who were to be subject to them, that they might be the better executed: but no consequence could thence be drawn, either for foreign affairs, or for the execution of these laws which was left to the King alone, or for the general Government of the Realm.

The favourers of the People said in their turn, that the King was not satisfied with England's being a Monarchy, but would make it an absolute Monarchy. That he affected to confound the several kinds of Monarchies, whereof some were more, others less absolute, in order to acknowledge but one sort, to which he ascribed an unlimited power. That the English Monarchy was not of this kind, but began with the Parliament, which being as ancient as the Royalty, formed, together with the Sovereign, the absolute power, the King would assume to himself alone. That the Parliament had their privileges, as the King had his, nor could be deprived of them, without destroying the nature and constitution of the English Government. That the Parliament represented the whole Nation, who were as much or more concerned in the welfare of the State than the King himself. That indeed, the King had his undoubted prerogatives: But they were intended for the welfare and preservation, and not for the ruin, of the State. That, whilst he kept within these bounds, and acted only for the benefit of the Kingdom, he answered the end and intent of his prerogatives: but it was destroying the constitution, to pretend that his Prerogative Royal gave him power to subvert the Laws, to make Alliances repugnant to the good of the Realm, to render the Nation contemptible in the eyes of Foreigners, to expose Religion to the danger of being ruined, through an extreme carelessness and condescension for its enemies. That in such a case, as he swerved from the end and design of his prerogative, it was the people's or their Representatives business, to show him the inconveniences of his conduct, propound means to prevent them, and give him proper advice for their cure. That if this were not so, it would follow the King would be absolute and arbitrary: might ruin and destroy the Kingdom at his pleasure, trample upon the established Laws, oppress the Subjects, take away their Lives and fortunes, which was directly contrary to the constitution of England. That as to the rest, it evidently appeared, the King was labouring to reduce the privileges of the Parliament to little or nothing. Does the Parliament represent to him the people's Grievances? It may, says he, from thence be inferred, that the King governs ill, and this tends to alienate from him the love of his Subjects. Is he desired to put the Laws against Recufants in execution? He answers, That affair must be left to his care, he knows what is proper to be done: He is an old experienced King, who has no need to be taught, and yet he is not seen to do the least thing towards redressing the grievances complained of. Do the Commons represent to him that the Prince his Son's marriage with the Spanish Infanta may be of very ill consequence to Religion? He replies, They have no business to meddle with his family-concerns. Do they strive to make him sensible that the Protestant Religion is in danger of being destroyed throughout all Europe, for want of assistance, and that the King of Spain amules him with fair promises, whilst he is over-running the Palatinate? He answers, These are matters of State too high for the People's Representatives, who have neither wisdom nor capacity enough to comprehend the mysteries of Government: Ne fatur ultra eripiam. In a word, he reduces the privileges of the Commons to advising the King, when he shall do them the honour to ask it, and to supplying him with money when he demands it on any pretence, though the pretence be evidently false, since he will not suffer his reasons to be examined. But this is not all. He plainly tells the Commons, their privileges are only concessions of himself and Predecessors, and intimates that they shall keep them no longer than their submission makes them worthy of them. Is it possible, say they, to give plainer marks of a settled design to usurp an arbitrary power? Supposing the Commons were not called to Parliament till the Reign of Henry III, which however cannot be proved, have they not been, ever since, an essential part of Parliament, and consequently have they not an undoubted right to all parliamentary privileges?

This is part of what was then said on both sides, and is what served to cherish division between the two parties, who have not ever since ceased to revile one another. It is easy to guess which of the two parties the Puritans joined with. They loved not the King, who, on his part, discovered on all occasions that he was their mortal enemy. But, as I said, there were two sorts of Puritans, namely, State-Puritans and Church-Puritans. Before the King declared himself so openly with respect to his Prerogative-Royal, the State-Puritans were few, because the King having gone no great lengths, his intention was yet only suspected. But after the dissolution of the third Parliament, their number greatly increased, and the King, through a policy very destructive of his interests, always affected to confound these two sorts of Puritans. He thereby forced them to make but one party, though they were united only in a single point, namely, in opposing the maxims of the Court. So the Church-Puritans, who before made but a little figure in the Kingdom, suddenly turned a very considerable party, by the junction of the State-Puritans. This party grew in the end so powerful, that they overthrew the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, and the Monarchy itself: but this happened not till the following Reign.

On the other hand, the King's party was strengthened by the junction of the Arminians, who were very numerous. Arminius's Doctrine had bred disputes in England, tho' with less noise than in Holland. Many Clergymen had embraced this Doctrine, though condemned by the Synod of Dort, whose authority they did not acknowledge, and notwithstanding the King's open profession to reject Arminius's tenets. These men improving the opportunity arising from the discord between the two Parties, readily joined with the Royalists, and from that time were as much carested at Court as they were hated before. By this means William Laud, a Clergyman of great parts and learning, was qualified, though Arminian, to be promoted to the See of St. David's by the Marquis of Buckingham's interest, who desired the Bishop of Lincoln (1) to recommend him to the King. It was however with some difficulty that the King agreed to his preferment, being prejudiced against him on account of his proud and turbulent spirit (2). After the Arminians had lifted themselves in the King's party, they were in the height of prosperity, favoured by the Courtiers, who were labouring to hinder the growth of Puritanism. On the other hand, the Papists also declared openly for the King, because it was by an absolute power alone that they could obtain their desires, whereas the Parliament was their professed enemy. In the fine, most of the Clergy espoused likewise the King's side, looking upon him as the only person capable of supporting them against the attempts of the Puritans, whose number continually increased.

The two Parties being thus composed of men of different kinds and sentiments, mutually upbraided one another with what was most odious in each party. The Royalists confounded under the name of Puritans, all who opposed the King, and the Puritans taxed all the Royalists with being Papists or Arminians (3).

This division, which began to be remarkable in England, did not serve to establish the King's reputation abroad. It was now two years since his Son-in-law's dominions were invaded by the Spaniard and Duke of Bavaria, and he was not seen to take any effectual course for their recovery. Embassies and solicitations were the only arms he employed for that end (4). The King of Spain had amused him four or five years with the hopes of a marriage which advanced not, and by that means tied up his hands, whilst he seized the Palatinate. In short, when all Europe expected he would fee the interests of his Kingdom, his family and his own, and take some vigorous resolution, it was heard that he was irreconcilably fallen out with his Parliament. Whereupon he was despised abroad, and insults quickly followed contempt. In the Netherlands he was publicly ridiculed on their Stages. Comedies were acted with Messengers hastily bringing news that the Palatinate was going to be lost, considering the numerous forces that were sending thither by the King of Spain's enemies: The King of Denmark was to find a hundred thousand Pickled Herrings; the Hollanders a hundred thousand Butter-Boxes; and the King of England, a hundred thousand Ambassadors. In one place, King James was pictured with a scabbard without a sword, in another with a sword which could not be drawn, though divers persons stood pulling at it (1). In England itself the almost-forgotten story of David Rizzio was revived. But what most troubled the contrary party to the King, was to see Buckingham govern so absolutely, that the King seemed to have made his Favorite his Master. None were admitted to Places but Papists, Arminians, or such as were reckoned to have little or no Religion. In short, such only passed for Protestants with the Court, as were for the Royal Prerogative in its utmost extent, let their Religion be what it would. All the rest were Puritans. About himself, Archbishop of Canterbury, was reckoned among the Puritans, because he approved not of the Court-maxims. He had the misfortune in the year 1622, to kill a Man with an arrow as he was shooting at a Buck (2), and this accident occasioned his being deemed incapable of performing any longer the functions of a Bishop. Wherefore he resolved also to save himself the trouble of going to the Council, where his advice was little regarded, as coming from a person of Puritan-Principles.

Whilst the people were in this sort of fermentation, the King wanted money. He had a mind to send Digby to Spain, and Wiston to Brussels (3), to finish at once the marriage and the affair of the Palatinate. Besides, Buckingham and his relations were a gulph which could not be filled. There was no likelihood of a new Parliament, after the King's late Proceedings. Though a Parliament could have been persuaded to give the King money, it would not have been till after their Privileges were secured at the expence of the Prerogative-Royal, and the King thought the remedy worse than the disease. Recourse therefore was to be had to extraordinary methods. The speediest and most sure seemed to be the exacting from the people a contribution under the name of Benevolence. As the Court knew, if some constraint were not used, the people's liberality would not go very far, the Judges were ordered in their Circuits to demand a Benevolence, and to intimate withal, that the King would not be satisfied with what should be voluntarily offered, if it was not proportionable to the Giver's abilities. To that purpose the Council directed a circular Letter to the Judges, concluding with these words: Neuertheless, if any person shall, out of obstinacy or disaffection, refuse to contribute herein, proportionally to their estates and means, you are to certify their names unto this Board. And so recommending this service to your best care and endeavour, and praying you to return unto us notes of the names of such as shall contribute, and of the Sums offered by them (4). The excuse for this levy of money was the King's pretended resolution to recover the Palatinate by arms, after having in vain tried gentle means. It will hereafter appear how this resolution was executed.

The King's project was to conclude the Prince his Son's marriage, and receive the dowry of two millions, before he demanded the restitution of the Palatinate, for fear the Spaniard should pretend that this restitution was to be in compensation of the dowry. After that, he hoped the King of Spain, out of friendship, and in consideration of their alliance, would surrender the Lower Palatinate to his Son-in-law, and oblige the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria to restore him the Upper. This was all he intended to do for his Daughter and Son-in-law. That this was his design, manifestly appears in his Instructions to the Lord Digby, before his departure for Spain, wherein he was expressly ordered, not to make the affair of the Palatinate one of the Marriage-Articles. The King however would have the publick believe, that his chief aim in the Spanish match was to procure his Son-in-law the restitution of the Palatinate. This doubtless was one of those mysteries of State which could not be comprehended by the Commons. Perhaps he really hoped, the restitution would immediately follow upon the Marriage: but this hope was built on a very weak foundation. In all appearance, Gondemar inspired him with so chimerical an expectation.

However this be, James, being intirely bent upon this project, sent Digby Ambassador extraordinary to Spain, to conclude the Marriage-treaty jointly with Sir Walter Aston, who had been some time at the Court of Philip IV (5). The articles concerning Religion were already settled, but the rest were not to be talked of, till the Pope's dispensation was obtained, for fear of labouring in vain. This was an artifice of the Spanish Court, to prolong the affair, to have time to finish the conquest of the Palatinate, whilst the dispensation was expedited, which to hasten or delay was, probably, in the King of Spain's breast. Mean while, the hopes of a speedy conclusion of the marriage, of the dowry of two millions, and of the restitution of the Palatinate, so tied up the King's hands, that he durst not take the least step to offend the Spaniard, for fear of defeating so noble a project. Therefore, when ever he talked of engaging in a war for the recovery of the Palatinate, it was always with this restriction, if he could not obtain it by fair means, because he thought himself sure of the success of his negotiations. It is therefore certain, that when he demanded money of the Parliament, or exacted the Benevolence on the people, it was not with design to prepare for war, though that was the pretence, since a breach with the House of Austria was inconsistent with his project.

When Digby, who was this year created Earl of Bristol (6), set out for Spain, the King sent Gage to Rome, to solicit the dispatch of the dispensation, without which the new Ambassador could not proceed at Madrid. But to render Gage's instances more effectual, it was necessary to shew the Pope, the King was not a persecutor of the Catholics. Not but that he had already given very convincing proofs: however he thought he should on this occasion give a still stronger one, by releasing all the imprisoned Recufants (7). This was done publicly and openly, by Writs under the Great-Seal to the Justices of Assize, with a Letter from the Lord-Keeper Williams, exhorting them punctually to obey the King's orders. These Writs, contrary to the Law, to the Commons Remonstrance, and to the King's own answer to their Petition, occasioned many severe censures upon the King's conduct. As this affair made a noise among the People, the Lord Keeper was ordered to vindicate the King by a publick writing. This vindication begins with this noble comparison: As the sun in the firmament appears to us no bigger than a platter, and the stars but as so many nails in the pommel of a saddle, because of the enlargement and disproportion between our eye and the object: So is there such an unmeasurable distance between the deep resolution of a Prince, and the shallow apprehensions of common and ordinary People, that as they will ever be judging and censuring, so they must needs be obnoxious to error and mistaking. Then he gives two reasons, both very false, of this conduct. The first is, that as the King was now soliciting very zealously for some ease to all the Protestants in Europe, it would be unreasonable to execute at the same time the Laws against the Roman Catholics. The second, that the English Jesuits had published a Book to excite the French King to execute in his Kingdom against the Huguenots, the same Laws as those enacted in England against the Papists. But, added the Bishop, to conclude, from the favour done to the English Papists, that the King favours the Romish Religion, is a composition of folly and malice, little deserved by a gracious Prince, who by word, writing, exercise of Religion, and Acts of Parliament hath demonstrated himself so resolved a Protestant.

I observed that about the latter end of the last year, the

22. Emperor sent Count Schwartzemberg to the King, to treat of the affair of the Palatinate. This Ambassador being pompously received at London, as witnessing the Emperor's regard for the King, could produce no Powers when he came to talk of affairs. It was the Archduchess Isabella that was impowered by the Emperor to conclude the truce desired by the King. There was a necessity therefore of going to negotiate at Brussels with the Archduchess and Envoys of some Protestant Princes. The King chose for this employ, Sir Richard Weston, [Chancellor of the Exchequer] probably because he thought his Religion would advance the negotiation. But, to gain the Infanta's favour, he made use of another means also. He permitted the Lord Saxe, a Papist, to raise two thousand men (1) in England, to serve the Infanta against the United-Provinces, and the Protestant Princes their allies. By such means as these the King hoped to succeed in his negotiations. We shall see presently the event, but it will be necessary first to mention what passed in Germany during the year 1622.

The King of Bohemia, plainly perceiving the King his Father-in-law made use of very ineffectual methods to restore him to his Dominions, believed it advisable to proceed some other way. He was still master of Manheim, Heidelberg, and Frankendal, and Count Mansfeldt, though withdrawn into Alsacia, had it still in his power to re-enter the Lower-Palatinate. In order to improve this last remedy, he agreed with Prince Christian of Brunswick, Administrator of the Bishoprick of Halberstadt, who had accompanied him to the Hague, to raise an army in Westphalia, and join Mansfeldt. At the same time he made the like agreement with the Prince of Baden-Durlach, who promised also to levy an army for the same purpose. 'Tis likely, the Hollanders supplied the money for these Levies, on account of the advantage they should reap from this powerful diversion. These two Princes kept promise with the King of Bohemia, and each headed ten or twelve thousand men. The difficulty was how to enter the Lower-Palatinate, where the Spaniards were very strong. However, the thing not appearing impracticable, the Prince of Brunswick took the field in Westphalia, and seized some Places in the County of Marck. This drew upon him a detachment of the Spanish army from the Low-Countries, commanded by Count Henry de Bergh, who was joined by the Count of Anhalt with another detachment of the army of Bavaria, commanded by Count Tilly in the Palatinate. By this means, Prince Christian saw himself detained some time in Westphalia. But at length, the Count of Bergh being recalled, he was at liberty to advance. On the other hand, it was not easy for the Prince of Baden to enter the Palatinate, all the passages being flopt up by Count Tilly and Gonsales of Cordova.

In the mean while, the King of Bohemia departing privately from the Hague, on board a small vessel, and landing at Calais, travels through France and safely arrived at Mansfeldt's army, who was advanced to Germerheim. Here they impatiently expected the approach of the two armies coming to their assistance. It would be needless to give a particular account of the march of these two armies, and the obstacles they met with from the Spaniards and Bavarians. It will suffice to say, the Prince of Baden was defeated the sixth of May: that afterwards the King of Bohemia and Mansfeldt marching to Prince Christian, met Count Tilly, who put them to rout, and forced them to retire to Manheim. This battle was fought the 12th of June. Eight days after, Tilly also attacked Prince Christian, who was advanced to the borders of the Palatinate, and though he gained some advantage over him, could not however prevent his passing to Manheim with good part of his troops.

Some time after, the Spaniards and Bavarians were so strongly recruited, that their army consisted of above fifty thousand men, with which they almost surrounded their enemies, who were encamped between Manheim and Heidelberg. Wherefore the King of Bohemia despairing ever to recover what he had lost, returned to Holland. After his departure, the Prince of Brunswick and Count Mansfeldt, resolved to join Prince Maurice in the Low-Countries, and marched through Lorraine. As they were obliged to take a compass, Gonsales de Cordova parting from Tilly, went and expected them at Brabant, to hinder their passage. The two armies meeting between Namur and Brussels, fought with equal success; but the Prince of Brunswick lost an arm by a cannon ball. After the battle, Mansfeldt continued his march towards Holland.

took Manheim by a long blockade, and then besieged (3)

Whilst the King of Bohemia was in the Palatinate, conferences were held at Brussels, to procure a truce for that unfortunate Country, according to the King of England's desire, though he was not impowered by the King his Son-in-law, for whom, at this juncture, a truce was not convenient. In this negotiation two difficulties immediately occurred, which served to prolong it. The first was, the English Ambassador had not sufficient Power from the King of Bohemia and his allies. James had doubtless imagined, that since this truce was negotiating on his account, it sufficed to treat with him. But the Spaniards gave to understand, they could treat only with the principal parties. There was occasion therefore to send to the Palatinate, but James was not in haste to dispatch them, whilst he had any hopes of succeeding in his enterprise. But at last, sending these Powers when he saw his affairs declining, another difficulty of the same nature occurred at Brussels. The Archduchess had no other power than the Emperor's bare Letter, desiring her to consult with the English Ambassador concerning a truce for the Lower Palatinate (4). From that time the King of Bohemia's affairs daily growing worse, the Archduchess and Count Schwartzemberg prolonged the affair on divers pretences, till Heidelberg was taken, and Manheim closely blocked up. Then James writ to the King of Spain, to desire him to order that the affairs of the Palatinate might remain in their present state, till the conclusion of the truce, and the blockade of Manheim was raised. Philip feigned to have this condescension for him, but before his Letter to the Archduchess was received, Manheim was taken. Nay, it did not hinder Count Tilly from besieging Frankendal, which he would have also taken without scruple, had not the overflowing of the rivers forced him to raise the siege. Thus was the King amused with vain hopes, whilst the conquest of the Palatinate was completing. He perceived it at last, but at the same time was told, the Prince his Son's marriage was so near a conclusion, that he could not think of hazarding a miscarriage in that affair, by insisting too strenuously on the restitution of the Elector's dominions. This may be clearly seen in his Letters to the Earl of Brissill, his Ambassador in Spain, of which I shall here give some extracts.

Right trusty, and well-beloved,

YOUR dispatch of the 9th of August, gave us so much contentment, and so great hopes of satisfaction in all those businesses, which you have there to treat with that King, as we could not expect any further difficulties; notwithstanding by that which has come to our hands immediately after, as well by George Gage from Rome, as by our Ambassador Sir Richard Weston at Brussels, and our Ministers in the Palatinate; we find that neither the dispensation is granted for the match, nor the treaty of cessation so near a conclusion, as we conceived it would have been, now that the auxiliaries, and all other obstacles are removed. But on the contrary side, that new delays and excuses are invented, our Garrisons in the Palatinate in the mean time blocked up, Heidelberg itself actually besieged.---

Therefore our pleasure is, that you shall immediately, and with as much speed as you may, crave audience of that King, and represent unto him the merit which we may justly challenge unto our self, for our sincere proceedings with the Emperor and him in all the course of this business, notwithstanding the many invitations and temptations which we have had, to engage our self on our Son-in-law's part. That we have had both from the Emperor and him hopes given us from time to time of extraordinary respect, howsoever our Son-in-law had deserved, which we have attended and expected even to the very last, with much patience, and in despite (as it were) of all the opposition that hath been made to shake our resolution in that behalf. If now when all impediments are removed, and that the way is so prepared, as that the Emperor may give an end unto the war, and make some present demonstration of his respects towards us, in leaving us the honour of holding those poor places which yet remain, quietly and peacefully, until the general accommodation, the same shall nevertheless be violently taken from us, what can we look for, when the whole shall be in his hands and possession? who amusing us with a treaty of cessation,

"and protracting it industriously, (as we have reason to believe,) doth in the mean time seize himself of the whole Country; which being done, our Ambassador shall return with scorn, and we remain with dishonour."

"I shall not need to furnish you with arguments for the unfolding and laying open this unfriendly dealing more plainly unto them; your own reason and observation will find enough out of the Dispatches, whereof copies are sent unto you; as namely, the withdrawing of the Spanish forces, and leaving the business wholly in the hands of the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria; the file of the Infanta, in answering our Ambassador with recriminations, which was not her manner heretofore; the slight and frivolous answer given by the Marquis of Bedmar unto our Ambassador, when he acquainted him with the siege of Heidelberg; the quarrelsome occasion taken by the Emperor for calling the Diet at Ratisbon, contrary to his own promise, which, in his dispatch to us, he confesseth to have broken, as you will see by the copy: All which, and many more, which your own judgment (in the perusal of the dispatches) will suggest unto you, do minister unto us cause sufficient of jealousy on the Emperor's part, as you shall plainly tell that King; although we will not do him that wrong, as to mistrust that he gives the least consent to it. In this confidence, with much earnestness, we shall still solicit him, that for the affection he bears us, and the desire which we suppose he hath, that there may continue for ever a perfect amity betwixt us and the whole House of Austria, he will not cease to do all good offices herein; letting him know directly, that in these terms we cannot stand with the Emperor; but that if Heidelberg be won, or the siege continue, or the cessation be long unnecessarily delayed, we must recall our Ambassador from Brussels, and treat no more, as we have already given order; hoping, that whatsoever unkindness we shall conceive against the Emperor upon these occasions, it shall not be interpreted to reflect in any sort upon the entire affection that is at this present, and as we hope shall always continue, betwixt us and the Crown of Spain. And therefore, as we have heretofore sundry times promised, in testimony of the sincerity of our proceedings, and of our great desire to preserve the amity inviolable between us and the whole House of Austria, That in case our Son-in-law would not be governed by us, that then we would not only forsake him, but take part, and join our forces with the Emperor against him; so you may fairly represent unto that King, That in like manner we have reason to expect the same measure from him, that (upon the Emperor's averments to a cessation and accommodation) he will likewise actually assist us for the recovery of the Palatinate, and Electoral dignity, unto our Son-in-law, as it hath been oftentimes intimated from Spain (1)."

"To conclude, we shall not need to say any more unto you touching this point, but to let you see that our meaning is, to carry all things fair with that King, and not to give him any cause of distrust or jealousy, if you perceive that they intend to go really and roundly on with the match."

Notwithstanding all this, Heidelberg and Manheim were taken by the Emperor's forces, and Frankendal besieged.

In another Letter to the same Ambassador, dated October 3, the King said, "That while he was amused with Treaties at Madrid and Brussels, Heidelberg had been taken by force, the English Garrisons put to the sword, and Manheim besieged: That the Infanta, (having an absolute Commission to conclude a cessation and suspension of arms) when all objections were answered, did not only delay the conclusion of the Treaty, but refuse to lay her command upon the Emperor's Generals to abstain from the siege of his Garrisons during the Treaty, upon a pretext of want of authority. And therefore, for avoiding of further dishonour, he had been forced to recall both his Ambassadors, as also the Lord Chichester (2), whom he intended to have sent unto the Emperor to the Diet at Ratisbon." After which he added:

"Seeing therefore, that merely out of our extraordinary respect to the King of Spain, and the firm confidence we ever put in the hopes and promises which he did give us, (desiring nothing more than for his cause principally to avoid all occasions that might put us in ill understanding with any of the House of Austria) we have hitherto proceeded with a steadfast patience: trusting to the Treaties, and neglecting all other means, which probably might have secured the remainder of our Children's inheritance, and by this confidence and security of ours, are now exposed to dishonour and reproach. You shall tell that King, That seeing all these endeavours and good offices which he hath used towards the Emperor in this business, on the behalf of our Son-in-law, have not sorted to any other issue, than to a plain abuse, both of his trust and ours; we hope and desire, that he will faithfully promise and undertake upon his honour, (confirming the same also under his hand and seal) either that the Town and Castle of Heidelberg shall, within therefore and ten days after your audience, and demand made, be rendered into our hands, with all things therein belonging; and the like for Manheim and Frankendal, if both or either of them shall be taken by the enemy while these things are in treaty. As also, that there shall be within the said term of seventy days, a cessation and suspension of arms in the Palatinate for the future, upon the several Articles and Conditions last propounded by our Ambassador Sir Richard Weilton; and that the general Treaty shall be set a foot again: Or else, in case all these particulars be not yielded unto, and performed by the Emperor, that the King of Spain do join his forces with ours. Or if so be his forces be otherwise employed, yet that at the least he will permit us a free and friendly passage through his Territories and Dominions, for such forces as we shall send and employ in Germany for his service. Of all which, if you receive not from the King of Spain (within ten days at the farthest after your audience) a direct assurance under his hand and seal without delay, that then you take your leave, and return to our presence, without further stay; otherwise to proceed in the Negotiation for the marriage of our Son, according to the Instructions we have given you."

This Letter plainly shows, the King was convinced, he had hitherto been only amused. And yet he writ the next day; to the Earl of Bristol, to this effect. "Tho' Wilton, you have order to come away without farther delay, in case you receive not satisfaction to your demands from the King of Spain; yet we would not have you instantly come away upon it, but advertise us first, letting us know privately (if you find such cause) that there is no good to be done, nor satisfaction, as you judge, intended us, (though publicly and outwardly you give out to the contrary) that we may make use thereof with our people in Parliament, as we shall hold best for our service."

It is evident by these Letters how much the King was mistaken, in expecting to adjust his Son-in-law's affairs, by the method he had followed, and how he had been trifled with in his several negotiations: That he himself knew it, and all the vengeance he took was to recall his Ambassador from Brussels. It is true, he seemed to intend to be revenged by arms: but he would have the King of Spain join with him, to oblige the Emperor and Duke of Bavaria to restore a country which he had himself delivered to them. At least, he hoped, the King of Spain would grant him a passage through his Territories, projects as chimerical as that of recovering the Palatinate by fair means and solicitations alone. In short, it is visible in these Letters, that the King made the restitution of the Palatinate and conclusion of the marriage two distinct affairs, and did not consider the last as dependent of the other. Indeed, though there was manifestly a collusion between the Emperor, Philip IV, and the Infanta, James ordered his Ambassador to do nothing offensive to the King of Spain, for fear of prejudicing the Marriage which he was always made to regard as upon the point of conclusion.

In fine, after a long expectation, Gage was sent back from Rome, where he had been soliciting the dispensation, with nineteen Articles, to each of which the Pope had put a Postil or short note, after the manner practised in the capitulations of places. Probably, the sense of the three material articles which were agreed on, was explained, and the nineteen following ones were formed by common consent.

I. That the Pope's dispensation shall be first obtained at the sole instance of his Catholic Majesty.

Note. The two Parties are agreed on this point.

II. That the marriage shall be celebrated in Spain according to the Rites practised in the Church of Rome; and afterwards in England, with such ceremonies as shall tend most to the advantage of the King of Great-Britain; yet so, as that nothing be done contrary to the Religion professed by the most excellent Infanta. But as to this point, they shall agree about the ceremonies to be performed in both Kingdoms.

Note. The Marriage ought to be celebrated but once in

(1) It was Count Gondemar that intimated it to him, but without giving him a positive Promise, and yet the King looked upon it as an Engagement.

(2) Arthur Chichester was created Baron Chichester of Belfast in the County of Antrim, February 25, 1612. He was at this time Treasurer of Ireland, and he, in the Commission, did so be—Specie Prudentia Involunt & Integritas Virum, & in magali & sic arduis & c. ut au. & c. & c.

VIII. That the exercise of the Roman Catholic Religion shall be in form following: The most gracious Infanta shall have in her Palace a Chapel so spacious, that her servants and family may enter and stay therein; in which there shall be an ordinary and publick door for them, and another inward door, by which the Infanta may have a passage into the Chapel, where she and others may be present at Divine Offices.

Note. Granted.

At the end of these articles, which were long debated and canvassed by the Congregation of the propagation of faith, the Congregation subjoined their opinion in the following terms.

As to the terms offered by the most serene King of England, Da Chene's it seems to us they are designed only to secure the most serene Infanta's Religion. But to the end his Holiness may grant the dispensation, there are other things necessary to the privileges, increase, and welfare of the Roman Catholic Religion. These things are to be proposed by the most serene King, that his Holiness may consider whether, upon such offers, he can grant the dispensation.

It is easy to see, the Pope's Postils tended not only to the benefit of the Roman Catholic Religion, but also to cause the affair to be prolonged, pursuant to the Court of Spain's intentions. Besides that James was not expected to agree to the contents of the Notes, another expedient was ready to stop the conclusion of the marriage, namely, to oblige the King to make offers for the advancement of the Roman Religion, with which the Pope, if he pleased might never be satisfied. Thus, after a fix years expectation, James was no farther advanced than when the affair was begun, except that he was willing to grant whatever the Pope did or might demand. And indeed, this was the course he took. He found now of what consequence the first article was, which he had been made to sign, that the Dispensation should be first procured by the endeavours of the King of Spain: for by this means, the Spaniard could advance or entirely break off the Negotiation as he pleased, by causing the Pope to delay or refuse the Dispensation. It is certain, as I said, the Court of Spain's intent at first was only to make use of the prospect of this Marriage, to allure James into their snare, for fear he should join with the German-Protestants, and afterwards, for fear he should send a powerful aid to the King of Bohemia.

When Gage came from Rome with the Articles, the King was terribly embarrassed. The Palatinate was almost quite lost. The Negotiation at Brussels did not advance, and he could not but perceive, he was imposed upon by the Emperor and King of Spain: so that he saw no other way to procure the Elector's restoration, but the Prince's Marriage with the Infanta. It is true, England was sufficiently powerful to molest the House of Austria; but a Parliament must have been called, which the King could not think of. On the other hand, the Pope annexed to the Marriage such terms as the King could not grant, without giving occasion to his domestick enemies, to represent him as a Prince regardless of the interests of the Protestant Religion, to which imputation he was already but too liable. In this perplexity, rather than break with Spain, and so lose the desired dowry of two millions, with the hopes of recovering the Palatinate, he chose to be exposed to the reproaches of his Subjects, which he did not seem much to regard. He drew therefore a Memorial which he signed with his own hand, containing his offers in favour of the Catholic Religion, and sent it to the Earl of Bristol, with the Letter of the 9th of September, of which I have already given an extract. The conclusion of the Letter, which I relieved for this occasion, because the Marriage is there mentioned, was as follows.

"Nevertheless"

"Nevertheless we must tell you, that we have no great cause to be well pleased with the diligences used on that part, when we observe, that after so long an expectation of the Dispensation, upon which the whole business (as they will have it) depends, there is nothing yet returned but queries and objections. Yet because we will not give over our patience a while longer, until we understand more certainly what the effect thereof is like to be, wherein we require you to be very wary and watchful, considering how our honour is therein engaged; we have thought fit to let you know, how far we are pleased to enlarge our self, concerning those points demanded by the Pope, and set down by way of postil unto the Articles agreed upon betwixt Spain and us, as you shall see by the power which Gage brought us from Rome, whereof we have sent you a copy, and our resolutions thereupon signed with our own hand, for your warrant and instruction. And further than that, since we cannot go without much prejudice, inconvenience, and dishonour to our self and our Son, we hope and expect the King of Spain will bring it instantly to an issue, without farther delay, which you are to press with all diligence and earnestness, that you may presently know their final resolution, and what we may expect thereupon. But if any respite of time be earnestly demanded, and that you perceive it not possible for them to resolve until an answer come from Rome, we then think it fit that you give them two months time after your audience, that we may understand that King's final resolution before Christmast next at the farthest."

Though the King affirmed he could go no farther, yet means were found to persuade him to a greater compliance, as will hereafter appear.

Hitherto the Spaniard had fed the King's hopes concerning the Marriage, only to amuse him. But since he plainly saw, by the Articles and offers signed with his own hand, that James was resolved to conclude at any rate, he thought, so fair an opportunity should not be missed to refore the Catholic Religion in England, which very probably might be accomplished by means of this match. So Philip suddenly altering his mind, appeared as eager to conclude, as he had seemed unwilling before (1). From that time, that is, from the end of the year 1622, the Marriage was resolved at the Court of Madrid. The business was only to extort from the King such terms as should lead to what was intended. All the King of Spain's proceedings, from the time I am speaking of, evidently show, that he was inclined to the Marriage, in case he could obtain what he promised himself for the advancement of the Roman Religion in England, and which James's impatience gave him room to expect. But it is no less certain, that before this, he was entirely averse to it. This manifestly appears in King Philip the Fourth's letter to the Condé d'Olivarez, and from that Minister's answer. The letters were as follows:

Nov. 5. 1622.

"THE King my Father declared at his death, That his intent was never to marry my Sister, the Infanta Donna Maria with the Prince of Wales, which your Uncle Don Baltazar understood, and so treated this match ever with intention to delay it; notwithstanding, it is now so far advanced, that considering all the averness of the Infanta unto it, it is time to take some means to divert the Treaty, which I would have you find out, and I will make it good whatsoever it be. But in all other things, procure the satisfaction of the King of Great Britain, (who hath deserved much) and it shall content me, so it be not in the match."

The Condé d'Olivarez, in his answer agreed, That the late King never intended to conclude this marriage, but only to amuse the King of England, by reason of the situation of affairs in the Palatinate and Netherlands. He said moreover, the Infanta was determined to retire to a Convent, as soon as she should be pressed upon that head.

After that, he represented to his Majesty, "That the King of England found himself equally engaged in two businesses at that time, namely, the marriage, and the restitution of the Palatinate. Supposing then, added the Condé, that the marriage be made, we must come to the other affair, and then your Majesty will find yourself engaged with the King of England in a war against the Emperor, and the Catholick League: A thing, which to hear, will offend your ears; or if you declare your self for the Emperor, then you will find your self engaged in a war against the King of England, and your Sister married with his Son. If your Majesty should show your self neutral, what a great scandal will it be, for Spain to stand neuter, in a business wherein Religion is so much concerned?

"On the other hand, said the Condé, supposing we could satisfy the King of England, by having the Palatinate restored to his Son-in-law, yet we must consider whether it is in our power to have it restored; since the Duke of Bavaria is possessed of all those dominions, and the Emperor, who hath promised to transfer to him the Upper Palatinate, with the Electoral dignity, is now in the Diet, where that translation is to be made. Besides, the Emperor hath given us to understand, how difficult it will be to wrest the Palatinate out of the Duke of Bavaria's hands, since it appears by the memorial, which was yesterday presented to your Majesty by the Emperor's Ambassador, that the Duke of Bavaria alone can maintain more troops, than all the rest of the allies joined together.

Upon these difficulties, the Condé proposed in the same Letter, "to set on foot two other marriages, namely, between the Emperor's eldest Daughter, and the Prince of Wales, and between the Prince Palatine's Son, and the Emperor's second Daughter; by which means the business (says he) may be accommodated, and afterwards, I would reduce the Prince Elector to the obedience of the Church, by breeding his Sons in the Emperor's Court with Catholick Doctrine."

If it be considered, that the King of Spain's Letter is dated the 5th of November, and that probably the answer was made within a few days, it will be easy to perceive, that till then the Spaniard never intended to conclude the marriage. But presently after, as I have observed, he came to another resolution.

The late alteration in the projects of the Spanish Court, 1623. procured the Earl of Bristol a Letter from Philip IV, to the Infanta Isabella, to desire her to raise the siege of Frankendal, and renew at London the conferences for a Truce, which were broken off at Brussels. This request was a real order which the Infanta obeyed, and the negotiation of the Truce was begun at London, where it ended the 27th of March 1623 (2). The sole point was to hinder, by means of this Truce, Frankendal, the only place in the Palatinate where was an English Garrison, from falling into the Emperor's hands. But on the other side, the Emperor had reason to fear, if James remained master of this place, he would make use of it to carry war into the Palatinate, and the more, as he had sometimes threatened to have recourse in the end to arms. To adjust the different interests of the Emperor and the King, this rare expedient was devised. Frankendal was to be delivered to the Infanta Isabella, and a Truce made for fifteen or eighteen months, after which, the Infanta was to restore the place to the English. But withal, the Elector was to break his alliance with the Prince of Brunswick and Count Mansfeld.

This Treaty gives no great idea of the capacity of King James and his Council. Not only was Frankendal delivered to the Infanta, as if she had been a third person entirely disinterested, though she had shown the contrary in this very Treaty; but the Elector was also deprived of all hopes of re-entering his Country. Moreover, the Emperor and Duke of Bavaria were at liberty either to dismiss their troops, or to assist the King of Spain in the Low-Countries, since there was no farther danger of a war in the Palatinate. But what advantage accrued to James by this Treaty? Indeed, he hindered the Emperor from taking Frankendal, but at the same time, the place was delivered to Spain. On the other hand, the Truce, which would have been for his advantage, had he kept Frankendal, turned to his prejudice, since it deprived him of the power to carry the war into the Palatinate, in favour of his Son-in-law. It is true, upon supposition of the Infanta's sincerity, he was to have the place again when the Truce was expired: but this was a very doubtful supposition, since the Infanta was entirely guided by the directions of the Courts of Vienna and Madrid.

not going to the Diet of Ratisbon, invested the Duke of Bavaria with the Electoral dignity and the Upper Palatinate, notwithstanding the opposition of several Princes who were possessed of hereditary Dominions, and to whom such a piece of land was a just occasion of fear. Such was the effect of King James's three years negotiations, in favour of his Son-in-law, who was at length strip of his dominions and dignities (1). But the Spanish match was to recover all. We must see now the success of that tedious negotiation, the only remarkable event of the year 1623.

The only obstacle of the marriage, were the articles concerning Religion. The Earl of Bristol had been disputing the point, ever since his arrival in Spain, and Philip IV. was not displeased with it, because it gave him an opportunity to gain time. In August 1622, the Spaniards demanded certain Articles in favour of the English Catholics, to which the Ambassador only answered, He would acquaint the King his master therewith. At the same time, the Pope put his Possils or Notes to the Articles that were agreed on. Hence, it is easy to perceive, that the Courts of Rome and Spain acted in concert, both tending to the same end. The King received, about the same time, the Pope's Possils, and the Court of Madrid's demands in favour of the Catholics. He kept these last, out of ceremony, some months, without giving an answer, but at length signed all the 5th of January 1623, and having made the prince sign them also, sent the same Articles to the Earl of Bristol, who received them the 25th of the same month. I believe the full and entire resolution of the Spanish Court to conclude the marriage, may be fixed to this time. From the year 1616, to November 1622, the Spaniards's sole intent was to amuse King James. From thence, to the 25th of January 1623, he seems to have resolved upon the marriage, provided certain advantages could be obtained for the Roman Religion. In fine, after the Articles, signed by the King and Prince, had secured him what he desired, his resolution was fixed. These three epochs are to be carefully observed and distinguished, for want of which, most Historians are very obscure in their recital of this affair.

The Spaniards being satisfied with the Articles sent from England, which were much more advantageous to the Catholics than those agreed upon with the Earl of Bristol, demanded time to send them to Rome, and obtain the Pope's dispensation. It was thought, the dispensation might come in March or April at farthest, and it was agreed, the nuptials should be solemnized four days (2) after his arrival: that the Infanta should set out within twenty days after the celebration of the marriage, and whilst the dispensation was expected, the other Articles which were called temporal, to distinguish them from those concerning Religion, should be settled. Pursuant to this agreement, the Earl of Bristol and Sir Walter Aston jointly with the Spanish Ministers prepared these Articles by the beginning of March, to the mutual satisfaction of both Parties. The 22d of March, the Conde d'Olivera and Gondemar came to the English Ambassadors, and showed them a writing with the King of Spain's hand to it, whereby he approved of the Temporal Articles, and ordered them to finish the affair. These Articles concerned only the portion and dowry, without any mention of the Palatinate. Besides that he had commanded the Earl of Bristol, in his instructions not to make the restitution of the Palatinate one of the marriage-articles, this command was repeated in the King's letter to him of the 30th of December 1622, that is, two or three months before. Moreover, at this very time, the truce and sequestration of Frankendal were negotiating at London.

The affair of the marriage being in this situation, and very probably, near a conclusion, the end of April was to be expected with patience, to see whether any new difficulty would occur, for thus far every thing seemed to be settled to the King's satisfaction. But the face of this affair was suddenly changed by a very odd and most extraordinary adventure. The Marquis of Buckingham persuaded the Prince of Wales, to go to Spain and fetch home his Mistress the Infanta herself. He told him, "the more uncommon such a gallantry was among Princes, the more it would redound to his honour: "The Infanta herself would be charmed with it: His presence would immediately put an end to all formalities, and remove whatever difficulties might yet occur: "

As after the marriage, there was an affair of moment to be negotiated, namely, the restitution of the Palatinate, an Intercessor like him, would do no more in three days than Ambassadors could do in as many months." In a word, he so artfully represented this project, that the Prince, transported with the thoughts of so noble an adventure, never rested till he had accomplished it. The difficulty was to obtain the King's consent (3). The Prince asked it before Buckingham, and expressed to earnest a desire to make the Journey, that the King granted his request without much hesitation, and put off till next day to consider of means to effect it. But after he had more seriously reflected on this affair, his mind was quite changed on the morrow, when the Prince and Buckingham came to him. He represented to them, how fruitless such a Journey would be in the present situation of the marriage-affair, and the inconveniences it might be attended with. But instead of answering his reasons, Buckingham rudely told him, he had given his word, and if he broke it, would be never more credited (4). The Reader may see in the Lord Clarendon's History this conversation at large, which ended with the King's permission, extorted by the Prince and Buckingham, for this strange, rash, and very dangerous journey. It was resolved, that Buckingham should accompany the Prince, with two more only, namely, Sir Francis Cottington, who had been the King's Agent in Spain, and came from thence in September, and Endymion Porter Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to the Prince, who had been bred at Madrid: That they should go post through France, and the secret be kept, that they might be at a distance before their departure was known. This resolution being taken, the Prince and Buckingham desired only two days to prepare.

The motives of this journey are variously related, according to the interest and prejudices of the several Writers. Some say, the Court of England still doubting the Spanish Court's sincerity, thought proper, the Prince and Buckingham should be satisfied with their own eyes in order to know what could be depended upon. But supposing this doubt, was it not extremely imprudent to put the King's only Son into the hands of a Prince, whose sincerity was believed to be justly suspected? The King, Prince, and Favorite, must have been all three void of understanding, to be guilty of such an Error. This therefore seems to be altogether improbable.

The Lord Clarendon says, Buckingham, out of envy that the Earl of Bristol should have the sole management of so great an affair, had a mind to have the glory of ending it. But he might have thought of it sooner, since every thing was now concluded in Spain, at or about the time of the Prince's departure for Madrid. So the Marquis could not acquire much honour. Besides, the event showed, this was not his motive, since instead of promoting, he was the sole cause of the unexpected difficulties, and final breach, of the Marriage.

Others pretend, Buckingham's aim was insensibly to induce the Prince to change his Religion, by exposing him to all the temptations which of course he would meet at the Court of Madrid. Of this he was afterwards accused before the Parliament, by the Earl of Bristol, who said, the project was formed several months before the Prince's departure, between Buckingham and Gondemar, by means of Endymion Porter, who had been sent to Spain for that purpose. But the proofs on which the Earl of Bristol grounded his accusation, were but presumptions at most, and as he was a professed enemy to the Marquis of Buckingham, I do not know whether his testimony may be relied on.

But whatever were the Favorite's real motives with respect to this journey, it can hardly be denied, that it was a sign of great levity in the Prince, and of no less weakness and imprudence in the King. The affair of the Marriage was in such a situation, that it was entirely needless to solicit a-fresh the Court of Spain with whom every thing was agreed. Two months patience would have shewn the King, whether he could rely on them, without exposing his only Son and heir apparent to so imminent danger, by suffering him to execute a Romantic project, which could procure no advantage. But the King's condescension for the Prince and Buckingham prevailed a-

(1) Thus by King James's amazing negligence, was the Protestant Religion entirely rooted out of Bohemia, the Electoral Dignity transferred from the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Liberty of Germany overthrow. And all this chiefly through Gondemar's artful management, who wrote in one of his Letters to the Duke of Bavaria, "I wish I had killed King James to fast asleep, as he hoped neither the Cries of his Daughter, nor her Children, nor the repeated remonstrances of his Subjects in their behalf should be able to awaken him." Walsingham, p. 27, 28.

(2) The King's letter to him of the 30th of December 1622, and in another written five days after. See Ruffworth, Tom. I. p. 281, 290.

(3) Which was very much hindered in a meeting difficulties, and raising objections, and very low in mattering them. Clarendon, Tom. I. p. 14. Full.

(4) The King's conversation with Sirha and Tears not to pursue their resolution. But Buckingham told his Majesty, "That no body could believe any thing of me, when he reflected the Promise he had so solemnly made; that he plainly showed, it proceeded from another breach of his word, (for he had promised to accompany me) in communicating with some Rascal, who had turned him into a Jesuit. He had alleged, and he had said that, was the first time that I knew who his Counselor had been." Clarendon, Tom. I. p. 14.

bove all these considerations. They set out post the 17th of February (1), and came to Paris, where they ventured to appear at Court, and be present at a ball, where, though disguised, they were in some danger of being discovered. However, they arrived safely at Madrid the 7th of March, and alighted at the Earl of Bristol's, who was not a little surprised to see the Prince (2). I shall not stay to describe the magnificent reception of the Prince by the Court of Spain, when he made himself known. I shall only say, he met with all the respect due to his birth, and all possible caresses to testify the satisfaction at his gallantry to the Infanta, and his candour in confiding in the King's generosity. The only thing in which great ceremony was used, was his not being permitted to visit the Infanta in private. The Spanish way did not admit of such a familiarity, and the more because the dispensation not being yet come, he could not in strictness be considered as the Infanta's future spouse.

No sooner was the Prince arrived in Spain, but all the Spaniards thought he was come to change his Religion before he espoused the Infanta, no one imagining there could be any other motive of his journey. Nay, Count Gondemar very seriously desired the Earl of Bristol, not to oppose so pious a design, and if the Earl is to be credited, the Count intimated to him, that the Marquis of Buckingham was not against it (3). The Earl of Bristol perceiving, if the Court of Spain had any such hopes, it would be apt to retard the Marriage, spoke of it to the Prince, and conjured him to impart the secret to him, if there was really any thing in it. But the Prince firmly denied it, and expostulated with the Ambassador for having so ill an opinion of him (4). Whereupon the Earl of Bristol intreated him, neither to do nor say any thing whatever that might feed the hopes of the Spanish Court in that respect, for fear of obstructing the Marriage. Nevertheless he was attacked several times, one while by Excellencies, who took all occasions to dispute with him about Religion, another while by Courtiers, who represented to him how powerful England would grow, if he would return to the obedience of the Pope. He even received a long Letter from Gregory XV., exhorting him to come into the bosom of the Church, and imitate his glorious ancestors, who had done so great things for the defence of Religion. The Prince answered this Letter the 20th of June. But because the two printed copies of this answer are very different, it will not be amiss to insert them both.

Prince Charles to Pope Gregory XV.

Most Holy Father,

I Received the dispatch from your Holiness with great content; and with that respect which the piety and care wherewith your Holiness writes doth require. It was an unpeakable pleasure to me to read the generous exploits of the Kings my predecessors, to whose memory posterity hath not given those praises and eulogies of honour that were due to them. I do believe that your Holiness hath set their example before my eyes, to the end that I might imitate them in all my actions; for in truth they have often exposed their estates and lives for the exaltation of the Holy Chair. And the courage with which they have assaulted the enemies of the cross of Jesus Christ, hath not been less than the care and thought which I have, to the end that the peace and intelligence, which hath hitherto been wanting in Christendom, might be bound with a bond of true concord: For like as the common enemy of peace watcheth always to put hatred and dissension between Christian Princes, so I believe that the glory of God requires that we should endeavour to unite them. And I do not esteem it a greater honour to be defended from great Princes, than to imitate them in the zeal of their piety: In which it helps me very much to have known the mind and will of our thrice honoured Lord and Father, and the holy intentions of his Catholic Majesty, to give a happy concurrence to so laudable a design: for it grieves him extremely to see the great evil that grows from the division of Christian Princes, which the wisdom of your Holiness foresaw, when it judged the marriage, which you pleased to design between the Infanta of Spain and myself, to be necessary to procure so great a good: for 'tis very certain, that I shall never be so extremely affectionate to any thing in the world, as to endeavour alliance with a Prince that hath the same apprehensions of the true Religion with myself. Therefore I entreat your Holiness to believe, that I have been always far from encouraging novelties, or to be a partizan of any faction against the Catholic, Apostolick, Roman Religion: But on the contrary, I have sought all occasions to take away the suspicion that might rest upon me; and that I will employ myself for the time to come to have but one Religion, and one Faith, seeing that we all believe in one Jesus Christ: Having resolved in myself to spare nothing that I may have in the world, and to suffer all manner of discomforts, even to the hazarding of my estate and life, for a thing so pleasing unto God. It rests only, that I thank your Holiness for the permission which you have been pleased to afford me, and that I may pray God to give you a blessed health here, and his glory, after so much travel which your Holiness takes within his Church.

Madrid, June

CHARLES STUART.

The other Copy of the same Letter, is as follows.

Prince Charles to Pope Gregory XV.

Most Holy Father,

WE have received your Letter, with no less thankfulness and respect than is due to the singular good will and godly affection wherewith we know it was written. It was most acceptable unto us, that the never-enough renowned examples of our ancestors were propoed to us by your Holiness for our inspection and imitation; who though they often hazarded their lives and fortunes to propagate the Christian Faith, yet did they never more cheerfully display the banners of the cross of Christ against his most bitter enemies, than we will endeavour to the utmost, that the peace and union which so long triumphed, may be reduced into the Christian world, after a kind of elimination or exile. For since the malice of the father of discords hath sowed such unhappy divisions amongst those who profess the Christian Religion, we account this most necessary, thereby to promote with better success the glory of God, and Christ our Saviour, nor shall we esteem it less honour to tread in their footsteps, and to have been their rivals and imitators in holy undertakings, than to have been defended of them. And we are very much encouraged to this as well by the known inclination of our Lord and father, and his ardent desire to lend a helping hand to so pious a work, as by the anguish that gnaws his royal breast, when he considers what cruel destructions, what deplorable calamities arise out of the dissensions of Christian Princes. Your Holiness's conjecture of our desire to contract an alliance and marriage with a Catholic Family and Princess, is agreeable both to your wisdom and charity; for we would never desire so vehemently to be joined in a strict and indissoluble bond with any mortal whatsoever, whose Religion we hated. Therefore your Holiness may be assured, that we are, and always will be of that moderation, as to abstain from such actions, which may testify our hatred against the Roman Catholic Religion; we will rather embrace all occasions whereby through a gentle and fair procedure, all sinister suspicions may be taken away; that as we all confess one individual Trinity, and one Christ crucified, we may unanimously grow up into one Faith. Which that we may compass, we little value all labour and watchings, yea, the very hazard of our lives. It remains that we render thanks to your Holiness for your Letter, which we esteem as a singular present, and wish your Holiness all prosperity and eternal happiness.

Dated at Madrid, 20 Junij 1623.

(1) They went privately, on February 17, from the Court, which was then at Newmarket, to Newball in Essex, a House of Buckingham's, purchased by him from Robert Earl of Suffolk; and from thence the next day to Groving, and so to Dover; attended only by Sir Richard Graham, Master of the Horse to the King, &c. W. H. p. 70. Hac. p. 112.

(2) The Prince and Marquis of Buckingham put on false Beards, to cover their smooth Faces, and travelled under the borrowed names of Jack and Tom Smith. The Mayor of Dover stopped them, thinking they were going to France to fight, so that Buckingham was forced to discover himself; pretending he was going to visit the Fleet, as Admiral. The same day they embarked, they landed at Boulogne, and from thence rode post to Paris. At Paris, they both wore large bushy Periwigs that shadowed their Faces. Here the Prince saw, at a masking Dance, the Princess Urraca Maria, whom he afterwards married. W. H. p. 75. They narrowly escaped being seized in France. See Rapin, Tom. I. p. 75. W. H. p. 144.

(3) The Count d'Olivares, speaking to the Prince about this, in his first visit, the Prince replied, That he came not thither for Religion, but for a Wife. Rapin, Tom. I. p. 78.

(4) He seemed to be much displeased, that any should have so unworthy an Opinion of him, as to think he would, for a Wife or any other earthly respect whatsoever, so much as waver in his Religion. Ibid. p. 291.

It must be observed of these two Letters, which are very different, that as they did not appear till after the Civil Wars, it is equally probable that one of the Parties qualified, whilst the other aggravated, the expressions. And therefore 'tis needless to make any reflection upon them.

Mean while, since the Prince's arrival in Spain, the state of the marriage-treaty was somewhat altered. The dispensation arrived about six weeks after, that is, about the beginning of May. But the Pope had annexed certain conditions, without which it was to be of no force. Very probably, had not the Prince been in Spain, the dispensation would have come sooner, and without any restriction: but it is not very surprising, that the Pope, knowing the Prince was in Spain, should desire to make an advantage of that imprudence. He sent therefore the dispensation, but it was to be delivered only on these terms, That the Infanta should have a Church in London: That the Children by this marriage should be left to their mother's care till they were ten years old: That the nurses should be Catholics, and appointed by the mother: That the King of England should give security for the performance of the Articles agreed upon concerning Religion.

The article relating to the education of the Children had been debated in November, and the Pope and King of Spain had insisted that the Children should be educated by their mother till marriageable. The King at first offered seven years, and the Courts of Rome and Spain came to twelve. Then the King allowed nine, and the Pope ten. At last, the Earl of Bristol received the King's orders, not to dispute for a year more or less.

After the Prince and Marquis of Buckingham came to Madrid, they managed the affair of the marriage exclusive of the Earl of Bristol. There was some debate upon the articles annexed to the Pope's dispensation. The Prince of Wales said, he had no power to make the least addition to the articles signed by the King his Father, and the Spanish Ministers maintained, his Catholic Majesty could not reject the conditions on which the Pope had granted the dispensation: That it lay in the Pope's breast to grant his favors on what terms he pleased, and that the dispensation was void without these conditions. In short, it was thought proper to consult the King of England by letter, and to ask withal, what security he would give for the performance of the articles. James made no scruple concerning the time of the education of the children, or about the nurses, because these things were now settled. As to the security, he replied, he could give no other than his own, and the Prince's Royal Words and Oaths, confirmed by his Council of State, and exemplified under the Great Seal of England. All this not satisfying the Pope's Nuncio, who pretended to have particular orders upon that point, the King of Spain offered to become security himself: but it was first to be determined by a Committee of Ecclesiasticks, that Philip might lawfully swear for the King of England. Some believe this to be a [Spanish] device, to make the King of Spain Guarantee of the articles granted to the Catholics. This difficulty being removed, the Prince sent Cottington to England with the articles concerning Religion, newly drawn according to the Pope's intentions, and with some other secret articles which were not to be published so soon.

It must be remarked, that hitherto there was no other writing concerning the Infanta's dowry, than a rough draught, approved indeed by the King of Spain in a fore-mentioned Letter directed to his Ministers, but which remained in the hands of Olivarez. Much less had there been any care taken about the restitution of the Palatinate, James being unwilling to make this one of the marriage-articles, for fear it should be in recompence of the two millions promised him for the Infanta's dowry. But he was very willing to receive the Palatinate from the King of Spain's bounty, when the marriage should be consummated. This at least was his project, and, no doubt, at the time the Court of Spain sought only to amuse him, he was made to expect the restitution of the Palatinate, though without any written engagement. Mean while, James depended upon this verbal promise, as if it had been a Treaty signed with the Spaniard's own hand (1).

Cottington being come to England with the Articles both publick and private, it was rumoured, that the Pope and King of Spain demanded a Toleration for the English Papists. The King himself occasioned this rumour, by a letter to Cottington. Whether it would be convenient to grant such a toleration? Whereupon, Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, who had withdrawn to his own house ever since the fatal accident of killing the Park-keeper, and came no more to the Council, thought it his duty to write the following Letter to the King.

May it please your Majesty,

"I Have been too long silent, and I am afraid by my silence I have neglected the duty of the place it hath pleased God to call me unto, and your Majesty to place me in: But I now humbly crave leave I may discharge my conscience towards God, and my duty to your Majesty; and therefore I beseech you freely to give me leave to deliver my self, and then let your Majesty do with me what you please. Your Majesty hath propounded a toleration of Religion, I beseech you take it into your consideration what your act is, what the consequence may be. By your act you labour to set up the most damnable and heretical doctrine of the Church of Rome, the whore of Babylon: How hateful it will be to God, and grievous to your good Subjects, the professors of the Gospel, That your Majesty who hath often disputed, and learnedly written against those heresies, should now shew yourself a patron of those wicked doctrines, which your pen hath told the World, and your conscience tells you fell, are superstitious, idolatrous, and detestable. And hereunto I add what you have done in sending the Prince into Spain without consent of your Council, the privy and approbation of your people: And although you have a charge and interest in the Prince, as Son of your flesh; yet have the people a greater, as Son of the Kingdom, upon whom next after your Majesty are their eyes fixed, and welfare depends; and so tenderly is his going apprehended, as (believe it) however his return may be safe, yet the drawers of him into this action, so dangerous to himself, so desperate to the Kingdom, will not pass away unquestioned, unpunished. Besides, this toleration which you endeavour to set up by your Proclamation, cannot be done without a Parliament, unless your Majesty will let your Subjects see that you will take unto your self ability to throw down the laws of your land at your pleasure. What dread consequence these things may draw afterwards, I beseech your Majesty to consider; and above all, left by this toleration and discountenancing of the true profession of the Gospel, wherewith God hath blessed us, and this Kingdom hath so long flourished under, your Majesty do not draw upon this Kingdom in general, and your self in particular, God's heavy wrath and indignation.

"Thus in discharge of my duty towards God, to your Majesty, and the place of my calling, I have taken humble leave to deliver my conscience. Now, Sir, do what you please with me."

It may be seen by this Letter, it was not without reason that the Archbishop passed for a Puritan, at least, according to the notions of the Court, where all were considered as Puritans, who refused to ascribe to the King an unlimited power. Wherefore his Councils were not regarded.

The King did not long detain Cottington in England. As it was not now time to dispute, and he was required to sign the Articles as brought by Cottington, without any alterations, he chose to do it rather than hazard a breach of the marriage, when the Prince his Son was in the hands of the Spaniard. He signed them therefore, and solemnly swore to them. As these Articles were new drawn, explained, and increased to twenty-three, besides four secret Articles, the Reader, perhaps, will be glad to view them here in their new form, and see withal how far the King carried his compliance.

I. That the marriage be made by dispensation of the Pope, but that to be procured by the endeavour of the King of Spain.

II. That the marriage be once only celebrated in Spain, and ratified in England, in form following: In the morning, after the most gracious Infanta hath ended her devotions in the Chapel, she, and the most excellent Prince Charles, shall meet in the King's Chapel, or in some other room of the Palace, where it shall seem most expedient; and there shall be read all the Procurations, by virtue whereof the marriage was celebrated in Spain; and as well the most excellent Prince, as the most excellent Infanta, shall ratify the said marriage celebrated in Spain, with all solemnity necessary for such an act: So as no ceremony, or other thing intervene, which shall be contrary to the Roman Catholic Apostolick Religion.

III. That the most gracious Infanta shall take with her such Servants and Family as are convenient for her service; which Family, and all persons for her belonging, shall be chosen and nominated by the Catholic King: so as he nominate no Servant which is vassal to the King of Great Britain, without his will and consent.

King James's Instructions to the Earl of Bristol, and the Earl's Defence, in Reply

IV. That

1623. IV. That as well the most gracious Infanta, as all her Servants and Family, shall have free use and publick exercise of the Roman Catholick Religion, in manner and form as is beneath capitulated.

V. That she shall have an Oratory and decent Chapel in her Palace, where, at the pleasure of the most gracious Infanta, Masses may be celebrated; and in like manner, she shall have in London, or wheresoever she shall make her abode, a publick and capacious Church near her Palace, wherein all duties may be solemnly celebrated, and all other things necessary for the publick preaching of God's word, the celebration and administration of all the Sacraments of the Catholick Roman Church, and for burial of the dead, and baptizing of children. That the said Oratory, Chapel, and Church, shall be adorned with such decency, as shall seem convenient to the most gracious Infanta.

VI. That the men-servants and maid-servants of the most gracious Infanta, and their Servants, Children, and Descendants, and all their Families, of what sort soever, serving her Highness, may be freely and publickly Catholicks.

VII. That the most gracious Infanta, her Servants and Family, may live as Catholicks in form following: That the most gracious Infanta shall have in her Palace, her Oratory and Chapel so spacious, that her said Servants and Family may enter and stay therein; in which there shall be an ordinary and publick door for them, and another inward door, by which the Infanta may have a passage into the said Chapel, where she and others, as aforesaid, may be present at divine offices.

VIII. That the Chapel, Church and Oratory, may be beautified with decent ornaments of Altars, and other things necessary for divine service, which is to be celebrated in them, according to the custom of the Holy Roman Church; and that it shall be lawful for the said Servants and others, to go to the said Chapel and Church at all hours, as to them shall seem expedient.

IX. That the care and custody of the said Chapel and Church, shall be committed to such as the Lady Infanta shall appoint, to whom it shall be lawful to appoint keepers, that no body may enter into them to do any undecent thing.

X. That to the administration of the Sacraments, and to serve in Chapel and Church aforesaid, there shall be four and twenty Priests and assistants, who shall serve weekly or monthly, as to the Infanta shall seem fit; and the election of them shall belong to the Lady Infanta, and the Catholick King, provided that they be none of the Vassals of the King of Great-Britain; and if they be, his will and consent is to be first obtained.

XI. That there be one superior Minister or Bishop, with necessary authority upon all occasions which shall happen belonging to Religion; and for want of a Bishop, that his Vicar may have his authority and jurisdiction.

XII. That this Bishop or superior Minister may correct and chastise all Roman Catholics who shall offend, and shall exercise upon them all jurisdiction Ecclesiastical: And moreover also, the Lady Infanta shall have power to put them out of her service, whensoever it shall seem expedient to her.

XIII. That it may be lawful for the Lady Infanta and her Servants to procure from Rome dispensations, indulgences, jubilees, and all graces, as shall seem fit to their Religion and Consciences, and to get and make use of any manner of Catholick Books whatsoever.

XIV. That the servants and family of the Lady Infanta, who shall come into England, shall take the Oath of allegiance to the King of Great Britain: Provided, That there be no clause therein which shall be contrary to their consciences, and the Roman Catholick Religion; and if they happen to be vassals to the King of Great Britain, they shall take the same oath that the Spaniards do.

XV. That the Laws which are or shall be in England against Religion, shall not take hold of the said Servants; and only the foresaid superior ecclesiastical Catholick may proceed against ecclesiastical persons, as hath been accustomed by Catholicks: And if any secular Judge shall apprehend any ecclesiastical person for any offence, he shall forthwith cause him to be delivered to the aforesaid superior Ecclesiastick who shall proceed against him according to the Canon Law.

XVI. That the Laws made against Catholicks in England, or in any other Kingdom of the King of Great Britain, shall not extend to the children of this marriage; and though they be Catholicks, they shall not lose the right of Succession to the Kingdom and Dominions of Great Britain.

XVII. That the Nurses which shall give suck to the children of the Lady Infanta, (whether they be of the Kingdom of Great Britain, or of any other Nation whatsoever) shall be chosen by the Lady Infanta, as she pleaseth, and shall be accounted of her family, and enjoy the privileges thereof.

XVIII. That the Bishop, ecclesiastical and religious persons of the family of the Lady Infanta, shall wear the vestments and habit of their Dignity, Profession, and Religion, after the custom of Rome.

XIX. For security that the said matrimony be not dissolved for any cause whatsoever, the King and Prince are equally to pass the word and honour of a King; and moreover, that they will perform whatsoever shall be propounded by the Catholick King for further confirmation, if it may be done decently and fitly.

XX. That the Sons and Daughters which shall be born of this marriage, shall be brought up in the company of the most excellent Infanta, at the least, until the age of ten years, and shall freely enjoy the right of Succession to the Kingdoms, as aforesaid.

XXI. That whensoever any place of either man-servant or maid-servant, which the Lady Infanta shall bring with her, (nominated by the Catholick King her Brother) shall happen to be void, whether by death, or by other cause or accident, all the said servants of her family are to be supplied by the Catholick King, as aforesaid.

XXII. For security that whatsoever is capitulated may be fulfilled, the King of Great Britain and Prince Charles are to be bound by oath; and all the King's Council shall confirm the said Treaty under their hands: Moreover, the said King and Prince are to give their faiths in the word of a King, to endeavour, if possible, that whatsoever is capitulated may be established by Parliament.

XXIII. That conformable to this Treaty, all these things proposed, are to be allowed and approved of by the Pope, that he may give an apostolical benediction, and a dispensation necessary to effect the marriage.

The King ratified these Articles in the usual form, and swore to observe them, before the two Spanish Ambassadors and twenty (1) Privy-Counsellors, who also signed the Treaty. When the King came to take the Oath, he had some dispute with the Ambassadors. His Majesty would not give the Pope the title of Holy Father, or His Holiness, saying, he had writ against this Title, and it was unreasonable to make him retract. But the Ambassadors insisting upon it, the King yielded at last, not thinking he ought, for such a trifle, to retard a Treaty, which had now been seven years on foot.

After publicly taking this Oath, he withdrew into his closet, where, in presence of the same Ambassadors, and some Privy-Counsellors, he ratified and swore to these four secret Articles.

I. That particular Laws made against Roman Catholics, under which other vassals of our Realms are not comprehended, and to whose observation all generally are not obliged; as likewise general Laws, under which all are equally comprized, if so be they are such which are repugnant to the Romish Religion, shall not at any time hereafter, by any means or chance whatsoever, directly or indirectly, be commanded to be put in execution against the said Roman Catholics; and we will cause that our Council shall take the same Oath, as far as it pertains to them, and belongs to the execution, which by the hands of them and their Ministers, is to be exercised.

II. That no other Laws shall hereafter be made anew against the said Roman Catholics, but that there shall be a perpetual toleration of the Roman Catholick Religion, within private houses throughout all our Realms and Dominions, which we will have to be understood as well of our Kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, as in England; which shall be granted to them in manner and form, as is capitulated, decreed, and granted in the article of the Treaty concerning the marriage.

III. That neither by us nor any other interposed person whatsoever, directly or indirectly, privately or publicly, will we treat (or attempt) any thing with the most renowned Lady Infanta Donna Maria, which shall be repugnant to the Romish Catholick Religion; neither will we by any means persuade her, that she should ever renounce or relinquish the same in substance or form, or that she should do any thing repugnant or contrary to those things which are contained in the Treaty of matrimony.

IV. That we and the Prince of Wales will interpose our authority, and will do as much as in us shall lie, that the Parliament shall approve, confirm, and ratify all and singular Articles in favour of the Roman Catholics, capitulated between the most renowned Kings by reason of this marriage: And that the said Parliament shall revoke and abrogate particular Laws made against the said Roman Catholics, to whose observance also the rest of our subjects

(1) There are but nineteen named in Wotton, p. 769.

1623. and vassals are not obliged: as likewise the general Laws under which all are equally comprehended, to wit, as to the Roman Catholicism, if they be such as is aforesaid, which are repugnant to the Roman Catholic Religion: And that hereafter, we will not consent that the said Parliament should ever, at any time, enact or write any other new Laws against the Roman Catholics (1).

These are the four Articles which served for foundation to the Pope's dispensation: for, as the Congregation de propaganda said, "The other Articles are only to secure the Infanta's Religion: but there must be something more for the Catholics in general, before the dispensation can be granted." Nelson and others pretend, these four secret Articles are fictitious, groundless, and even improbable. But, besides that they follow very naturally from what was demanded by the Congregation de propaganda, and are manifestly alluded to in the Archbishop's Letter to the King, we shall see presently a Paper which leaves no room to doubt, that the King had engaged to perform the contents of the four Articles.

It is pretended, all these Articles, as well publick as private, signed by the King and Privy-Council, with the Great Seal annexed, being brought to Spain, the Prince of Wales made the following additions. But I confess, I do not find so strong proofs of these additions, as of the foregoing Articles. This depends upon the degree of credit, which the Reader is to give the first publishers.

"Moreover, I Charles Prince of Wales engage my self, (and promise, that the most illustrious King of Great Britain, my most honoured Lord and Father, shall do the same both by word and writing.) That all those things which are contained in the foregoing Articles, and concern as well the suspension as the abrogation of all Laws made against the Roman Catholics, shall within three years infallibly take effect, and sooner, if it be possible, which we will have to lie upon our conscience and royal honour: That I will intercede with the most illustrious King of Great Britain my Father, that the ten years of the education of the children which shall be born of this marriage, with the most illustrious Lady Infanta their mother, accorded in the 23d Art. (which term the Pope of Rome desires to have prolonged to twelve years) may be lengthened to the said term: And I promise freely and of my own accord, and swear, That if it so happen, that the entire power of disposing of this matter be devolved to me, I will also grant and approve the said term. Furthermore, I Prince of Wales oblige my self, upon my faith to the Catholic King, That as often as the most illustrious Lady Infanta shall require, that I should give ear to Divines or others, whom her Highness shall be pleased to employ in matter of the Roman Catholic Religion, I will hearken to them willingly without all difficulty, and laying aside all excuse. And for further caution in point of the free exercise of the Catholic Religion, and the suspension of the Law above-named, I Charles Prince of Wales, promise and take upon me in the word of a King, that the things above promised and treated concerning those matters, shall take effect, and be put in execution, as well in the Kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland, as of England."

This is what occasioned the Prince's and Buckingham's journey to Spain, a journey not only needless, but even pernicious, as may easily be seen by all the additions made to the Articles settled by the Earl of Bristol. The King was so glad he had finished the affair of the marriage, that he defied all the devils in hell to break it (2). As a grateful acknowledgment for his Favorite's great services, he sent him a Patent creating him Duke of Buckingham. There was no other Duke at that time in England (3).

The King's compliance in every thing he had signed and ratified was so great, that the Spaniards could hardly believe it sincere. Some who knew the English Constitution, maintained, it was not in the King's power to perform his promises, or in case he attempted it, a Rebellion would infallibly follow. Wherefore the King of Spain appointed a committee to take this matter into consideration. The result of the debate was, that it was not proper to send the Infanta to England before the next spring, that in this interval the performance of the Articles granted to the Catholics, and their effects might be assured. Upon this the Spanish Ambassadors in England had orders to desire the King to begin to execute his engagements in favour of the Catholics. This demand embarrassed him. What he had promised was secret, and not to be performed till after the marriage, and he was pressed to make it publick by the execution, whilst the Prince was still in Spain. This was a sort of menace that the marriage should not be solemnized, before he had given publick marks of his sincerity. He knew a Prince's interest was not to be sacrificed to a secret; might be attended with ill consequences; that these consequences might break off the marriage, and the Prince's Son would be in danger of being detained in Spain. To free himself from this perplexity, he resolved to give the Ambassadors some satisfaction, by putting into their hands a Declaration of his Council, containing his intention concerning this affair. In all appearance, the Ambassadors were prevailed with to consent, that the performance of it should be deferred, by reason of the accidents that might follow. The Declaration was thus:

Salisbury, Aug. 7. 1623.

A DECLARATION touching the Pardons, Suspensions, and Dispensations of the Roman Catholics.

"FOR the satisfaction of their Excellencies, the Marquis Infespa and Don Carlos de Coloma, the Lords Ambassadors for the King of Spain; and to the end it may appear that his Majesty of Great Britain will presently and really put in execution the grace promised, and intended to the Roman Catholics his Majesty's Subjects, and of his own grace more than he is tied to by the Articles of Treaty of Marriage (4). We do declare in his Majesty's name, that his Majesty's will and pleasure is, that a legal and authentic Pardon shall be passed under the Great-Seal, wherein shall be freely pardoned all those penalties, forfeitures, and seizures, indictments, convictions and incumbrances whatsoever, whereunto the Roman Catholics are liable, or have been proceeded against, or might be, as well Priests, as others, for matters of Conscience only, and to which the rest of his Majesty's Subjects are not liable. And to the end his Majesty may make himself clearly understood, where it shall happen that any of those forfeitures and pecuniary mules have been given away under his Majesty's Great-Seal; his Majesty will not hide that it is not in his power so to make void those Letters-Patents, except they be voidable by Law; and then his Majesty is well pleased that all Roman Catholics may in those cases plead in Law, if they find it good, and shall have equal and legal trial. And his Majesty is likewise pleased, that his general Pardon shall remain in being five years, to the end all that may in that time take it out; and his Majesty will give order for the comfort of the poorer sort, that the Pardon shall not be costly, but such like course shall be taken as was in a like occasion at his Majesty's coming into England; and that it shall be lawful to put as many as can be possible into one Pardon."

"And we do farther declare, that his Majesty's will and pleasure is, to the end the Roman Catholics, his Majesty's subjects, may have a present and a free fruition of as much as is intended them by the articles of Treaty of marriage, to cause a present Suspension under his Majesty's seal of all those penal laws, charges, and forfeitures, whereunto the Roman Catholic Subjects of his Majesty have heretofore been subject, and to which the rest of his Majesty's Subjects have not been liable; and in the same grant, and under the same seal, to give a dispensation and toleration to all the Roman Catholics his Majesty's Subjects, as well Priests, as temporal persons and others, of and from all the penalties, forfeitures, troubles, and incumbrances, which they have been or may be subject to, by reason of any statute or law whatsoever, to the observation whereof the rest of his Majesty's Subjects are not bound. We do likewise declare, that his Majesty hath promised his royal word, that the execution shall be no ways burthenfome or penal to the Roman Catholics, but that for the manner of privileging and freeing them from that, he must confer with Bishops and Advocates, into which he will presently enter and expedite by all means.

"And we do further declare; That his Majesty's intention, is, presently to pursue his former directions (which had been before executed if their excellencies had so thought good) to put under his seal severally the said pardon, and suspension, and dispensation; and that his Majesty's Attorney, and learned Council shall have referred to them the charge to pen them with all those effectual words, clauses, expressions, and reservations, which may presently give fruition to the Roman Catholics his Majesty's Subjects, and make them inviolable in the fruition of all that is intended and promised by his Majesty in the Articles of marriage, and his Majesty's further grace.

"And we do declare, That his Majesty's further will and pleasure is, for the better satisfaction and discharge of the care and endeavour of their excellencies the Ambassadors, that it shall be lawful to them to assign a discreet person to entertain such sufficient Lawyers as shall be thought fit to take care to the strength, validity, and security of the said grants: And his Majesty's Attorney shall have charge to receive and admit the said Lawyers to the sight and judgment of the said draughts, and in any doubts to give them satisfaction, or to use such legal, necessary and pertinent words and phrases, as he the said Lawyer shall propound for the security of the Roman Catholics, and sure making of the said grants.

"And we do further declare, That his Majesty's pleasure is, to make a dispatch into Ireland unto his Deputy there, by the hands of the Lord Treasurer and Secretary of State Sir George Calvert, for the present confirming and sealing the things concerning the Roman Catholics, answerable to the articles of Treaty, his royal promise and proceedings here: And for Scotland, that his Majesty according to the constitution of his affairs there, and regard to the publick good, and peace of that Kingdom, and as soon as possible, will do all that shall be convenient for the accomplishment of his promise in grace and favour of the Roman Catholics his Subjects, conformable to the articles of treaty of marriage."

This Declaration, signed by Secretary Conway and some Privy-Councillors, who were most trusted by the King, was very probably sent to Spain as a pledge of the King's intention to perform his engagements. There it was that the Earl of Bristol found means to have either the original itself, or a copy, which he produced before the Parliament in 1626, to show what the Duke of Buckingham had negotiated in Spain without his privy. It is manifest, first, That this declaration supposes the secret Articles; secondly, That the Earl of Bristol would not have ventured to produce it before the Parliament, had he not been able to prove it no forgery (1).

Whilst these things passed in England, news came to Madrid of Pope Gregory XV's death, which was a fresh obstacle to the conclusion of the marriage. When Cottington arrived from England with the ratification of the articles, the Nuncio refused to deliver the dispensation, affirming, as the marriage was not yet celebrated, the dead Pope's dispensation was of no force, and therefore it was necessary to stay till there was a new Pope, who might grant a valid dispensation. By this accident the Prince of Wales saw himself detained in Spain till the election of a new Pope. The 29th of August however was appointed for the celebration of the marriage, in a supposition, that before that time there would be a Pope and a new dispensation.

Mean while, the restitution of the Palatinate was not talked of, or if mentioned, it was only by way of conversation, without any positive demand on the King of Spain, or his Ministers. I have already shown the reason. As to the temporal articles, they were in the same state as when the Prince came to Madrid, and nothing signed on either side; so that if the dispensation arrived before the 29th of August, the marriage must have been either deferred, or solemnized before these articles were settled.

But the Court of Spain was intent upon a project of greater consequence, namely, to endeavour to persuade the Prince of Wales to turn Catholic; and what is not very strange, they should hope to succeed, after what had passed. Besides, if we may believe the Earl of Bristol in the impeachment he brought before the Parliament against Buckingham, that Duke gave the Spaniards too much reason to expect this pretended conversion. And to this alone is to be ascribed the delay of the dispensation. Urban VIII, who was chosen the 6th of August would not have failed to send it, had he not waited for this happy event, which he strove to advance by his Letters to the Prince and Duke of Buckingham. This occasioned at last the breach of the marriage, after having been so long deferred.

I have very carefully searched after the real cause of this breach, but could never meet with any thing satisfactory. All agree, it was the Duke of Buckingham that first inspired the Prince, and afterwards the King with the thought, but it is difficult to guess his motive, and what caused him to break his first measures, and pursue a contrary course, so obscurely is this point explained by the Historians. Some say, the Duke rendered himself contemptible and odious to the Court of Spain, by affecting to follow the French fashions in almost every thing opposite to the Spanish: That for this reason, foreseeing the Infanta and the Spaniards would have great power at the Court of England, he thought they might in the end do him some ill-turn, and therefore resolved to break off the match. Others say, Olivarez, Favorite of Philip IV, reminding the Duke of his promise that the Prince should turn Catholic, the Duke gave him the lye to his face, and from that time sought means to retire from the Spanish Court, for fear of the Comde's revenge. Some say, the Queen of Bohemia, perceiving there was no likelihood of recovering the Palatinate by this marriage, and having much more reason to expect great advantages from a rupture between England and Spain, sent a truly messenger (2) to the Duke, with certain offers, in case he would procure a breach. This is not improbable, and the Hollanders, to whom the union between Spain and England must have been prejudicial, might well be concerned in the project. In fine, the Duke of Buckingham's greatest Favourers pretend, the Duke having founded the King of Spain's intentions concerning the restitution of the Palatinate, found there was nothing to be expected, and therefore resolved to break off a marriage, which was intended for no other purpose. It is certain at least, the King, Prince, and Duke made use of this pretence to justify the breach.

However this be, the Duke of Buckingham having taken this resolution, soon prevailed with the Prince to agree to it, over whom he had now a very great ascendancy. There were two difficulties to be surmounted in the execution of this design. The first was to obtain the King's consent. The second, to get the Prince out of Spain. The Duke must have been fully persuaded of his power over the King, to hope to incline him at once to desert from a design, he had so constantly pursued for seven years, at the very time all was concluded, and nothing wanting but the nuptial ceremonies. He despaired not however of succeeding, and therefore sent him word, he had at last discovered the King of Spain's insincerity: That not only, he had no inclination to cause the Palatinate to be restored, but also was far from having the least thought of accomplishing the marriage, and the Prince was in danger of being detained in Spain all his life. To support what the Duke said, the Prince himself writ to the King his Father, telling him, He must now look upon his Sister and her Children, never thinking more of him, and forgetting he ever had such a Son. The King fell, or rather, threw himself into this snare, without the least reflection, and immediately writ to Buckingham, to bring away the Prince by all means. At the same time, he sent some Ships to St. Andro in Biscay to take them on board.

The first difficulty being overcome, means were to be devised to quit Spain, and not give the Court any suspicion, which could not be done without wounding the Prince's honour and conscience. Happily for them, Urban VIII had not yet sent the dispensation, nor even fixed any time for it. So Buckingham notified to his Catholic Majesty the order he had received to bring back the Prince to England, his return being absolutely necessary to remove the Nation's jealousy of his so-long stay in Spain. Adding, his departure would cause no considerable alteration, since he would leave a proxy in the hands of any person, his Majesty should please to appoint, to espouse the Infanta in his name, as soon as the dispensation should come. The King of Spain was a little surprized at the Prince's design. However, as he did not desire the Infanta his Sister should go before Spring, he imagined, that after the Es-pousals, it would be more easy to detain her, than if the Prince of Wales was actually in Spain, and there-

(1) In pursuance of this Declaration, there was a general Pardon drawn in as full and ample a manner as the Papists themselves could desire. And several Commissions were issued out, one to all Judges, Justices of Peace, &c. and the other to all Bishops, Chancellors, and other Ministers, not to give any Stay Statute against Recusants. But to this some 8 p was put, by the advice of the Lord Keeper Williams. See Rushworth, Tem. 1. p. 181. Conway, p. 297. The B. p. Conway came into England to exercise his Jurisdiction over the Catholics of that Kingdom, and a Chapel began to build at St. James's for the Infanta. Annals, p. 81.

1623. fore, he very readily consented to the Prince's departure (1).

The only point therefore was to be assured of the celebration of the marriage, and the King himself desired to be the Prince's Proxy, jointly with Prince Edward of Portugal. The Proxy was drawn by the King's Secretary, and the Prince of Wales signing it in the presence of several witnesses, left it in the hands of the Earl of Bristol, with orders to deliver it to the King of Spain, ten days after the dispensation should be received. This done, the Duke of Buckingham departed first, under colour of preparing for the Prince's reception on board the English fleet at St. Andero. The Court saw him depart without any concern, or rather with a satisfaction equal to his impatience to be in a place of security. After his departure all imaginable honours were paid to the Prince. The King himself conducted him to the Escorial (2), where he received and feasted him as a Prince that was to be very shortly his Brother-in-law. I shall not give a particular account of all the civilities that were shown him. It will suffice to say, that on the very day of his departure, he solemnly swore again to the articles of the marriage, and then left the Proxy with the Earl of Bristol, of which one of the Secretaries of State made an authentic act, which was signed by several witnesses.

The Prince went away, loaded with honours, cares, presents, and attended by several Lords of the Court, who waited upon him to the fleet (3). He was no sooner come there, but he dispatched to the Earl of Bristol Mr. Edward Clarke, one of Buckingham's creatures, with positive orders not to deliver the Proxy till security was given him that the Infanta, after the espousals, would not betake herself to a Cloister, and to send him word before the delivery of the Proxy what security was offered, that he might be judge himself, whether it was proper to accept it. This was the first artifice used by the Prince to gain time, in the fear that the dispensation would come, and the marriage be solemnized before the King his Father was determined to break it. The Earl of Bristol not yet perceiving the Intent of the order he had received, was afraid if he should stay to the last, it might be an obstacle to the consummation of the marriage. He thought proper therefore to take care before the dispensation should arrive, to know what security the Court of Spain would give concerning the Prince's scruple. He received as satisfactory an answer as he could wish, which he conveyed to the King and Prince by a Letter.

The Prince and Duke arrived on the 5th of October at Portsmouth, and from thence posted to Royston, where the King was. It seems they durst not immediately discover their design to the King about the breach of the marriage, but thought fit to take some precautions, to render it less strange to him. What makes me think this, is that the Earl of Bristol's Letter coming soon after, the King writ to him the 8th of October, that he was satisfied with the security offered by the Court of Spain. The Prince, who probably had not yet prepared all his batteries, concealing his design, writ likewise to the Earl of Bristol the following letter, which no doubt was to be seen by the King his Father.

Your Letter to the King and me, concerning that doubt I made after I came from St. Laurence, hath so satisfied us both, that we think it fit no longer to stick upon it, but leave it to your discretion to take what security you shall think fitting.

The Prince however was in danger of the dispensation's arriving at Madrid, before the Earl of Bristol should have received a positive order not to deliver the Proxy, since in that case, he would have been forced to execute what was enjoined him by the Prince himself when he left Escorial. But this risk was to be run, there being avoiding it, before the King was determined to a breach. It is true, himself and the Duke had now begun to fill King with doubts concerning the reformation of the Palatine. Wherefore the King in his Letter of the 8th of October, writ to the Earl of Bristol, that he hoped to receive before Christmas the agreeable news both of his Son's marriage, and Son-in-law's reformation (4). Though this was not an express order to demand the Palatine before the espousals, the Earl of Bristol thought proper however to take some care of an affair, so much neglected during the Prince's stay in Spain, and even since it was there, articles were settled. He mentioned it therefore to Orsini, and made him engage, the Proxy should not be demanded, till a written promise was put into his hands that the Palatine should be restored. Of this he informed the King in a Letter of the 13th of November. He showed him, he hoped by Christmas, he should see the Prince his Son, and the Prince's his Daughter, upon his marriage, the other upon the reformation.

It must be observed, the Prince of Wales, before he left Spain, had used an artifice to gain time, knowing he could not break off the marriage without the King's consent. He had caused it to be inserted in the Proxy, that it should remain in force only till Christmas. He hoped the dispensation would not arrive before that time, or if it came but a few days before, the Proxy would be useless. And indeed, as the Earl of Bristol was not to deliver it till ten days after the arrival of the dispensation at Madrid, if the tenth day was after Christmas-Day, the Proxy would be of no force, by virtue of the inserted clause. But this precaution was not sufficient, because the dispensation might happen to be at Madrid above ten days before Christmas. This obliged the Prince and Duke at length to discover their minds to the King. Whether James yielded to their reasons, or, out of an excessive condescension for his Son and Favorite, would not grieve them by a denial, he writ to the Earl of Bristol the 13th of November expressly ordering him not to deliver the Proxy till after Christmas: that is, when it was no longer valid. Moreover, he enjoined him not to discover this order to the Court of Spain till the very last. This Letter was sent to the Earl by three (5) several messengers, two by land, and one by sea, for fear of accidents. It came in a critical time, for the dispensation arrived at Madrid the beginning of December, new Style (6), and the King's Letter the 13th of November old Style. Upon the receipt of the dispensation, Philip immediately ordered all the necessary preparations for the espousals to be made (7). But when the ten days were expired, and the marriage was expected to be solemnized, the Earl of Bristol notified to him the King his Master's orders, not to deliver the Proxy till after Christmas. He easily perceived the King of England's intention, since the Proxy would then be invalid. That very day he sent to the Earl of Bristol to demand no more audience, and gave command that the Infanta should be no longer called the Princess of Wales, as she had been ever since the arrival of the dispensation, and caused all preparations for the marriage to cease. Mean while, to cast all the blame on the King of England, he sent the Earl of Bristol on the 8th of January 1624, a written promise, signed with his own hand, whereby he engaged to cause the Palatine to be restored to the Elector Palatine. This the Earl of Bristol, in the following Reign, affirmed before the Parliament in his defence.

There is scarce an English Historian but what assures, the want of this reformation was the cause of the breach

(1) It has by some been wondered at, that the King of Spain should be so willing to let the Prince go, when it was in his power to have kept him as long as he pleased, and make what advantage of it he had a mind to. But this point is cleared by the remark with which Spanheimus sums up what relates to the Spanish Affairs, That never Prince was more obliged to a Sister, than King Charles the First was to the Queen of Bohemia; since it was only the Conversation of her and her Children, who were taken the next Years after him to the Crown of England, that prevailed with the Court of Spain to permit him to re-visit England again. Wicford, p. 28. There is to this purpose a pleasant Jest in Coke's Reign of King James I. His Majesty, a little after the Prince's departure for Spain, being in one of his pensive Moods, Araby his Butcher comes in, and tells him, he must change Cops with him: Why? says the King, Why, who (replies Araby) sent the Prince into Spain? But what (answered the King,) wilt thou say if the Prince comes back again? Why then, (said Araby) I will take my Cop from thy Head, and send it to the King of Spain; which 'tis said troubled the King here. But 'tis a Church's Mystery, and a case to do any thing that should help the Elector Palatine or his Heirs to the Crown of England. Coke, p. 137.

(2) The Escorial lies about eighteen Miles from Madrid. 'Tis reckoned one of the most magnificent Structures in Europe. The Spaniards call it the eighth wonder of the world. This mighty Fabric was built by Philip II. in the form of a Grindstone, (the Emblem and Infratament of St. Lawrence's Martyrdom, to whom it is dedicated) the handle whereof, is the King's Palace, and the square of the Grindstone is divided into twelve spacious Quadrangles, in which are arched Cloisters, one above, the other below, all dedicated to religious Orders, who live like Princes rather than Friars, with each his Man and his Mule. In the middle of the square stands a magnificent Cathedral, to which Philip IV. added a Chapel for the Sepulchre of such Kings and Queens as leave issue behind them, who lie in curious Coffins of black Marble, which are placed in Arches round the Marble Wall. The Chapel is built in form of the Pantheon. See Wilfon, p. 775.

(3) The Prince departed from Madrid, September 9. and came to St. Andero the 11th. The Fleet, (sent to convey him over to England, and which consisted of eight Men of War and two Pinaces, whereof Edward Earl of Roiland was Admiral) sailed from St. Andero the 18th, and put into the Scilly Roads the 20th. Relat. of the Prince's Journey, p. 7.—46. Rymer's Fæd. Tom. 37. p. 435.

(4) King James commanded the Earl of Bristol, to procure instantly from the King of Spain, a punction answer; and, before he delivered the Powers, or moved the Contract, to obtain from that King, either by a publick Act, or by an answer under his private Seal, a direct engagement for the reformation of the Palatine, and the Electoral Dignity. See Rymer's Fæd. Tom. 1. p. 106, 107.

(5) Wilfon says four, Mr. Killigrew, Crisp, Wood, and Dennis, p. 79.

(6) In a Letter from Sir Walter Aston to the Duke of Buckingham, it is said, That the Dispensation came to Madrid, November 12. Cobala, p. 3.

(7) The King of Spain had sent into England, Don Mendoza de Alarcana, to congratulate the Prince's Life return, and from thence he had Instructions to go and make known to all Princes and Potentates, Allies to Spain, how near the Marriage was. When the Dispensation came, Embassies were made throughout all Spain, the 19th of December was set for the Wedding-day. Presents were provided for our King and Prince, the Infanta's Family, and the beginning of March appointed for her coming over into England, &c. Wilfon, p. 600.

1623. of the marriage, and that the Earl of Bristol having demanded it of his Catholic Majesty, as a condition without which the marriage could not be accomplished, Philip coldly answered, The Palatinate was none of his to give, and the Emperor might be applied to. But this is directly contrary to the Earl of Bristol's own account, who doubtless knew more of this affair than any other. The Earl of Clarendon took care not to speak like the rest. He contents himself with ascribing the breach to some secret design of Buckingham.

Thus ended the affair of the Spanish marriage, which had wholly employed King James for seven years. During all that time, he most earnestly solicited the conclusion of it, and, to succeed, scrupled not to sacrifice the interests of his Son-in-law, his own reputation, the religion he professed, the good of his people, and the laws of his realm. But when, at last, it was just going to be concluded, he suddenly broke it off, for reasons which were never yet clearly known. It can only be ascribed to his weakness for his favorite. The Earl of Clarendon says positively, the King was compelled to it by the Duke of Buckingham, "who, in breaking the marriage, refused the same impetuosity, he had indulged to himself in the debate of the journey into Spain." He adds, "the King plainly found the Prince and Duke were resolved upon a breach, with or without his approbation, and that he never forgave the Duke what he had done, but retained as sharp a memory of it as his nature could contain." It is to be presumed, the Earl of Clarendon was well acquainted with this affair, and the more, as he is not the only Writer that intimates, the King had neither the power nor the courage to withstand the Prince and Duke, who were strictly united, since their journey to Spain (1).

Mean time, for fear the Earl of Bristol should by some means renew a Treaty broken with so little reason, they caused him to be recalled. The King consented the more readily to his return, as he saw no person in his Court able to give him good counsels, to free himself from slavery he was under, but the Earl of Bristol, who never yielded to Buckingham's haughtiness. This had drawn upon him the favorite's enmity to such a degree, that ever after he was continually exposed to his persecutions, and the Prince's indignation, who following Buckingham's suggestions, forgot nothing to ruin him, even when he had mounted the Throne, though without being able to succeed.

Since the return of the Prince and Duke, the King no longer ruled, all his affairs were managed by them, and he only executed their counsels. The King saw about him none he could trust. All his Officers, all his Courtiers, were the Duke's creatures, and the more attached to him, as they saw him strictly united with the Prince. In this situation, the King saw no other remedy, than to surrender himself entirely to them, and do whatever they pleased, whether he feared an increase of their boldness by resistance, or waited for some favorable opportunity to throw off their yoke. Not only the breach of the marriage had been resolved between them, but also a war with Spain, and the King durst not contradict them, notwithstanding his aversion to arms. Their first project, was to demand for this war a Benevolence of every Subject: nay, they made the King sign an order to levy it. Baker says in his Chronicle, he himself paid fifty pounds on this occasion. But on a sudden, the King, by advice of the Prince and Buckingham, gave over this project, and resolved to call a Parliament. That was indeed the most proper way to justify the breach of the Treaty with Spain, and to procure money, which he wanted extremely.

There was not one good Englishman but what had ever considered the Spanish match as very prejudicial to the Kingdom. It was known in general, that the King, in favour of this marriage, had made large concessions with respect to Religion, though the particulars, and especially the secret articles, were known to very few. But the King's condescension to the Roman Catholics, was a plain indication, the Court of Spain had greatly prevailed with him. The Duke of Buckingham not being ignorant of the people's aversion to the marriage, the breach whereof was not yet well known, doubted not to gain their affection, by causing a Parliament to be called, and declaring himself the author of this happy breach, so passionately desired by all true Englishmen. To compass his ends, he rendered himself popular, and affected to care for both the Church and State-Puritans: Nay, he consulted with [Dr John Prynne] head of the Puritan Party, how the King might seize the Dean and Chapter Lands. Nothing could be more proper to procure him the love of the people, most of the Clergy having rendered themselves odious, by their zeal in maintaining the Prerogative Royal (2). So, the juncture being very favorable, the Duke caused the King to call a Parliament, notwithstanding his resolution never to summon another: Nay, such was his power over the King, that he made him speak to the Parliament in a manner the most repugnant to his opinions and principles.

Mean while, the Prince and Duke had contrived another project, namely, the Prince's marriage with Henrietta Maria, the King of France's Sister, to which his Majesty readily consented. He was so proud of his grandeur, that he could not think of marrying his Son to any but a Princess of royal extraction, and the third Daughter of Henry IV. was the only Princess then in Europe of that character. It is very probable, the person sent by the Queen of Bohemia to Buckingham in Spain, made him the first overture of this match, and that the Duke thereupon resolved to break the marriage, the Prince was going to consummate with the Infanta. However this be, the King approving the project, Henry Rich Baron of Kensington, was, on some pretence, sent to France, in order to found the Court concerning this marriage; and before his departure, he was created Earl of Holland. I shall speak presently of the success of this negotiation; but must first see what passed in the Parliament which met the 19th of February (3). The King made a Speech to both Houses so different from those to the two former Parliaments, that such opposite expressions could hardly be thought to come from the mouth of the same Prince, if it was not known how great an ascendant Buckingham had over him, and how necessary it was to the favorite's designs, that the King should talk in this manner. As the Speech is not so long as the others, the Reader perhaps will be glad to see it.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Have assembled you at this time, to impart to you a secret, and matter of as great importance, as can be to my state, and the state of my children; wherein I crave your best and safest advice and counsel, according as the Writ whereby you were assembled, imports, That the King would advise with you in matters concerning his estate and dignity. And as I have ever endeavoured, by this and the like ways, to procure and cherish the love of my people towards me, so I do hope, and my hope is exceeded by faith; for I fully now believe, that never any King was more beloved of his people; whom as you, my Lords and Gentlemen, do here represent, so would I have you truly to represent all their loves to me; that in you, as in a true mirror or glass, I may perfectly behold it, and not as in a false glass that represents it not at all, or otherwise than it is indeed. Give me your free and faithful counsels in the matter I propose, of which you have often heard, the match of my Son: wherein, as you may know, I have spent much time with great cost in long Treaties, desiring always therein (and not without reason hoping to have effected my desires) the advancement of my State and Children, and the general Peace of Christendom, wherein I have always constantly laboured, depending upon fair hopes and promises. At the earnest instance of my Son, I was contented (although it was of an extraordinary nature) to send him to prosecute his desires in Spain; and for his more safety, sent Buckingham (in whom I ever reposed most trust of my person) with him, with this command, continually to be present with him, and never to leave him, till he had returned again safely unto me. Which he performed, though not with that effect in

(1) In February this year, a cruel scene was acted at Ambona in the East-Indies, of which this account is given. A Treaty was concluded in 1619, between England and the United-Provinces, whereby, among other things, it was agreed, That in regard of the great blood shed and cost, pretended to be bestowed by the Hollanders, in winning the Trade of the Isles of the Moluccas, Banda, and Ambona, from the Spaniards and Portuguese, the Hollanders should enjoy two thirds of that Trade, and the English the other third. (See Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 17. p. 170, &c.) In pursuance of this Agreement, English Factories were placed at the Moluccas, and at Banda, and Ambona. This last Isle is the principal Place in the East-Indies, where Nutmegs, Mace, Cinnamon, Cloves, and Spice grow. Here the English had been settled but about two years, when the Dutch, in order to deprive them of their share of the Spice-Trade, pretended a Plot was formed between the English and the Natives, to get possession of the Dutch Fort at Ambona. Whereupon the English were tortured by the Dutch, both with Fire and Water, in a most cruel and barbarous manner. And, on February 27, Captain Gabriel Temesin, and nine other English, with nine Japanese, and one Portuguese, were ignominiously executed for this pretended Conspiracy, though they protested their Innocency to the last. For this insolent Affront, no reparation was obtained, till the year 1624, when Cromwell made the Dutch pay 300,000 l. upon that account. See Relation of the Proceedings against the English at Ambona, printed in 1624, 2nd Cole, p. 141.

(2) The Duke of Buckingham proposed also the selling the remainder of the Crown-Lands, but this Project was strenuously opposed by the Lord-Keeper Williams, and accordingly laid aside. Hacker, p. 202.

(3) The Parliament it seems was to meet the 23rd of February, but the King, that Morning missing Lodowick Stewart Duke of Richmond, (created 15 May 17, in the 22nd of James I.) and sending in haste for him, his Dutches goes to his Bed-side to wake him, and drawing the Curtain, found him dead in his bed. Upon News whereof the King would not adorn himself that day, and put off the Parliament till the 16th, and afterwards till the 19th. His Body was interred in Henry VII's Chapel, and leaving no Issue, his Estate and Honours descended to his Brother Esme Stuart. Howe, p. 1035. Dugdale's Barons, Vol. II. p. 420. Will.

1624. "the business that I expected, yet not altogether without profit; for it taught me this point of wisdom, Qui veratur in generalibus, is easily deceived, and that Generality brings nothing to good issue; but that before any matter can be fully finished, it must be brought to particulars: For, when, as I thought, the affair had been, before their going, produced to a narrow point, relying upon their general propositions, I found, when they came there, the matter proved to be so raw, as if it had never been treated off; the generals giving them easy way to invade, and affording them means to avoid the effecting of any thing (1).

"The particulars that passed in the Treaty, I mean not now to discover to you, the time being too short; I refer you to Charles and Buckingham, and the Secretaries reports, who shall relate unto you all the particulars. And after that, Super totam materiam, I desire your best assistance to advise me what is best and fittest for me to do, for the good of the Commonwealth, and the advancement of Religion, and the good of my Son, and my Grandchildren of the Palatinate. And of our estate, I know you cannot but be sensible, considering that your welfare conflicts in ours, and you shall be sure to have your share in what misery shall befall us: And therefore I need to urge no other argument to you in this behalf, in offering me your wisest and surest counsel and furtherance. And I assure you in the faith of a Christian King, that it is res integra, presented unto you, and that I stand not bound, nor either way engaged, but remain free to follow what shall be best advised.

"To plant is not sufficient, unless like good gardeners, you pluck up the weeds that will choke your labours: And the greatest weeds among you are jealousies, root them out. For my actions, I dare avow them before God; but jealousies are of a strange depth. I am the husband, and you the wife, and it is subject to the wife to be jealous of her husband: Let this be far from you. I can truly say, and will avouch it before the seat of God and Angels, that never King governed with a purer, sincerer, and more uncorrupt heart, than I have done, far from all will and meaning of the least error or imperfection of my Reign.

"It hath been talked of my remissness in maintenance of Religion, and suspicion of a Toleration: But as God shall judge me, I never thought nor meant, nor ever in word expressed any thing that favoured it (2). It is true, that at times, for reasons best known to my self, I did not so fully put those Laws in execution, but did wink and connive at some things, which might have hindered more weighty affairs; but I never in all my Treaties ever agreed to any thing to the overthrow and disagreeing of those Laws, but had in all a chief preservation of that truth which I have ever professed: And as in that respect I have a charitable conceit of you, I would have you have the like of me also, in which I did not transgress: For it is a good horseman's part, not always to use his spurs, and keep strait the reins, but sometime to use the spurs, and suffer the reins more remis; so it is the part of a wife King, and my age and experience in Government hath informed me, sometime to quicken the Laws with freight executions, and at other times, upon just occasions, to be more remis. And I would also remove from your thoughts all jealousies, that I might or ever did question or infringe any of your lawful Liberties or Privileges; but I protest before God, I ever intended you should enjoy the fulness of all those that former times give good warrant and testimony of, which, if need be, I will enlarge and amplify.

"Therefore I would have you, as I have in this place heretofore told you, as St. Paul did Timothy, avoid genealogies and curious questions, and nice quorks and jerks of Law, and idle innovations; and if you minister me no just occasion, I never yet was, nor ever shall be curious or captious to quarrel with you: But I desire you to avoid all doubts and hindrances, and to compose your selves speedily and quietly to this weighty affair I have proposed; for that I have found already, delays have proved dangerous, and have bred distraction of this business; and I would not have you by other occasions to neglect or protract it. God is my judge, I speak it as a Christian King, never any way fearing man, that was in the deserts of Arabia, and in danger of death for want of water to quench his thirst, more desired water, than I thirst and desire the good and comfortable success of this Parliament, and blessing of your Councils, that

"the good issue of this may expiate and acquit the trustless issue of the former. And I pray God, your counsels may advance Religion, and the publick weal, and the good of me and my children."

This Speech like the rest made by the King to his Parliament, was liable to many censures which reflected on his sincerity. It could not be conceived that he really believed he was more beloved by his people than any of his Predecessors, since no King hath so frequently quarrelled with his Parliament, which surely is no proper way to gain the People's affection. Those who were acquainted with the state of affairs, thought it very strange, the King should tell the Parliament, that at the Prince's arrival in Spain, the affair was so raw as if it had been never treated off, since he had already signed the marriage articles, and as to the Palatinate, would not have it mentioned before the marriage was accomplished. The same persons could not forbear wondering, he should take God to witness, he never so much as thought or intended to grant a toleration to the Papists, since it was one of the secret articles of the marriage, and since without being informed of such an article, it was easy to perceive, Plimp gave his Sister to the Prince of Wales, solely with that view. In fine, some malicious persons observed, that when the King said, he never intended to invade the people's liberties, the simile might very justly be applied to him, which himself had used on another occasion, of the person who took a man's purse, assuring him he had no design to rob him.

A few days after the King had delivered his Speech, the two Houses resolving upon a conference, to examine the affair recommended by the King, the Prince and Buckingham came and informed them of all particulars. After the Prince had said a few words, the Duke of Buckingham began and made a long Speech, which he divided into six heads, under colour of more clearly explaining the affair, but in reality to confound it, and conceal the mutual coherence of the particulars he was to relate. Under the first head, he set forth the motives of the Prince's journey to Spain. In the second, he spoke of the Treaty of the marriage apart by itself. In the third, he joined together the two affairs of the marriage and Palatinate. In the fourth, he declared the reasons of the Prince's return. In the fifth, he informed the Parliament of his Majesty's subsequent proceedings in the affairs of the marriage and Palatinate since the Prince's return. In the sixth and last, he stated the question, wherein both Houses were to offer to his Majesty their advice and Council. Whilst he was speaking, he turned, at the end of every point, to the Prince, asking him whether what he was saying was not true, to which the Prince did not fail to answer, Yes, it is true, or to the like effect. The intent of this whole Speech was to show, the King had been unduly engaged in the treaty of the marriage, by the false hopes given him by the Earl of Bristol: That the Court of Spain never intended this marriage, much less the restitution of the Palatinate, tho' the Earl of Bristol assured the contrary: That the Prince had been ill used in Spain, and much pressed to turn Catholic: In a word, he intimated that the Earl of Bristol was only to blame, who had abused his Majesty's confidence.

Nothing is more easy than to accuse an absent person. It is only concealing what makes for him, giving an ill turn to his most innocent actions, aggravating the faults he may have committed, and loading him with crimes he is not guilty of. This is precisely what the Duke of Buckingham did in respect of the Earl of Bristol, with the Prince's approbation and aid (3). This is so true, that two years after, the Prince being in the throne, and having himself accused the Earl of high treason, the Earl in his defence to the Parliament, gave a quite different narrative of the Spanish negotiation from that of the Duke of Buckingham. He proved what he said by unexceptionable Papers, and defied the Duke to answer them. He not only affirmed, that the Duke's whole narration was false, but also impeached him in form, and gave in his impeachment to the House of Lords, which remained unanswered. This is sufficient to show the fallaciousness of the Duke of Buckingham's narrative. So, I think it needless to enlarge any more upon this subject.

The Duke of Buckingham's Speech was received however with applause, for several reasons. First, He had made a party in the two Houses. Secondly, He had prevented the consummation of the marriage in Spain, which was very grateful to the Nation and Parliament. In the third place, he had brought home the Prince, contrary to all expectation, and so removed the just fears of the

(1) All this can relate only to the Palatinate, for the Treaty of Marriage was really concluded before the Prince's Voyage to Spain. Rapin.
 (2) Archbishop's Letter to the King, and the Council's Declaration to the Spanish Ambassadors, do not mention any religious Articles, and yet expressly show the contrary. But the King had this hole to creep out at, that he considered what he had done, and what he intended to do for the Catholics, only as a S. person of the Resolutes, and not as a real Toleration. Rapin.

Englsh. Finally, the Duke of Buckingham's narrative being attested by the Prince himself, it could not be thought false. As the publick was not informed of the secret circumstances of the negotiation, it is no wonder the Parliament should believe what they were told by the King, Prince and Duke. But afterwards, when all was discovered, people were of another sentiment.

The Spanish Ambassador complains of the Duke.
p. 93.

The Spanish Ambassador being informed of what passed at the conference between the two Houses, demanded an audience of the King, and boldly complained, that the Duke had reflected on the King of Spain's honour (1). Adding, if a subject of his Master had spoken thus of the King of England, it would cost him his head. Probably, the Ambassador had been misinformed, since the Duke had not used any offensive expressions against the King of Spain. He had only insinuated, that Philip's intention was always to amuse the King and Prince. As the Duke of Buckingham was now the Parliament's Favorite, as well as the King's and Prince's, both Houses openly took his part, and presented an address to his Majesty, declaring, the Duke had said nothing which could give offence to the King of Spain, and thanked the Duke for his faithful relation attested by the Prince. The King was so pleased with this address, that he went and thanked the two Houses in a Speech, where he forgot not to proclaim the praises of his Favorite. He said, he could not doubt the truth of his narrative, because he made the same to himself at his return from Spain. But the King must have been wilfully blind not to see the falshood of the Duke's relation, or been strangely kept under by the Favorite, if he was made attested before the Parliament what he knew to be false.

1b. p. 127.

The Parliament was extremely pleased to see the King disposed to break the Spanish match, not knowing, or feigning not to know, it was really broken, by the affront put upon the King of Spain. But the King having affirmed, it was yet Res integra, the two Houses could not say otherwise. So forgetting all former occasions of discontent, and applying themselves wholly to the affair proposed by the King, they jointly presented an address to his Majesty, to advise him to discontinue the Treaty, begun with Spain, as well for the reformation of the Palatinate as for the marriage. They grounded their advice upon four principal reasons; the first was, that in the beginning of the Treaty, the Spaniards insisted only upon Liberty of Conscience to the Infanta and her Family, with the free exercise of their Religion. But that afterwards, taking advantage of the Prince's being in their power, they imported a general Toleration, contrary to the usage of other Catholic Princes in the like Treaties. That besides, the Popish Faction had increased to such a degree, during the negotiation, that there was no way to suppress them as long as the Treaty continued.

The Parliament complains of the Duke.
Rothworth.
T. I. p. 125.

The second reason was, that, during the Treaty, the Protestant Party in Germany was oppressed, and the Palatinate invaded: that the Spaniards had deluded the King, and offered indignity to the Prince, by importuning him to change his Religion, contrary to the law of hospitality and the Privilege of Princes.

The third was grounded upon the insincerity of the Spaniards, as well in the former overture of marriage for the late Prince Henry as in this; upon the scornful proposition made to the King, of the Prince's turning Catholic; and upon the deceit used in the Treaty of Brussels, the sole end whereof was to cause Heidelberg to be taken.

Lastly, The Parliament added as a fourth reason, the translation of the Electorate to the Duke of Bavaria; the King of Spain's letter to Conde Olivarez, with the Conde's answer, which plainly imported, that the Spaniards never intended to accomplish the marriage; the shift devised by a Junto of Divines, to send home the Prince without the Lady.

All these reasons were so many indirect reproaches to the King for suffering himself to be so long amused. But his Majesty, feigning not to perceive it, came to the Parliament, and made a Speech to show he could not break off the Treaties, without knowing how to maintain the war which would unavoidably follow, since the Palatinate was to be recovered by arms. He declared therefore, if they thought proper to engage in a war with Spain, he would readily consent, the supply to be granted should be managed by commissioners appointed by the Parliament. Moreover, he promised the two Houses, he would not make a Peace without their advice. He concluded with saying: I am so desirous to forget all rents in former Parliaments, that it shall not be my default, if I am not in love with Parliaments, and call them often, and desire to end my Life in that intercourse between me and my People, for the making of good Laws, reforming of such abuses as I cannot be well informed of but in Parliament, and maintaining the good Government of the Commonwealth.

How different is this Speech from those the King made to the former Parliaments! But the King's thoughts are not so visible in these expressions as the Duke of Buckingham's policy, who, after breaking the Prince's marriage, had a mind to push his point, and proclaim war with Spain. To succeed, a Parliament must be called, and to gain their affection, the King must talk after this manner.

Some days after, the Commons presented an address to the King, offering to grant him three entire Subsidies, and three Fifteenths, upon his publick declaration for dissolving the Treaties of the marriage and the Palatinate. But they took him at his word, concerning his offer that the money should be disposed of by Commissioners of their own choosing. The King thanked them for their affectionate expressions, and told them, he was resolved for the future solely to confide in his Parliament. After which, he dispatched a messenger to the Court of Spain, with his last resolution to break off the Treaty. But upon notice that a [sharp] Petition against the Popish Recufants framed by the Commons, was going to be presented to him, he wrote the following Letter [with his own hand] to Secretary Conway.

I Doubt not but you have heard what a stinging Petition against the Papists the Lower-House have sent to the Higher-House this day, that they may jointly present it unto me. You know my firm resolution, not to make this a war of Religion; and seeing I would be loth to be Cony-catched by my People, I pray you stay the post that is going to Spain, till I meet with my Son, who will be here to-morrow morning: Do it upon pretext of some more Letters ye are to send by him; and if he should be gone, hasten after him to stay him upon some such pretext; and let none living know of this, as you love me. And before two in the afternoon to-morrow, you shall without fail hear from me. Farewel.

Probably, the King imagined, the Parliament in this Petition would have demanded things he had no intention to grant. And therefore, for fear of being forced to dissolve the Parliament, he would not hasten the rupture with Spain. But afterwards, being told the Petition (2) contained nothing of what he dreaded, he suffered the messenger to depart. As soon as the People knew the breach with Spain was resolved, the whole City of London shone with bonfires, which denoted the publick dislike of the Spanish match, and the danger to which Religion had been exposed. It was not yet known, that another and no less dangerous marriage was now treating in France.

The Petition, presented to his Majesty by both Houses, contained the seven following articles:

"I. That all Jesuits and Seminary Priests may be commanded forthwith to depart out of the Realm, and not to return or come hither again, upon peril of the severest penalty of the Laws now in force against them.

"II. That his Majesty would be pleased to give charge to the Justices of the Peace, that they take from all Popish Recufants all such armour, gun-powder and munition of any kind, as any of them have.

"III. That all Popish Recufants be commanded forthwith to retire themselves from or about London, to their several dwellings, or places by the Laws appointed, and there to remain confined within five miles of their dwelling-places: And for that purpose to discharge all by-past Licences granted unto them; and that they presume not any time thereafter to repair to London, or within ten miles of London, or to the King's Court, or to the Prince's Court wheresoever.

"IV. That his Majesty would forbid and restrain the great resort of his own Subjects, for the hearing of Mass, to the houses of foreign Ambassadors.

"V. That his Majesty would be pleased to discharge Popish Recufants from those places of trust, [as Lords, Lieutenants, Justices of Peace, &c.] by which they have that power in the Country where they live as is not fit to be put into the hands of persons so affected.

"VI. That his Majesty would be pleased generally to put the Laws in due execution against Popish Recufants; and that all his Judges, Justices, &c. may be commanded to do their Duty therein.

"VII. That seeing they were happily delivered from that danger which the Treaties with Spain would certainly have drawn upon England, his Majesty would be pleased to engage his royal word, that upon no occasion of marriage or treaty, or other request in that behalf from any foreign Prince or States whatsoever, he will

To which Petition his Majesty returned this answer

My Lords and Gentlemen of both Houses,

*The King's
Answer.
Rothworth,
T. I. p. 143.
Wilson.
Annals of

"I Cannot but commend your zeal in offering this Petition to me; yet on the other side, I cannot but hold my self unfortunate, that I should be thought to need a spur to do that which my conscience and duty binds me unto. What Religion I am of, my books do declare, my profession and behaviour doth shew; and I hope in God I shall never live to be thought otherwise; surely I shall never deserve it; and for my part, I wish it may be written in Marble, and remain to posterity as a mark upon me, when I shall fwear from my Religion; for he that doth dillembel with God, is not to be trusted with men.

"My Lords, for my part I protest before God, that my heart hath bled when I have heard of the encrease of Popery; God is my Judge, it hath been such a great grief to me, that it hath been as thorns in my eyes, and pricks in my sides; and so far have I been, and shall be from turning another way. And, my Lords and Gentlemen, you shall be my Confessors, that one way or other it hath been my desire to hinder the growth of Popery; and I could not be an honest man if I should have done otherwise. And this I may say further, that if I be not a Martyr, I am sure I am a Confessor; and in some sense I may be called a Martyr, as in the Scripture Isaac was persecuted by Ishmael by mocking words: for never King suffered more ill Tongues than I have done, and I am sure for no cause; yet I have been far from perfection; for I have ever thought that no way more encreased any Religion than perfection, according to that saying, Sanguis Martyrum est semen ecclesie.

"Now, my Lords and Gentlemen, for your Petition, I will not only grant the substance of what you crave, but add somewhat more of my own; for the two Treaties being already annulled, (as I have declared them to be) it necessarily follows of itself, that which you desire, and therefore it needs no more; but that I do declare by Proclamation, (which I am ready to do) that all Jesuits and Priests do depart by a day; but it cannot be as you desire by our Proclamation, to be out of all my dominions; for a Proclamation here extends but to this Kingdom.

"This I will do and more, I will command all my Judges when they go their circuits to keep the same courses, for putting all the Laws in execution against Recufants, as they were wont to do before these Treaties, for the Laws are still in force, and were never dispensed with by me: God is my judge, they were never so intended by me, but as I told you in the beginning of the Parliament, you must give me leave, as a good horsefman, sometimes to use the reins, and not always to use the spurs: So now there needs nothing but my Declaration for the disarming of them; that is ready done by the Laws, and shall be done as you desired: and more, I will take order for the shameful disorder of the resorting of my subjects to all foreign Ambassadors; for this I will advise with my Council how it may be best reformed. It is true, that the houses of Ambassadors are privileged places; and though they cannot take them out of their houses, yet the Lord Mayor, and Mr. Recorder of London, may take some of them as they come from thence, and make them examples: Another Point I will add concerning the education of their children, of which I have had a principal care, as the Lord of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Winchester, and other Lords of my Council can bear me witness, with whom I have advised about this business; for in good faith it is a shame, their children should be bred here as if they were at Rome. So I do grant not only your desire, but more, I am sorry I was not the first mover of it to you, but had you not done it, I would have done it myself.

"Now for the second part of your Petition, you have here given me the best advice in the world; for it is against the rule of wisdom, that a King should suffer any of his Subjects to transgress the Laws, by the intercession of other Princes; and therefore assure your selves, that (by the Grace of God) I will be careful that no such conditions be foisted in upon any other Treaty whatsoever; for it is fit my subjects should stand and fall to their own Laws."

What a happy harmony is here between the King and his Parliament! Nothing can be more affable, more obliging than this answer, and the free and easy manner wherewith he came into the measures of the two Houses. To render their happiness compleat, nothing was wanting, but the performance of the King's promises, which, how carefully he observed, will presently appear.

The King had artfully avoided to answer the two principal Articles of the Petition, namely, the IIId and Vth, where the Parliament required, that all Papists should be removed from London and the Court, and discharged from all places of trust. Had he consented to these two requests, the face of the Court would have been entirely changed. The Duke of Buckingham's mother, who, by her Son's means, disposed of all the Offices, must have been removed. His Duchesse would also have been of this number, as well as one of the Secretaries of State, with many others who had considerable places at Court, and in the Country (2). The King's silence on this head, caused the Parliament to draw a list of fifty seven popish Lords and Knights, who were in publick Offices, and present it to the King. But it does not appear that he took much notice of it. As it nearly concerned the Duke of Buckingham, very probably, he hindered the King from giving the Parliament any satisfaction in this point, and the Houses did not much insist upon it, that they might not too openly offend a Lord, whose credit was so great both with the King and Prince.

But though no Englishman dared to attack the favorite directly, a foreigner however undertook to ruin him in the King's favour, namely, the Marquis of Inniole the Spanish Ambassador, who being enraged at the unworthy manner of the Duke's breaking off the marriage, burned with desire to revenge the King his Master and the Infanta. One day, as the King had few about him, he took an opportunity to give him a Paper, with a wink to conceal it. The King put it into his pocket, and withdrew to his closet to read it. He was exceedingly surprized to see the following particulars.

"I. That he was kept from all faithful servants, that would inform him, by the Ministers of the Prince and Duke, and was a prisoner as much as King John of France in England, or King Francis at Madrid, and could not be spoken with, but before such as watched him.

"II. That there was a strong and violent machination in hand, which had turned the Prince, a most obedient Son, to a quite contrary course to his Majesty's intentions.

"III. That the Council began last summer at Madrid, but was lately resolved on in England, to refrain his Majesty from the exercise of the Government of his Kingdoms; and that the Prince and Duke had designed such Commissioners under themselves, as should intend great affairs, and the publick good.

"IV. That this should be effected by beginning of a war, and keeping some companies on foot in this Land, whereby to constrain his Majesty to yield to any thing, chiefly being brought into straits for want of monies to pay the Soldiers.

"V. That the Prince and Duke's enclosing his Majesty from the said Ambassadors, and others of his own loyal People, that they might not come near him in private, did argue in them a fear and distrust of a good conscience.

"VI. That the emissaries of the Duke had brought his Majesty into contempt with the potent men of this Realm, traducing him for slothful and unactive, for addition to an inglorious Peace, while the inheritance of his Daughter and her Children is in the hands of his foes; and this appeared by a Letter which the Duke had writ into Holland, and they had intercepted.

"VII. That his Majesty's honour, nay, his Crown and Safety, did depend upon a sudden dissolution of the Parliament.

"VIII. They loaded the Duke with sundry misdeemeanors in Spain, and his violent opposition to the match.

"IX. That the Duke had divulged the King's secrets, and the close designs between his Majesty and their master King Philip, about the States of Holland, and their Provinces, and laboured to put his Majesty out of the good opinion of the Hollanders.

"X. That the Duke was guilty of most corrupt dealing with the Ambassadors of divers Princes.

"XI. That all these things were carried on in the Parliament with an head-strong violence, and that the

(1) This Petition, after it was reduced to another form, and so presented to his Majesty, consisted only of two Articles, which were much the same with the three first and the last of these.

(2) This Observation is built upon our Author's mistake, in imagining the Petition containing the seven Articles, was presented to the King; whereas it was new modelled, and the IIId. and Vth. Articles, &c. left out. So it is no wonder the King should not take notice of them in his Speech. The Petition, as it was presented to the King, is to be seen in Wilson, p. 784.

1624. "Duke was the cause of it, who courted them only that were of troubled humours.

"XII. That such bitterness and ignominies were vented in Parliament against the King of Spain, as were against all good manners and honour of the English Nation.

"XIII. That the Puritans (of whom the Duke was head) did what they could bring it about, that the Succession of the Kingdom might come to the Prince Palatine and his Children, in right of the Lady Elizabeth."

In a Postscript, the Paper prayed the King, That the Secretary to the Marquis Insolia, might be brought to the King, when the Prince and Duke were sitting in the Lords House, to satisfy such doubts as the King might raise.

The King talked with the Secretary, and discoursed likewise in private with Padre Maspero a Spanish Jesuit. It is not known what these men told him (1); but the King was perceived, after these conversations, to grow very melancholy, and his temper to be entirely altered. He affected, in speaking to the Prince and Duke, to use broken and mysterious expressions, which showed that something lay heavy upon his mind (2). At last, the King going one day to Windsor, and taking Coach at St. James's, ordered the Duke (3), on some slight pretence, to stay behind. Then the Duke no longer doubting his disgrace, besought him for God's sake, to tell him what was laid to his charge. The King only answered, he was the unhappiest man alive, to be forsaken of those who were most dear to him (4), and taking the Prince his Son with him, left Buckingham at London. The Duke retired to his own house, overwhelmed with grief, and thinking himself irrecoverably ruined. But by the advice of the Lord-Keeper Williams, he went immediately to Windsor, where he found means to remove the King's suspicions. At last, the King feigned to be cured of them. But the Earl of Clarendon confirms in his History, what is assured by others, that the Duke had entirely lost the King's favour. Mean while, James was naturally so timorous, that, instead of freeing himself from a favorite, whom he might easily have discarded, he gave himself up more and more to him, so apprehensive was he of his union with the Prince. He impatiently expected the Earl of Bristol's arrival, to use his advice: but means were found to prevent him from declaring his mind to him, and even of speaking to him.

Before the Parliament broke up, the King received a fresh mortification from the Prince and Duke. Whilst they were in Spain, Lionel Cranfield, Lord-Treasurer, lately created Earl of Middlesex, having the courage to refuse them sometimes the exorbitant sums they demanded, they resolved to ruin him at their return. They made use for that purpose of their credit with the Parliament, and caused him to be accused by their creatures, of mismanagement in the discharge of his office. The King knowing this came from them, desired them for God's sake, to use their interest with the two Houses to drop the impeachment: but they remained inflexible and unmoved at all the King's intreaties. So the Lord-Treasurer was condemned in a Fine of fifty thousand pounds, and declared incapable of ever sitting in the House of Peers. All the Historians agree, he did not deserve so rigorous a treatment. But the Duke who had raised him from the dust, had a mind to show he was powerful enough to reduce him to his primitive state, for an example to all who should dare to resist him. After this it must not be thought strange, if the King, when he spoke to this Parliament, appeared so different from what he was with respect to the two former. Not that he had changed his sentiments and maxims, but durst not do any thing without the direction of the Prince and Duke, who had formed projects to which a Parliament was necessary. The Earl of Clarendon affirms, the King was extremely surprized in the beginning of this Parliament, when he was informed of the contents of the Duke of Buckingham's narration, concerning the Treaty of marriage: a narration, says that famous Historian, which, for the most part, the King himself knew to be untrue. Mean while, he had the weakness, as I said, to attest the truth of it, and to assure, the Duke had said the same things to him. There cannot be a clearer evidence of his subjection to the Prince and Favorite.

Here is also another remarkable proof of the King's weakness or fears. He saw no remedy but in the Earl of Bristol's counsels, whose return he impatiently expected. And yet, no sooner was this Lord arrived in England, but the King was constrained to send him express orders at Dover, not to come to Court, but remain at his own house till he had answered certain questions, which should be put to him by some of the Council. The Parliament being prorogued shortly after, the Earl frequently wrote to the King, to desire he might be examined. The King wished it; but it was not the Prince's or Buckingham's interest, who still found fresh excuses to defer the examination. The Earl was however examined at last, after much sollicitation, and returned such answers, that his examiners could not help declaring, his conduct was unblameable. But this could not procure him his liberty or admittance into the King's presence. Some time after, the Duke sent him word, he was much mistaken, if he imagined his answers were satisfactory to the King, the Prince, or to him the Duke; but his only way to come into favour again, was to make the confession he had sent him. The Earl refused it, and the King told Buckingham, it was horrible tyranny to make an innocent person confess faults of which he was not guilty. Notwithstanding all this, it was not in his power to speak with the Earl, because the Prince and Duke did not think it proper.

The Parliament being prorogued (5), it was necessary to think of the war. The aid granted the King was very considerable (6). It was computed that with this money he might send twenty five thousand men into the Palatinate, under the command of an English General. But the Court had already taken other measures. Six thousand men only were therefore sent into Holland (7), to serve in the army of the States, under the command of the Prince of Orange, and other troops were levied for Count Mansfeldt, who was during the winter to open himself a passage into the Palatinate.

Mean while, [Henry Rich] Earl of Holland, who had been dispatched into France, having sent word that Lewis XIII. was inclined to listen to the overture of a marriage between the Prince of Wales and his Sister the Princess Henrietta Maria, the King appointed [James Hay] Earl of Carlisle to go and negotiate the affair jointly with him. The two Ambassadors repairing to Compiègne, where the Court of France was, Commissioners were nominated to treat with them, of whom the Marquis de la Vieuville Super-intendant of the Finances was the first. The conferences began a few days after the prorogation of the Parliament, when the King, according to his promise, was putting the Laws in execution against Popish Recusants, particularly against Friars and Priests, some of whom were thrown into prison.

This severity caused the Catholics to exclaim, who expected a very different treatment a few months before. They could not forbear complaining, that whereas the negotiation of the Spanish match had procured them great ease, this with France seemed on the contrary to serve only to increase their miseries. Several writ to France in that strain, intimating they had nothing to trust to but the piety, zeal, and protection of Lewis. Among others, a Scotch Franciscan wrote upon this subject to Hugo Archbishop of Ambrun, who had been General of the Order, and to whom he was known. The Archbishop showed the Letter to the King, and aggravated the sufferings of the English Catholics, who expected relief only from his intercession. The King of France had already done his utmost to pacify the English Catholics, assuring them by Tilliers his Ambassador at London, that he would not forget them. But their repeated complaints obliged him at length to take some step in their favour, and the rather, as he was afraid, they would obstruct the Pope's dispensation, which would soon be wanted. He resolved therefore to send to James a secret agent to intercede for the Catholics, and chose for that purpose the Archbishop of Ambrun, who came to London in disguise, and passed for a Counsellor of the Parliament of Grenoble. At his arrival, he waited upon Buckingham, who seemed very much inclined to countenance his negotiation. The Countess of Buckingham the Duke's Mother, the Earl of Rutland, and some other Catholics did the Archbishop great services, and acquainted him with many things, necessary to be known, in order to succeed in his designs. The King being informed that the Archbishop desired to speak with him, sent for him to Royston, where he then was, confined to his bed with the gout. The Archbishop's first conference with the King, was followed by the release of several Popish Recusants, imprisoned since the Parliament's Petition. Moreover, the King gave the Archbishop leave to administer Confirmation in the French Ambassador's house, to all that should apply for it. This was done in so publick a manner, that not only the house, but the street itself, was crowded with people. If the Archbishop's own narrative may be credited, he confirmed above ten thousand persons, which seems to me a little exaggerated. However this be, the number must have been great, since the Magistrates of London complained of it to the King, who owned, it was done with his leave. And yet he had very lately told the Parliament, it was a shame to suffer such crowds of Papists at Ambassadors houses.

Of the Laity's Aid, eight Cities of London were appointed to be Treasurers, and ten other Persons to be of his Majesty's Council for the War; without whose Warrant no Money was to be issued out by the Treasurers, nor upon any other account, but for the War: And both were to be accountable to the Commons in Parliament. See Retul. Parl. and Statute, 21. Jac. c. 34. The Acts made in this Parliament were these, 1. One concerning Monopolies, and Dispensations with penal Laws, and the forfeitures thereof. 2. For the better suppressing of Drunkenness, and inordinate haunting of Inns, Ale houses, &c. 3. That not above 31. per Cent. Interest shall be given for Money. 4. For the relief of Creditors against Bankrupts. 5. That profane Swearers and Coarsers shall pay twelve pence for every Oath, to the use of the poor. 6. For making the River Thames navigable as far as Oxford. The rest being too long to be inserted here, may be seen in the Statute-Book.

From that time, the King had several conferences with this Prelate, and one day as he was expressing his earnest desire to live in strict union with the King of France, the Archbishop took occasion to tell him, that one of the best means to that end, was to grant a full toleration to the Catholics. Whereupon the King squeezing him by the hand, said these words to him: I perceive you are the Man sent me from God, to whom I may freely open my mind. Adding, "He had always a good opinion of the Catholic Religion, and for it had often been in danger of assassination during his Minority: He intended to grant a full toleration to the Catholics; and in order to succeed, meant to cause an Assembly of Divines, as well foreign as English, to be held, and therein to be decided, that it was necessary to grant an universal Liberty of Conscience: and he had already cast his eyes on the English Divines to be sent thither: If the Assembly could not be held at Dover, he would agree it should be at Boulogne, as soon as his Son's marriage secured him the assistance of France: He thought proper that the Archbishop should now return to France, under colour of waiting on the Princess, and he would send him two Letters under his own hand, one for the Pope, the other for the King of France, wherein his project should be more fully explained: He would also give him a Memorial on the same subject, that being armed with these two Papers, he might go and negotiate at Rome with the Pope, for whom he had a very great respect, being obliged to him for a copy of verses he had formerly [when Cardinal] made upon the Queen his mother and the house of Stewart." At the same time he showed the verses to the Archbishop, and then said, "If he returned from Rome, with the Pope's approbation, concerning the Assembly, it should be immediately held, and he did not question, it would be very advantageous to the Catholic Religion. In the mean time, he intended to negotiate with the Protestant Princes of Germany, and endeavour to gain some of the chief Puritan Lords in England and Scotland."

On supposition of the truth of this extract from the Archbishop of Ambrun's narrative, at the end of Deagant's Memoirs, all that can be inferred from it, is, that James had formed a chimerical project of a mutual Toleration throughout Christendom, and thought himself qualified to effect it, with the assistance of France. But Deagant says something more. He affirms, James writ a Letter to the Pope, and sent it by an English Roman Catholic Gentleman. In this Letter, according to that Author, "He owns the Pope for Christ's Vicar upon earth, and Head of the Church Universal. He assures him he intends to declare himself a Catholic, as soon as he has provided against some inconveniences which he foresees his declaration may cause. He promises, the Priests shall not be disturbed who are sent into England by his Holiness or the King of France, unless they are Jesuits. Moreover, desires the Pope not to think of causing to be restored to the Church, the Abbey-Lands granted or sold to the principal Families in the Kingdom, for fear of ruining the whole project. He says further, nothing hinders him from openly professing the Catholic Religion, but his hopes of gaining first his Brother-in-law

"the King of Denmark, to whom he had sent to desire him, on some other pretence, to come to England. And when they two shall be closely united in the same design, he does not doubt but they shall prevail upon most of the other Protestant Princes."

Deagant assures, no-body knew of this Letter but Buckingham and the bearer: however does not say how he himself came to know the contents. To speak the truth, I can hardly believe, James really intended to declare himself a Catholic: or if he did intend it, would write such a Letter to the Pope, in his present circumstances. In short, I think it very unlikely th: Letter should fall into Deagant's hands. So, I suspect, this Author's relation was only communicated to him by some English Catholic, on whose Testimony whether we may rely, cannot be known.

The Archbishop of Ambrun's narrative is much more probable; first, because that Prelate relates only what he had himself from the King's own mouth: Secondly, because he says nothing but what is agreeable to that Prince's conduct through the whole course of his life. His religious notions were very particular, and not embraced by the Protestants. He believed that difference of opinion, with respect to the doctrines of Transubstantiation, Invocation of Saints, and the other Tenets which distinguished the two Religions, and were by him considered as School-Questions, was not sufficient to justify a Schism. Consequently the Roman and Protestant Churches were one and the same Church, from whence he inferred, it was incumbent upon all Christians mutually to support one another, and live like brethren. It followed equally from this principle, that the Protestants ought not to persecute or molest the Catholics, nor the Catholics the Protestants. He observed this rule himself very punctually, but without any just foundation that the Catholic Princes would follow the same maxim. So, the scheme of an universal Toleration, which he meant to establish among all Christians, was properly but a chimera, since he had not sufficient authority to make all the world come into his measures. Mean while, as his maxims obliged him to look upon the Catholics with a different eye from what other Protestants did, it is no wonder that he passed, with the Protestants and the Papists themselves, for a Prince well-affected to the Catholic Religion. And indeed, so far was he from having any aversion to that Religion, that he considered the Church of Rome as the Mother-Church, from whence the Protestant Church was sprung, and doubtless, had it been in his power to unite them, he would have given the preference to the first, leaving every one free to believe what he pleased concerning the Doctrines. There was but one thing that embarrassed him, namely, the exorbitant power ascribed to the Pope, and the damnable maxim of the lawfulness of murdering Kings on account of Religion. To free himself from this embarrassment, he endeavoured to deceive himself, by imagining, there were but very few Catholics, who were possessed with the Pope's unlimited power, and that the King-killing doctrine was peculiar to the Jesuits. On the other hand, Puritanism in the Protestant Religion was so odious to him, that, probably, he would, if he could, have excluded the Puritans from the general Toleration he was willing to grant to all other Christians. King James had the misfortune to govern himself by general maxims, without considering, such maxims could not be always adapted to particular cases. His notions concerning Religion were of the same nature with his opinions about Monarchy, the general principles whereof he applied to the Government of England, contrary to the particular Constitution of that Kingdom.

Whilst the Archbishop of Ambrun was in England, the negotiation of the marriage was continued in France, between the English Ambassadors and the French Commissioners. The English proposed at first the continuation of the Treaty, formerly begun for Prince Henry's marriage with the Princess Christina, who espoused the Duke of Savoy. But this motion was rejected by the French Commissioners; first, because that negotiation was properly but just set on foot: Secondly, because France would not be contented with less than was offered by the King of England, for the Prince of Wales's marriage with the Infanta of Spain. So, the French Commissioners demanded in their turn, that the Articles concerning the Princess to Spain, should serve for foundation to the present Treaty. The Ambassadors expected this demand, and by their private instructions knew how to proceed, but pretended, they could not grant what was demanded, without fresh orders. They sent therefore a Courier to London, but the Court of France knew it was not upon that account, so, they were pressed the more earnestly, to declare what they would grant with respect to Religion. At last, after some solicitation, they offered the Articles agreed upon with Spain, except four, namely liberty of Conscience to 1624. Catholics: A Church in London: The education of the children by the Queen till ten years old: A Bishop with ecclesiastical Authority over the Prince's family. These four Articles were much debated, and at length, the Ambassadors yielded the two last. But for the two first, they said, they could not absolutely grant them, because of the King's solemn promise to the Parliament. This reason appeared so strong to the French Commissioners, that they thought it fruitless to insist any more upon these two Articles. The portion was settled without much trouble. The King of France offered eight-hundred-thousand crowns, on condition the Prince assigned a jointure of sixty-thousand crowns a year; which offer with the condition was accepted. So, in all appearance, this affair was to be ended in a very short space, but two things retarded the conclusion.

In the first place, the Pope did not approve of this marriage, because, hearing that the English Ambassadors had proposed a League to the King of France, he was afraid, the design of it might be to dispossess the Duke of Bavaria of the Palatinate and Electoral Dignity. For which reason he endeavoured at first to dissuade Lewis XIII. from giving his Sister to an Heretical Prince. But finding Lewis did not much regard his arguments, he declared he would not grant a dispensation, unless the marriage was made upon the same terms as were granted to Spain. Whereupon the King of France resolved to send Father Berulle, General of the Fathers of the Oratory to solicit the dispensation. His instructions signed the 31st of July, imported among other things, "that by the articles already agreed on, the Princess, as well as all her Domesticks were very secure as to Religion: she had a Bishop with twenty-eight Priests or Monks: and a Chapel in every place where she shall reside: She was to educate her Children till the age of thirteen years, whereas in the Spanish Articles, the time was fixed to ten years. In fine, she was well instructed and very firm in the Faith: and instead of having any thing to fear for her, it was to be hoped, considering how well inclined the King of England was to be a Catholic, she would convert him as well as the Prince her spouse, after the example of Bertha of France, who made a convert of King Ethelbert."

The Marquis de la Vieuville's disgrace which happened at this time, was the other cause of the delay of this affair, and stopped Father Berulle who was about to depart. Cardinal Richelieu, who was commissioned to treat with the English Ambassadors, in the room of the disgraced Superintendent, pretended, that la Vieuville had acted without orders, or at least without the approbation of the King or Council. James being informed of this new obstacle, believed, the Court of France used this pretence to break off the Treaty, and made great complaints to the Marquis d'Effiat, who was lately come to his Court in the place of Tilliers. But Cardinal Richelieu was far from breaking off a negotiation so advantageous to France upon many accounts. So, contenting himself with disparaging la Vieuville by this accusation, he renewed the Treaty.

The late change in the Ministry inspired the Nuncio with fresh hopes. He represented to the Cardinal, that his own and the Pope's honour obliged him not to abate any thing of the Spanish Articles, and that assuredly the dispensation would not be granted upon any other terms. The Cardinal told him, the King of England and Prince of Wales had complied with whatever they really intended to grant the King of Spain, though not with what was extorted from them, whilst the Prince was as a prisoner at Madrid, and what was not in their power. Moreover, he intimated to him, that there was no absolute occasion for a dispensation, and though it was desired, 'twas not so much out of necessity as respect for the Pope's person. So, Father Berulle departed with his instructions, notwithstanding the Nuncio's opposition.

If the Court of France had shown less resolution, this affair would never have been accomplished. The Pope's behaviour on this occasion plainly showed, he only wanted a pretence to refuse the dispensation, or at least, to delay it as long as possible. He retarded the affair by laying it before a congregation, where fresh difficulties were continually started. They were not satisfied that the King of England and Prince of Wales should swear to the articles, they would have also the King of France to be guarantee, like the King of Spain, and Lewis was forced at last to promise it. They insisted particularly upon demanding a public Church in London for the Catholics, though they were told, it was not in the King of England's power to perform such an article, if it was granted. In a word, there was no delay, no artifice, but what was practised by the Pope, to gain time, till at last the French Ambassador had orders to declare, if the dispensation was much longer deferred, the affair might be transacted without it. This menace making the Pope apprehensive that he might very unreasonably expose his authority, he promised the Jagers, after a tedious solicitation which would have held longer, had it been the Court of France's interest to prolong it. But Cardinal Richelieu was afraid, a farther delay would bring with it alterations that might cause a breach of the Marriage, as happened in Spain. So the Treaty was signed at Paris the 10th of November. It contained thirty publick, with three secret, articles, wherein much the same advantages were stipulated for the Catholics, as in those of Madrid. The articles of the Treaty were,

I. His most Christian Majesty, to discharge what his dignity and piety oblige him to, and that he may treat of this marriage with a safe conscience, undertakes to procure the Pope's dispensation, within two months at farthest.

II. The articles and conditions of the marriage being signed, the King of Great-Britain shall appoint such persons of quality as he shall think proper, to espouse Madame in the Prince his Son's name, according to the usual form in the Roman Catholick-Apostolick-Church.

III. The nuptials shall be celebrated in France, after the manner observed in the marriage of the late King with Queen Margaret, and in that of the Dukes of Bar.

IV. After the celebration of the marriage, Madame shall be conducted at his most Christian Majesty's charge, as far as Calais, where she shall be delivered to the person commissioned by the King of Great-Britain to receive her.

Which done, the said contract shall be ratified anew by the King and the Prince his Son, in the presence of such as the most Christian King shall commission to that end, and of the Lords of Great-Britain who shall be present on this occasion, without the intervention of any Church-Ceremony.

VII. The free exercise of the Roman Catholick-Apostolick-Religion shall be granted to Madame, as likewise to all the children that shall be born of this marriage.

There shall be also a Church-yard allowed in the City of London, where, according to the custom of the Roman Church, such of Madame's attendants shall be buried, as shall happen to die, which shall be done in a modest manner. The said Church-yard shall be enclosed, that it may not be profaned.

X. Madame shall have a Bishop for her Almoner, who shall have all necessary authority and jurisdiction in all things belonging to Religion, and shall have power to proceed according to the Canons against such as shall be under his charge. And in case the Civil-Court shall lay hold on any the said Ecclesiasticks, for some state-crime, and information be made against him, he shall be sent to the said Bishop, with the informations and proceedings, and the said Bishop, after degrading him, shall put him again into the hands of the secular Court. XII. The King and Prince shall oblige themselves by oath not to attempt by any means whatever, to persuade Madame to change her Religion, or to engage her in any thing repugnant to it.

XIII. Madame's household shall be settled with as much dignity, and consist of as many officers as any Princess of Wales ever had, and in the same manner as was agreed upon for the marriage of the most serene Prince with the Infanta of Spain.

Private or Secret Articles.

1. That the Catholics, as well Ecclesiastics as Temporal, imprisoned since the last Proclamation, which followed the breach with Spain, should all be set at liberty.
2. That the English Catholics should be no more searched after, nor molested for their Religion.
3. That the Goods of the Catholics, as well Ecclesiastical as Temporal, that were seized since the fore-mentioned Proclamation, should be restored to them.

In this, as well as the Madrid Treaty, we see the great care of the French and Spanish Courts for the interest of the Catholick Religion, and the little zeal of King James, the Prince, and the Duke of Buckingham for the Protestant. The XIXth Article concerning the education of the Children was of very ill consequence to England. It almost proved the ruin of Church and State.

If it is asked what could induce the King to purchase this marriage with such hard terms to the Religion professed by himself, and almost the whole Kingdom, there can be, in my opinion, but two motives assigned. The first was, to give the Prince his Son, a wife of Royal extraction, thinking any other Princess beneath him. The second was, the portion of eight hundred thousand Crowns, which might excite his desire. As to the prejudice this Treaty might bring to the Protestant Religion, it troubled him not, for he never had the interest of that Religion much at heart.

The Treaty being signed at Paris, Mr. de Lomenie, The Secretary of State, was sent to London to see it sworn by the King and Prince. Immediately after, all the prosecutions against the Papists ceased, and the King promised all the prisoners should be released, as soon as the marriage was consummated.

When the Earl of Carlisle was sent to France to hasten the treaty of marriage, he had orders to propose to that Court a League against the House of Austria. This was the Prince's and Buckingham's grand aim. There was then a dispute about the Valtelline, between the Kings of France and Spain, which made the Court of England imagine Lewis would readily listen to such a proposal. And indeed he did so: but it was only to frighten the Pope and the Spaniards, and not with design to conclude the League. The Duke of Bavaria had friends in the French Court, who caused him to be much more regarded than the Elector Palatine, expelled his Dominions, and sheltered in Holland. So Lewis's Ministers told the English Ambassadors, that the League and Marriage were two distinct affairs, which could not be negotiated together: but after the conclusion of the marriage, the League should be treated of. By this answer, they kept the English in hope, and the Spaniards in fear. On the other hand, the Count of Mansfeldt stayed at or near Paris, and the Spaniards knew he had frequent conferences with the Ministers.

Some time after, Mansfeldt came to England, where he was received with extraordinary caresses, and lodged by the Prince in his Palace at St. James's. Here, after some conferences, he agreed with the King, the Prince, and the Duke, that he should have twelve thousand Men, to carry the war into the Lower Palatinate. This project being formed, the King replied the Court of France with respect to the League: but his proposal was artfully evaded on divers pretences, though without an absolute denial. He was forced therefore to be contented, till the League was concluded, with demanding of the French King, a passage through his Dominions for Mansfeldt's army. Lewis in general or ambiguous terms, made him hope, not only that he would grant a passage, but also strengthen this army with a body of his own Troops. The event showed, he meant after the conclusion of the League, whereas the English took it for a positive promise, whether the League should be concluded or not. Pursuant to this project, the forces to be commanded by Mansfeldt were levied in England.

Whilst this army was preparing to march, James caused a memorial to be presented to the Infanta Isabella, demanding the City of Frankendal, which she held in sequestration, and, by the treaty of London, was to keep but till the end of the Truce, which was to expire the 26th of October. Moreover, he demanded in the same memorial, a free passage for the Garrison he was to send to Frankendal, not only through the Infanta's, and his Catholick Majesty's Dominions, but also through the territories of their friends and allies. The Infanta answered, she would order the Governor of Frankendal to surrender the place on the day appointed, to such as should produce a power from the King of England: That the would grant a passage through her own, and the King of Spain's Dominions, to the fifteen hundred Foot, and two hundred Horse, which, according to the treaty of London, were to take possession of Frankendal, and, in general, would punctually execute the Treaty. But as to the King's farther demand, to procure him a passage for his Troops through the Empire, she declared, it was not in her power, neither was she obliged to it. Thus the Court of England found by experience their error, in not interfering in the treaty of London, what they were afterwards forced to demand, and what the Infanta might justly deny. It is very true, in withdrawing the English Garrison from Frankendal, James met with no obstacle; but he could not expect the same thing when he should come to send them back. Some say, that on the 25th of October, the 1624. Governor of Frankendal marched out of the City with his Garrison, but finding none of the King of England's forces ready to take possession, instantly re-entered.

This was not the only error of the Court of England, the most impolitic then in Europe. The twelve thousand Men to be conducted by Mansfield to the Palatinate, were embarked in December, in extreme cold weather, without the least doubt of their passage through France. Nevertheless, when the army came before Calais, the French would not suffer them to land. Much time was spent in going from Calais to the Court, and from the Court to Calais, even several times, and all to no purpose. The King of France constantly asserted, he had never positively promised to grant these Troops a passage. The English Authors call this a real breach of faith. I don't know whether they are in the right, and whether the Court of England is not rather to be blamed, for not taking better measures, and securing a passage through France, before the embarkation of the army. However this be, the army suffering greatly on board the ships where the Soldiers were closely pent up, Mansfield was forced to sail for Zealand, where he met with the same difficulties. The Zealanders said, they had not provisions for such a number of Troops, having had no notice of their coming. Much time was employed in negotiating. Messengers were sent to the Hague, and afterwards to London. In the mean while, the pestilence raging among the Soldiers, above two thirds perished before they were suffered to land. Most of those that escaped, either deserted, or lifted among the six thousand English which were in the service of the States. Thus, by the Court's wrong measures, this army became useless, and the money spent in raising it, was lost (1).

It was February 1625, before Pope Urban's Dispensation arrived. When it came to Paris, two new conditions, not mentioned in the Treaty, were seen in it with surprise, namely, 1. That the Domesticks of the Children, born of this marriage, should be Catholics. 2. That the Princess should appoint them, and the Pope absolutely required the King of England, and the Prince his Son, to swear these two Articles, otherwise the Dispensation was invalid. The King of France was very angry with Father Berulle for accepting such a Dispensation. But the Father was so far from thinking it a fault, that he himself, as it is said, insinuated to the Pope, that it would be proper to add these two Articles, as having been forgotten in the Treaty. The Court of France therefore was under a fresh concern, fearing King James would reject these new conditions. But he was far from breaking for such a trifle. He accepted them without being much importuned, and only refused to swear again, saying, his word was sufficient. But without the oath, the Dispensation was not valid. To satisfy the Pope therefore, the King of France, and the Princess his Sister, were forced to write to him, that they would warrant the performance of the two last Articles. Notwithstanding this, a new Dispensation was to be solicited, which was some months in coming, and in this interval, died King James, without having the pleasure of seeing the marriage consummated.

About the middle of March he was seized with a Tertian ague, of which he had some fits. But though commonly such agues are not dangerous in the spring, this brought him to his grave. He died [at Theobalds,] the 27th of March, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after a reign of two and twenty years in England.

His death happening, as I may say, suddenly, and unexpectedly, caused many suspicions, which fell on the Duke of Buckingham. When one of the King's fits was going off, the Duke caused certain Plaisters to be applied to his side and wrists, and gave him twice with his own hands a Medicine to drink, in the absence of the Physicians. Nay, he would have given it a third time, but could not persuade him to take it. The King finding himself much worse, sent for the Physicians, who said positively, they would not prescribe, if the Plaisters were not immediately removed. However, the King died within a few days. The Duke was afterwards impeached by the Commons, not directly for poisoning the King, but for daring to apply remedies without the advice of his Physicians (2).

James left only a Son and a Daughter. His Daughter was married to a Prince who had now lost his Dominions, and was fled for refuge to Renen, in the Province of Utrecht, where he kept his little Court very poorly. King James, who was so liberal, is accused of having but moderately contributed to the maintenance of this dissolute Family. I don't know whether there be any ground for this accusation. Charles, Prince of Wales, who succeeded his Father, was still more unfortunate than his Sister.

James I. as I have elsewhere observed, has had for Historians, Men very much prepossessed in his favour, or extremely prejudiced against him. This naturally followed from the divisions to which he himself had given birth. Some represent him as a perfect pattern of a good King. Others blacken his reputation as much as possible, by aggravating his failings. The reason of this diversity proceeds from the History of his Reign, being penned at a time when the animosity of the two parties was at the height, whence both have happened to leave in their writings evident marks of their passion. Therefore the Character of this Prince must not be formed, either upon the praises of the one, or the invectives of the other, but upon his manner of governing, upon his speeches and actions. This might be done by recollecting the principal circumstances of his reign. But to save the Reader the pains, I shall briefly relate, what is said on both sides, of which he will be able to judge.

The principal ingredients in King James's panegyrick is the constant Peace he caused his Subjects to enjoy. This cannot be said to be the effect of chance, since it clearly appears to have been his sole, or, at least, chief aim in his Administration. Nothing, say his friends, is more noble or more worthy a great King than such a design. But this design loses all its merit, if the Prince is discovered by his conduct, to preserve Peace only out of fear, supineness, excessive love of ease and repose, and King James's whole behaviour shows he acted by these motives, though he coloured it with the pretence of affection for his people.

If some take care to extol his knowledge in Philosophy, Bacon. Divinity, History, polite Learning, others affirm, it was but real Pedantry, and that from all his acquired knowledge he learnt only to talk very impertinently on every subject, instead of framing solid and sure rules for the government of his Dominions.

His liberality, which some praise, is exclaimed against by others as prodigality. These pretend, he gave without measure and discretion, without any regard to his own wants, or the merits of those on whom he heaped his Favours.

The same contrariety occurs between King James's Williams. Historians with respect to his capacity. Some call him for his wisdom, the Solomon of the age. Others endeavour to display all his errors, particularly in the two sole important affairs of his Reign, wherein he came off very ill, namely, the Prince his Son's marriage, and his Son-in-law's election to the Kingdom of Bohemia.

Some extol him for maintaining the Prerogative Royal in its full lustre, in spite of the efforts of those who were continually attacking it. Others pretend, he had conceived very wrong Ideas of the English Constitution, and by aiming to carry the regal authority too high, and in-filling the same principles into his successor, he was the first cause of his Family's ruin.

As to his manners, writers are no less divided. Some describe him as a very wise and virtuous Prince, whilst others speak of him as a Prince of a dissolute life, given to drinking, and treading in common conversation, especially when he was in a passion. He is likewise reproached for dissolving the Earl of Essex's marriage, pardoning the Earl and Countess of Somerset, for the death of Sir Walter Raleigh, and for confidently calling God to witness, in full Parliament, that he never had any thoughts of granting the Papists a Toleration, which he could affirm but by means of some mental reservation.

In fine, whilst some praise his moderation and equity to the Catholics, others pretend to demonstrate he was a Papist in his heart, and only professed the Protestant Re-

(1) These twelve thousand Foot were divided into six Regiments, the Colonels whereof were Theophilus Cantuar Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Dunstable Son to the Earl of Carlisle, the Lord Cromwell, Sir Charles Ribb, Sir John Burroughs, and Colonel Gry a Scitteman, who had been an old German Commander, and affected to wear Buff in time of Peace, and at Court, with a brace of Pistols at his Girdle, which the King never asked to see. There were likewise two Troops of Horse raised for this service; one of which was commanded by the Earl of Lincoln, and the other by one Gunter. Rushworth, Tom. 1. p. 153. At their winter quarters at Rejendale, the Earl of Southampton, and his Son the Lord Windsor, were both seized with burning Fevers. The Son died, and the Father overcoming the Fever, departed from Rejendale, with intention to bring his Son's body to England, but died of a Lethargy at Berghen of Zome, so were both in one small Bark brought to Southampton, and buried at Titchfield. Wilson, p. 789.

(2) Wilson says, one of Buckingham's chief motives was thought to be his fear the King would set up Brissol his deadly enemy against him, to pull him down. And if what Burnet says be true, he had reason likewise to fear the King's old favorite Somerset. He says, the King being resolved to bring the Earl tenderly, and with many tears: the Earl of Somerset believed the secret was not well kept, for soon after, the King was taken ill with an Ague, and died at Theobalds. Burnet says, he had this from some who were told it by the Earl himself. Dr. Craig the King's Physician was disgraced, for saying, he believed the King was poisoned. Burnet, p. 17.

religion out of fear of what might follow, in case he openly declared for the Catholic. If some say, in proof of his being a good Protestant, that he made constant profession of the established religion, persevered in it to his death, and when dying, charged the Prince his Son to protect the Church and Clergy; others answer, this is far from a demonstration. They pretend, the point is not to know what he would appear to be, but what he was in reality, and that his actions belied his outward profession: that the same thing had happened to him in Scotland, where till the age of thirty-six years, he had professed a Religion which he mortally hated, as plainly appeared afterwards (1). That when he came to England, he declared himself openly the protector of the Papists: took their part on all occasions: promoted them to honours, dignities, public offices: that in his reign the Laws against them were never duly executed, of which he boasted to the Catholic Princes in his Apology concerning the oath of Allegiance: That in all his Speeches, whether in the Parliament or the Star-Chamber, his constant aim was to move his Subjects to consent to a full Toleration for the Catholics: but not finding the Parliament inclined as he wished, he granted, by his sole authority, a Toleration in effect, by hindering the execution of the Laws, and discharging the condemned Recufants from Fines, and other penalties: that in his conventions with Spain and France, he positively promised to cause no more Laws to be enacted against the Papists, and thence already in force not to be executed: that on all occasions, he affected to show he found nothing amiss in the Roman Religion, but the Pope's exorbitant power over Princes: that by giving the Pope the titles of Holy Father, his Holiness, and by consenting that his Son's children should be educated in the Roman Religion till the age of thirteen years, he plainly discovered he should not be sorry for their continuance in that Religion: Lastly, his engagements with the Archbishop of Anbrun is a fresh and manifest proof of his being a true Papist. To this the others reply, it is not possible to conceive, that if King James had been a Papist in his heart, he would have spent a considerable part of his time in writing Books against the Popish Religion, and combating the arguments of Bellarmine and Du Perron (2).

Having related what is said for and against King James, with respect to his Religion, I shall take the liberty to offer my opinion or conjecture, which is, that this Prince was truly neither a sound Protestant, nor a good Catholic. One can hardly help owning, that he had never much at heart the interest of the Protestant Religion, as on the other hand, it cannot be denied, he made publick and constant profession of the same to his dying day. This induces me to think he had formed a scheme of Religion different from that of others, according to which he counted of no moment, what the Protestants and Catholics looked upon as essential. The difference between the two Religions, with respect to the Tenets, was not what affected him most. He believed, probably, that every Religion was good, provided it taught obedience to Sovereigns, and preserved the Hierarchy, which he considered as a fundamental Article. It is therefore no wonder, that, agreeably to this scheme, he should refuse to enter into the measures of the English Protestants, to hinder the growth of the Roman Religion in England, or not scruple to continue in the Religion he professed, since, according to his Notions, the two Religions were equally good, provided the Pope's despotick power was abolished. I scarce doubt that in his conferences with the Archbishop of Anbrun, he had in view the chimerical project of reconciling the two Religions, without troubling himself about the Tenets which divided them, and which, in one of his speeches, he called scholastick questions. But, very probably, if he could have executed this project, according to his Ideas, all the advantage would have been on the side of the Roman Religion. This, in my opinion, is the only way to excuse his condescension to the Catholics, and his zeal to protect them. Otherwise, I don't see how his doubtful behaviour, with regard to Religion, can well be accounted for. This may also serve to discover the reason of his rejecting with so much animosity, the Religion of the Puritans, whose principles he believed directly contrary to the scheme he had formed.

But whatever may be said for and against King James's person, it is certain, England never flourished less than in his Reign, and the English saw themselves exposed to the insults and raileries of other Nations, whilst the blame was generally cast on the King. The following Epigram made in France in his time, is a clear evidence in what esteem he was with his neighbours:

*Tandis qu' Elizabeth fut Roy,
L'Anglois fut d'Espagne l'effroy.
Maintenant, deesse et caquette,
Regi par la Reine Jaquette.*

That is literally in English.

*Whilst Elizabeth was King,
The English were of Spain the Terror.
But now, governed by Queen Jaquet,
They only talk and prattle.*

(1) Of King James's dissimulation in point of Religion, there is a clear evidence in a Speech of his to the Kirk of Scotland, which he is said to speak standing, with his breast off, and his hands lifted up to Heaven, wherein, among other things, He blessed God that had bestowed him to be King over such a Kirk, the holiest Kirk in the World. We have in this Genealogical Table, as in foregoing tables, placed the place of issue horizontal, viz. all Princes & Princesses equally distant from the same common stock, viz. from William the Conqueror. Thus James I. being on the first line, his issue is placed on the following lines, in proportion as they are more or less removed. We have carefully distinguished the different Branches — one is formed by the Marriage of James I. to the — others and others are placed in the line above their Children as near as possible in the Order of Succession, preferred to the Female, we have placed the Males before their Sisters.

Places at Court, and in the Kingdom, continued in the hands of the Duke of Buckingham's creatures. So, there was nothing new but the King's person. Charles's journey to Spain had so endeared the Duke of Buckingham to him, that King James's affection for that Favorite was nothing, as I may say, in comparison of the new King's. 'Twas thought, and 'tis not unlikely, if James had lived, he would have discarded the Duke, with whom he was displeased for several reasons. 1. Because of the journey to Spain, of which he was the sole adviser, and which had exposed the King to the censure of all Europe. 2. On account of the breach of the Spanish match without any just cause. 3. For the Duke's engaging him, as it were against his will, to break with Spain. 4. For causing, by the Prince's credit, and his interest with the Parliament, the Lord-Treasurer Middlesex to be condemned, in spite of the King himself, who did his utmost to save him, and even sued to the Prince and Duke for his pardon, without being able to obtain it. Thus James died very seasonably for the Favorite, who, probably, to support himself, must have set the Prince at variance with his Father, which might have had terrible consequences. This raised strong suspicions of the Duke, which were farther confirmed by his presuming to apply a Plaister to the King's side, and giving him, with his own hand, a Potion to drink, without the advice of his Physicians. Indeed, the Duke could not be directly accused of hastening the King his benefactor's death, by the remedies he gave him. But when the time and circumstances of this unexpected death, caused by a Tertian Ague, not usually very dangerous in the Spring, were jointly considered, with the embarrassments it delivered the Favorite from, and the advantages it procured him, it was difficult not to suspect him. And yet, on the other hand, when the new King was seen to have an entire affection for the Duke, it could not be imagined that he doubted his innocence in that respect. However this be, the Duke of Buckingham was the Son's Favorite, as he had been the Father's, with still greater power and credit than he had enjoyed in the foregoing Reign.

Charles I. at his accession to the Throne, formed two Projects equally difficult to be executed. The first was, to wrest from the Emperor, and the Duke of Bavaria, both the Palatinates which had been taken from his Brother-in-law the Elector Palatine. The second, to carry the Regal Authority much higher than the King his Father, or any of his Predecessors had done. These two projects, which separately would, in all appearance, meet with great obstacles, became almost impracticable, when joined together. Nevertheless, Charles believed they mutually supported each other: That under colour of the Palatine War, he should put the Parliament upon a foot not to refuse him any thing: That in time, he should have both Houses at command, and after rendering himself independent, dispose as he pleased of the riches of the Kingdom, in executing his designs in favour of the King of Bohemia. As these two projects are the subject of the first fifteen years of this Reign, it will be necessary to set them in a clear light, that the sequel may be the better understood.

See the
late.

As to the first, I mean that of wresting the two Palatinates from the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria, I think it needless to repeat what has been said in the Reign of James I. It will be sufficient to put the Reader in mind, that it was by the intrigues of the Prince and the Duke of Buckingham, and by the Duke's wrong information of what passed in Spain, that the Parliament was induced to advise the King to break the Treaties, which were in effect broken already, and promise to support the war, which this breach would probably cause. This was the Prince's and the Duke's realm in disguising the truth. Afterwards, the Prince, when King, missed no opportunity to take advantage of the Parliament's hasty advice and promise, as if the Parliament had really been the sole author of the breach, and prime cause of the war for the recovery of the Palatinates. King James was the first victim of these artifices. He was made to break a Treaty which he had been labouring seven years, and to lose the portion he had reason to expect for the Prince's marriage with the Infanta. He was engaged, against his will and inclination, in a war with the House of Austria (1), and, what he deemed the greatest misfortune, compelled to have recourse to a Parliament, he that was so disatisfied with the two former, that, probably, he would never have called another, had it not been for this breach. The Duke of Buckingham was the second victim. As soon as the truth was known, he became the object of the publick hatred, though, before his contivances were discovered, he had been considered as a guardian-angel, for breaking the intended match. Finally, the Prince having mounted the Throne, resolved to support the war, in which the Parliament had unadvisedly engaged. But because he found not in the House of Commons, that readiness to assist him which he expected, he dissolved several Parliaments merely for that very reason. This bred in the minds of his Subjects jealousy and discontent, which being inflamed by other causes, brought him in the end to the greatest misfortune that can befall a King. Hitherto the Prince's and Duke's real motive in breaking the Treaty with Spain is unknown. 'Tis not conceived how, after the loss of the Palatinates, they could imagine it more easy to recover that Country from the Emperor and Duke of Bavaria, by force of arms, than by managing the King of Spain's friendship, by means of the marriage already concluded. But the use the Prince, now become King, intended to make of this war, advised by the Parliament, can be no secret, namely, to accustom the House of Commons, under pretence of the urgent necessity of the war, to supply him in a few days, with the money he demanded, without considering any other affair. This will evidently appear in the sequel. But before I descend to the particulars of this second project, 'tis necessary to premise some remarks on this subject.

Project which respect to
I mean.

I have shewn in the Reign of James I. that this first Monarch of Great-Britain, laboured, as long as his Monarchy lasted, that is, while he was King of England, to extend the Prerogative-Royal. This was not only in some points, and on certain occasions, but by general principles, which being once admitted, would, by necessary consequences, cloath the Sovereign with an unlimited authority. Whatever had been said by the most furious sticklers for the absolute power of Sovereigns, he readily applied to the Kings of England, without ever examining whether the power of a King admitted of degrees, according to the several States, or the Constitution of the Government, whereof he was head. And yet this was the point in question. Otherwise, it followed from his principles, that the Regal Power was the same every where, and a King of Poland, for instance, ought to be as absolute as a King of Persia. This was in effect what he always supposed in the affair of Bohemia, and what hindered him to espouse his Son-in-law's quarrel. So long as he was satisfied with insinuating such maxims, by certain expressions in his publick Speeches, the people, and even the Parliament, took no great notice of them. But when he meant to practise the various consequences which might thence be naturally drawn, he met with strong opposition, which obliged him to dissolve several Parliaments, because they were not so apt as he wished to imbrace his I Concession, and that this Concession ed to a Corporation on certain taken away; if the terms were

was readily agreed, that the King should power to call, prorogue, and dissolve the Parliament, to forbear summoning it for some time. But that 2. might, or ought to be governed without Parliaments, if the King could dispense with, or act contrary to the Law. This carried his Prerogative, an ambiguous term, by which he meant an absolute Power, or something very near it. But the English, for the most part, understood by that word, only a power in the person of the Sovereign, to command or act in matters not repugnant to the Law, or for which the Law had not provided, and certain Acts of Grace and Favour, which the King might exercise with regard to the rest of the Nation. This was the constant occasion of the quarrels between James I. and the Parliament. It could not be said exactly, whether the King's Prerogatives, and the People's Privileges, because there had never been an express determination on that subject. Those Kings, who were tedious and the worst and most prudent, avoided as rocks, such sort of disputes, which can only breed hatred and animosity between the King and People. On the other hand, former Parliaments chose rather, to see the Prerogative-Royal stretched sometimes beyond its due bounds, than debate such difficult points, which in case of obstinacy on both sides, must have been decided by arms, since there was no higher tribunal to appeal to. Besides, since Richard II. whose attempt cost him his Crown and Life, there had been no King who had endeavoured to carry the Prerogative-Royal so far as to claim a power to act directly contrary to the Laws. If there were any who, on some occasions, attempted to go beyond bounds, the Parliaments were under no concern, for one of these three reasons: 1. Because it was in things of little importance. 2. Because, having a perfect confidence in their Sovereign, they believed he would not make an ill use of their indulgence. 3. Because they saw the King's aim and motive were advantageous, or at least not very prejudicial, to the Nation.

But James I. was no sooner on the throne of England, but questions about the Prerogative-Royal became frequent and absolutely necessary. This Monarch was continually endeavouring to establish principles, the consequences whereof tended to no less than to subvert the Constitution of the Government. I shall relate some that have already appeared in the History of his Reign, but which it is the more necessary to repeat here, as Charles I. exactly followed his Father's steps, and as 'tis not possible to have too clear an Idea of these things, since they are the chief subject of this Reign.

From the principle that the Parliament owed its being to the concession of the Kings, and that this concession might be revoked, it followed of course: that the King might govern without a Parliament, and consequently, tax the People as he thought proper, for the support of the Government. From the principle, that the King was above the Laws, it necessarily followed, that there was no security for the subjects, and their honour, fortunes, liberty, and life itself were at the King's disposal. From the principle, that the Parliament had no right to concern themselves with the King's affairs when their advice was not asked, it could not but be inferred, that the King was to be suffered to do whatever he pleased, even things most destructive to the nation. From the principle, that to complain of the administration, was want of respect to the King, it necessarily followed, that the Parliament could take no Grievances into consideration, nor make any complaints, since Grievances are generally acts of injustice committed, by the King or his Ministers. From the principle, that the Parliament had at most but a Right to represent the Grievances to the King, after which, the redress was patiently to be expected from the King himself, it followed, that the King might plague his Subjects at his pleasure, without being obliged to redress their sufferings, any farther than he thought convenient. From the principle, that to dispute the extent of his Prerogative was wounding the King in the most sensible part, the consequence must have been, that the Prerogative was without bounds, or that it could be limited only by the King's wisdom and goodness. All these principles, as it is easy to perceive, tended to establish a despotick Power. Had the King been 1625. satisfied with granting now and then some Favor, founded upon any of these Principles, it might have been thought of no consequence. But he was seen, upon all occasions, to endeavour to infill these Principles into the minds of his Subjects, and to establish them upon instances taken here and there, of the conduct of his Predecessors. He himself was seen to draw from thence, by his actions, the most extensive consequences, to fill the Kingdom with Monopolies, to compel his Subjects to lend or give him money, to dissolve the Parliaments for not allowing his Principles, to imprison such Members as ventured to speak freely, and even to declare publicly, he would call no more Parliaments. There was therefore no medium: his pretensions were either to be complied with, or opposed with open force.

James I. had the happiness to die before this division was carried any farther. The breach of the Spanish match served to reconcile the King and Parliament to each other. The King perceived, he could not proceed without Parliaments, and the People judged, that while the King was engaged in a war with the House of Austria, he would be forced to have a regard to the liberties of the Nation and the Privileges of the Parliament. Thus both sides seemed inclined to a reconciliation, and to forget all occasions of complaint.

James being dead, Charles I. his Son and Successor, who had greatly improved by his instructions, mounted the throne, possessed with the same principles. But as he was young, and his passions strong, he could put no constraint upon himself, nor think of managing the affection of the Parliament. He soon discovered by what maxims he meant to proceed in the government of his Dominions. He not only refused to redress the Grievances introduced during his Father's reign, but also added others more intolerable. He affected to let his subjects see, not only that their Grievances touched him not, but that it was an offence to petition a redress. In a word, he very plainly intimated, both in his Speeches and conduct, that he looked upon Parliaments, only as assemblies solely designed to supply him with money, and in case of refusal, he could proceed without their assistance. Accordingly, he dissolved several Parliaments, because they did not readily grant the Sums he demanded; offered violence to many members; and extorted from his subjects what money he wanted, by forced Loans, or Taxes imposed by his own authority. This ought not to seem strange, since besides the lessons taught him by his Father, he had the same Favorite, the same Ministers, and the same Council.

It is my design to shew all these things clearly and distinctly, not by reasonings and consequences, but by undeniable Facts, by authentick vouchers of what I shall advance, and lastly, by the King's own conduct, which his most zealous friends have no otherwise undertaken to justify, than by an affected silence, or at least, by a very slight account of the first fifteen years of his reign. My sole aim in thus enlarging on these things is, to enable the reader to understand the true causes of the war which afterwards afflicted the Kingdom.

As soon as the deceased King's funeral was solemnized (1), Charles speedily sent eight thousand men to Plymouth (2), to be embarked for an expedition to Spain. As he had but little money in his coffers, the charge of Coat and Conduct was ordered to be disbursed by the Country, and the Country to be repaid out of the Exchequer at a more convenient season. This was done after the precedent of former times, though the custom had now been long disused. These troops having committed great disorders in their march, the King granted a Commission for Martial-Law, to punish the offenders (3). This was looked upon as an innovation, which took from the usual Judges the cognizance of crimes committed by the soldiery, and yet, in general, it was not much considered.

The King's marriage having been concluded in his Father's life-time, was solemnized at Paris with great magnificence, on a theatre erected before the Church of Notre-Dame, the Duke of Chevreuse performing the office of Proxy for the King of England. Presently after, the Duke of Buckingham was sent into France to conduct the Queen to the King her spouse. She arrived June 12, at Dover, where the King met her the next morning, and that evening the marriage was consummated at Canterbury (4). The 16th of the same month the King and Queen made their entry into London, and two days after the Parliament met. The King made the following Speech to both Houses at the opening of this first Parliament.

"I Thank God, that the business to be treated on at this time is of such a nature, that it needs no eloquence to set it forth; for I am neither able to do it, neither doth it stand with my nature to spend much time in words. It is no new business, being already happily begun by my Father of blessed memory, who is with God; therefore it needeth no narrative: I hope in God you will go on to maintain it, as freely as you advised my Father to do it. It is true, he may seem to some to have been slack to begin so just and so glorious a work; but it was his wisdom that made him loth to begin a work, until he might find a means to maintain it: But after that he saw how much he was abused in the confidence he had with other States, and was confirmed by your advice to run the course we are in, with your engagement to maintain it, I need not press to prove how willingly he took your advice; for the preparations that are made are better able to declare it, than I to speak it. The assistance of those in Germany, the fleet that is ready for action, with the rest of the preparations, which I have only followed my Father in, do sufficiently prove, that he entered into this action.

"My Lords and Gentlemen, I hope that you do remember, that you were pleased to employ me to advise my Father to break off those two Treaties that were on foot; so that I cannot say, that I came hither a free unengaged man. It is true, I came into this business willingly and freely, like a young man, and consequently rashly; but it was by your interest, your engagement: So that though it were done like a young man, yet I cannot repent me of it, and I think none can blame me for it, knowing the love and fidelity you have born to your King, having my self likewise some little experience of your affections. I pray you remember, that this being my first action, and begun by your advice and entreaty, what a great dishonour it were to you and me, if this action, so begun, should fail, for that assistance you are able to give me. Yet knowing the constancy of your love both to me and this business, I needed not to have said this, but only to shew what care and sense I have of your honours and mine own. I must entreat you likewise to consider of the times we are in, how that I must adventure your lives (5), (which I should be loth to do) should I continue you here long; and you must venture the business, if you be slow in your resolutions. Wherefore I hope you will take such grave counsel, as you will expedite what you have in hand to do: Which will do me and your selves an infinite deal of honour; you, in shewing your love to me; and me, that I may perfect that work which my Father hath so happily begun.

"Last of all, because some malicious men may, and as I hear, have given out, that I am not so true a keeper and maintainer of the true Religion that I profess; I assure you, that I may with St. Paul say, that I have been trained up at Gamaliel's feet: and although I shall never be so arrogant as to assume unto my self the rest, I shall so far shew the end of it, that all the world may see, that none hath been, nor ever shall be more desirous to maintain the Religion I profess, than I shall be.

"Now because I am unfit for much speaking, I mean to bring up the fashion of my predecessors, to have my Lord Keeper speak for me in most things: Therefore I have commanded him to speak something unto you at this time, which is more for formality, than any great matter he hath to say unto you."

Then the Lord Keeper Williams (6) declared, "That the King's main reason of calling the Parliament, besides the beholding of his Subjects faces, was to mind them of the great engagements for the recovery of the Palatinate, imposed on his Majesty by the late King his Father, and by themselves, who broke off the two Treaties with Spain. Also to let them understand, that the succeeding Treaties and Alliances, the armies sent into the Low-Countries, the repairing of the forts, and

(2) The Astoria, by mistake, says Portsmouth. There were twelve thousand raised in all. Two thousand were sent to Holland. Idem p. 168.

The remembrance whereof was the cause of King Charles's appointing now the martial Law to be in force. "Palatinate; and that the Subsidies granted in the last
"Parliament are herein already spent, whereof the ac"count is ready, together with as much more of the "King's own Revenue." His Lordship further commended three circumstances.

"First, The time; all Europe being at this day at the "Pool of Bethesda, the first stirring of the waters must be "laid hold on: Wherefore his Majesty desires them to "bestow this meeting on him, or rather on their actions;
"and the next shall be theirs, as soon, and as long as they
"please, for domestick business.

"Secondly, Supply, if Subsidies he thought too long "and backward, his Majesty desires to hear, and not to
"propound the way.

"Thirdly, The Issue of Action; which being the first,
"doth highly concern his Majesty's honour and reputation,
"for which he relies upon their loves, with the greatest "confidence that ever King had in his Subjects: witness
"his royal poetry, Amor Civium Regis Alimentum: And
"he doubts not, but as soon as he shall be known in Eu"rope to be their King, so soon shall they be known to be "a loving and loyal Nation to him."

Though the King affirmed in his Speech, that no Prince was ever more desirous to maintain the Religion he professed, the Parliament does not seem to have fully believed it, since, at the very first, both Houses joined in presenting him a Petition against Recusants. The King returned a very gracious answer, saying, he was very glad to see their zeal for Religion, and was ready to concur with them in whatever they should propose on that head. He deferred however answering each particular article of the Petition, till he had examined it.

Mr. Richard Montague, a Clergyman, had lately printed a Book, entitled, An Appeal to Caesar, wherein were several propositions tending to the disturbance of Church and State (1). It was complained of to the Commons, who bringing the author to the Bar of their House, and examining him, thought proper to refer him to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Archbishop, who was looked upon with no good eye at Court, because he was suspected of being a friend to the Puritans, contented himself with exhorting him to write no more upon such subjects.

The proceedings of the Commons displeased the King, for Montague being one of his Chaplains, he pretended the bringing him to their Bar was an encroachment upon his Prerogative. He expressed his displeasure with the Commons, and took occasion to bring the cause before the Council. Every one suspected, that as Montague's book contained an Arminian doctrine, Laud, Bishop of St. David's (2) the King's most intimate Counsellor for religious affairs, had done this, to stop the prosecution. Laud was considered by many as the head and protector of the Arminians, who were now very numerous in the Kingdom. He had insinuated himself into Buckingham's favour, and by that means into the King's, who readily followed his Counsels, in the affairs of Religion.

The displeasure expressed by the King against the Commons, hindered not the House from granting him two Subsidies. The King accepted them graciously, but withal intimated, this supply was far short of what was necessary for the war (3) to which his Father was advised by the Parliament. The Act for the two Subsidies was no sooner passed, than the King adjourned the Parliament to Oxford, to meet again the first of August following, by reason of the Plague which raged in London.

King James, a little before his death, promised to lend the King of France five or six ships to be employed against the Genes. At least they were borrowed on that pretence.
But afterwards, Lewis XIII. wanting these ships for the siege of Rochel, prevailed with Charles I. by Buckingham's means, that he might employ them where he pleased, and accordingly they were sent to Diego, under the command of Vice-Admiral Pennington (4). The mallers or commanders of these ships, coming to Rochel, they were to go against Rochel, weighed anchor, and were by another from the King ordered to return to the service of the ships, and put them into the hands of the French, which was done accordingly.

But the mariners all deserted, utterly refusing to serve against Rochel.

This affair made great noise at Oxford, where the Parliament was re-assembled. Buckingham's ill conduct in this and other respects was loudly complained of in the House of Commons. It was said, the money granted by the Parliament to the late King had been misapplied, and put to uses very different from those it was intended for. That the Seas were neglected, that the Carriairs had done great damage to the English Merchants. That Popery and Arminianism were countenanced by a strong party in the Kingdom. Nils Bishop of Winchester, and Laud Bishop of St. David's were chiefly looked upon as the heads and protectors of the Arminians (5), nay, as favourers of Popery, by reason of their rigid and passionate zeal for all the Ceremonies of the Church of England, even for such as seemed the least necessary. This zeal appeared to many as mysterious as uncommon, and caused them to suspect, that the two Prelates, under colour of maintaining Religion, had formed a project to restore Popery. They could not imagine, that men should have so strong an attachment to things in themselves of so little moment, with so much hidden design. Wherefore Mr. Montague was summoned a second time before the House of Commons (6), and severely reprimanded.

Mean while, the King seeing the Parliament had spent the three or four first days of their Session in talking of grievances, without any mention of the money he expected for supporting the war, sent for both Houses, and in Christ Church Hall spake to them in the following manner.

My Lords, and you of the Commons,

"I E all remember, that from your desires and advice, my Father, now with God, brake off those two Treaties with Spain that were then in hand:
Well you then foresaw, that as well for regaining my dispossessioned Brother's inheritance, as home defence, a war was likely to succeed; and that as your Councils had led my Father into it, so your assistance in a Parliamentary way to pursue it, should not be wanting.
That aid you gave him by advice, was for succour of his allies, the guarding of Ireland, and the home part supply of munition, preparing and setting forth of his navy. A council you thought of, and appointed for the war, and treasurers for issuing of the monies: and to begin this work of your advice, you gave three Subsidies, and as many Fifteens, which with speed were levied, and by direction of that council of war (in which the preparation of this navy was not the least) disbursed.

"It pleased God at the entrance of this preparation
(by your advice begun) to call my Father to his mercy, whereby I entered as well to the care of your deign, as his Crown. I did not then, as Princes do of custom and formality, re-assemble you, but that by your further advice and aid, I might be able to proceed in that which by your counsels my Father was engaged in.
Your love to me, and forwardness to further those affairs, you expressed by a grant of two Subsidies yet ungathered; although I must assure you, by myself and others upon credit taken up, and beforehand disbursed,

(1) Our Author seems here to confound two distinct things. Montague (in 21 Jac.) published a Book, which he called, A new Gag for an old Goose, being an answer to a popish Book, entitled, A Gag for the new Gospel; and for this Book it was that he was questioned by the Parliament, and committed to the Archbishop, who dismissed him with an Almonition. Afterwards the Bishops of the diocese of London, the Propagation of the five Articles condemned at the Synod of Dort, concluded, that Montague should publish his Appeal to Caesar. It is attested by their own Authorities, which they afterwards withdrew by falsity. However, the Book was printed and dedicated to King Charles I. The House appointed a Committee to examine the merits, and thanked the Archbishop for his admonition formerly to the Author, and voted him a censure. Rushworth, Tom. I. p. 173.

(2) Rapin, by mistake, says Bath and Wells, which he was not yet.

(3) The charges of which, by computation, amounted to 700,000 l. a year. Rushworth, Tom. I. p. 174.

(4) The Pinguard, a large Man of War, with seven other Merchant-ships of great burden and strength. Ibid. Coke, p. 174.

(5) Rapin, as well as most of our Writers, especially those of the Puritan Party, seem to confound two things, which have no manner of relation to each other, viz. Arminianism and High-Church-Principles. The Arminian Doctrine, condemned by the Synod of Dort, held in 1618, was in substance identical with these five Articles. I. God does not in an arbitrary manner predestinate any Person to be saved or damned. II. Christ died for all men, that is, all who were towards our good actions, yet, IV. It is not to be supposed, that if we are still Free-Agents; consequently, V. The faithful may finally fall away, or be lost from a state of Grace. Now nothing can be more evident, than that a man may embrace all these opinions, without being one, or the more a Free-Willer, or a Popery or Arbitrary Power. We are, though the first affectus of Arminianism happened likewise to be zealous Sticklers for maintaining like a deep Power in the King, yet the consequence at all of the other, as abundance of our High Church men would intimate. Doubtless, Laud, Dicks, Montague, and the rest, who were for sitting the King above the Laws, would have been of that number, whether they had been Arminians or not. Even at this time the five Articles above, which are now generally received in the Church of England, are believed by thousands, who are not Arminians. Arminianism is the King or Church beyond its due bounds. The reason why Arminianism was condemned at the Synod of Dort, was because it was a Calvinistical Homilies (in the points above-mentioned) were generally understood in a Calvinistical sense.

(6) According to the condition of his Bond. Montague's cause was recommended to the Duke of Buckingham, by the Bishop of Rochel, Henry Bishop of Oxford, and Lord of St. David's, who observed, That learned men ought to be left to abound in their own Science, and not to be troubled with the Council of Trent, require a subtle pen to school-opinions, &c. See Rushworth, Tom. I. p. 174.

1625. "as and far short, as yet to set forth that navy now preparing; as I have lately the estimate of those of care, and who are still employed about it, whose particular of all expences about this preparation shall be given you, when you please to take an account of it."

When the King had done speaking, [the Lord Conway and Sir John Coke] Secretaries of State made Speeches; the design whereof, like that of the King's, was to demonstrate the absolute necessity the Commons were under, to grant his Majesty a large sum for the war wherein he was engaged. They forgot not to repeat that the war was begun by the late King, by the advice of both Houses of Parliament, for this was what the King considered as an unanswerable reason. But the Parliament being now better informed how the King and Duke procured that advice from the former Parliament, these two Speeches produced no great effect. The Commons being returned to their House, proceeded to examine Grievances, and in this examination divers complaints were made against the Duke of Buckingham. It was also complained, that Popery was not only tolerated, but even countenanced, contrary to the King's express promise: That pardons were granted to Recusants, signed by the Lord Conway Secretary of State, who pretended to be authorized by the King, and that these pardons stopped the course of justice, and the execution of the Laws. Whereupon the King thought himself obliged to return positive answers to the Petition presented to him at London by the two Houses, to which he had hitherto only answered in general. It is absolutely necessary to insert here the Petition, with the King's Answers to each article, that the Reader may the better judge how the King's promises were afterwards performed.

Petition against Recusants, with the King's Answers to each Article.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

"IT being infallibly true, that nothing can more establish the throne, and assure the peace and prosperity of the people, than the unity and sincerity of Religion; we your most humble and loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons of this present Parliament assembled, hold ourselves bound in conscience and duty to represent the same to your sacred Majesty, together with the dangerous consequences of the increase of Popery in this land, and what we conceive to be the principal causes thereof, and what may be the remedies.

The Dangers appear in these particulars.

"I. In their desperate ends, being, both the subversion of the Church and State, and the restlessness of their spirits to attain these ends; the doctrine of their teachers and leaders, persuading them that therein they do God good service.

"II. Their evident and strict dependency upon such foreign Princes, as no way affect the good of your Majesty and this State.

"III. The opening a way of popularity to the ambition of any who shall adventure to make himself head of so great a Party.

The principal cause of the increase of Papists.

"I. The want of the due execution of the Laws against Jesuits, Seminary-Priests, and Popish Recusants; occasioned partly by the connivency of the State, partly by defects in the Laws themselves, and partly by the manifold abuse of officers.

"II. The interposing of foreign Princes by their Ambassadors and Agents in favour of them.

"III. Their great concourse to the City, and frequent conferences and conventicles there.

"IV. The open and usual resort to the houses and chapels of foreign Ambassadors.

"V. The education of their children in seminaries, and houses of their Religion in foreign parts, which of late have been greatly multiplied and enlarged for the entertainment of the English.

"VI. That in some places of your Realm, your People be not sufficiently instructed in the knowledge of true religion.

"VII. The licentious printing and dispersing of Popish and seditious Books.

"VIII. The employment of men ill-affected in Religion in places of government, who do, shall, or may, countenance the Popish-Party.

The Remedies against this outrageous and dangerous disease are conceived to be these ensuing.

"I. That the youth of this Realm be carefully educated

No. LVI. VOL. II.

1625. "by able and religious School-masters, and they to be enjoined to catechize and instruct their Scholars in the grounds and principles of true Religion. And whereas by many complaints from divers parts of the Kingdom, it doth plainly appear, that sundry Popish Scholars, dissenting their Religion, have craftily crept in, and obtained the places of teaching in divers Counties, and thereby infected and perverted their Scholars, and so fitted them to be transported to the Popish Seminaries beyond the seas; that therefore there be great care in choice and admitting School-masters, and that the ordinaries make diligent enquiries of their demeanors, and proceed to the removing of such as shall be faulty; or justly suspected.

His Majesty's Answer.

This is well allowed of; and for the better performance of what is desired, Letters shall be written to the two Archbishops, and from them, Letters to go to all the ordinaries of their several Provinces to see this done; the several ordinaries to give account of their doings herein to the Archbishops respectively, and they to give account to his Majesty of their proceedings herein.

"II. That the ancient Discipline of the Universities be restored, being the famous nurseries of literature and virtue.

Answer. This is approved by his Majesty, and the Chancellor of each University shall be required to cause due execution of it.

"III. That special care be taken to enlarge the word of God, throughout all the parts of your Majesty's Dominions, as being the most powerful means for planting of true Religion, and rooting out of the contrary: To which end, among other things, let it please your Majesty to advise your Bishops, by fatherly intreaty and tender usage, to reduce to the peaceable and orderly service of the Church, such able Ministers as have been formerly silenced, that there may be a profitable use of their Ministry in these needful and dangerous times; and that Non-residency, Pluralities, and Commendams, may be moderated. Where we cannot forbear, most humbly to thank your Majesty for diminishing the number of your own Chaplains; not doubting of the like princely care for the well-bestowing of the rest of your benefices, both to the comfort of the People, and the encouragement of the Universities; being full of grave and able Ministers unfurnished of Livings.

Answer. This his Majesty likes well, so as it be applied to such Ministers as are peaceable, orderly, and conformable to the Church-Government. For Pluralities and Non-residencies, they are now so moderated, that the Archbishops affirm, there be now no dispensation for Pluralities granted; nor no man now is allowed above two Benefices, and those not above thirty miles distant: And for avoiding non-residence, the Canon in that case provided, shall be duly put in execution. For Commendams, they shall be sparingly granted, only in such case where the exility and smallness of the Bishoprick requireth. Also his Majesty will cause that the Benefices belonging to him shall be well bestowed. And for the better propagating of Religion, his Majesty recommendeth to the House of Parliament, that care may be taken, and provision made, that every Parish shall allow a competent maintenance for an able Minister; and that the Owners of Parsonages Impropriate would allow to the Vicars, Curates, and Ministers in Villages and Places belonging to their Parsonage, sufficient Stipend and Allowance for Preaching Ministers.

"IV. That there may be strict provision against transporting of English Children to the Seminaries beyond the Seas, and for the recalling of them who are already there placed, and for the punishment of such your Subjects as are maintainers of those Seminaries, or of the Scholars; considering, that besides the seducing of your people, great sums of Money are yearly expended upon them, to the impoverishing of this Kingdom.

Answer. The Law in this case shall be put in execution: And farther, there shall be Letters written to the Lord-Treasurer, and also to the Lord-Admiral, That all the Ports of this Realm, and the creeks and members thereof be strictly kept, and strait searches made to this end: A Proclamation shall be, to recal both the Children of Noblemen, and the Children of any other men, and they to return by a day; also maintainers of Seminaries of Scholars there, shall be punished according to Law.

"V. That no popish Recusant be permitted to come within the Court, unless your Majesty be pleased to call him upon special occasion, agreeable to the Statute of 3 Jac. And whereas your Majesty for the preventing of apparent mischiefs both to your Majesty and the State, hath in your Princely wisdom taken order, that none of your natural-born Subjects, not professing the true Religion, as by Law established, be admitted into the service of your Royal-Consort the Queen. We give 1625. " your Majesty most humble thanks, and desire that your order herein may be observed.

Answer. If his Majesty shall find, or be informed of any concurrence of Recusants to the Court, the Law shall be strictly followed: And his Majesty is pleased, that by Proclamation the British and Irish Subjects shall be put in the same case. And as his Majesty hath provided in his Treaty with France, so his purpose is to keep it, That none of his Subjects shall be admitted into his service, or into the service of his Royal Consort the Queen, that are popish Recusants.

" VI. That all the Laws now standing in force against Jesuits, seminary Priests, and others, having taken orders by authority derived from the See of Rome, be put in due execution. And to the intent they may not pretend to be surprized, that a speedy and certain day be prefixed by your Majesty's Proclamation, for their departure out of this Realm, and all other your Dominions, and not to return upon the severest penalties of the Laws now in force against them; and that all your Majesty's Subjects may be thereby admonished, not to receive, comfort, entertain, or conceal, any of them, upon the penalties which may be lawfully inflicted: And that all such Papists, Jesuits, and Recusants, who are and shall be imprisoned for recusancy, or any other cause, may be so strictly restrained, as that none shall have conference with them, thereby to avoid the contagion of their corrupt Religion: And that no man that shall be suspected of Popery, be suffered to be a Keeper of any of his Majesty's prisons.

Answer. The Law in this case shall be put in execution, and a Proclamation shall be to the effect desired; and such restraint shall be made, as is desired, and no man that is justly suspected of Popery, shall be suffered to be a Keeper of any of his Majesty's Prisons.

" VII. That your Majesty be pleased to take such order as to your Princely wisdom shall be expedient, that no natural born Subject, or strange Bishops, nor any other by authority from the See of Rome, confer any Ecclesiastical orders, to exercise any Ecclesiastical function whatsoever, toward or upon your Majesty's natural Subjects within your Dominions.

Answer. This is fit to be ordered according as is provided, and it shall be so published by Proclamation.

" VIII. That your Majesty's learned Council may receive order and commandment, to consider of all former Grants of Recusants Lands, that such of them may be avoided as are made to the Recusants use or interest, out of which the Recusant receiveth any benefit, which are either void, or voidable by the Law.

Answer. The King will give order to his learned Council to consider of the Grants, and will do according as is desired.

" IX. That your Majesty will be likewise pleased strictly to command all your Judges and Ministers of Justice, Ecclesiastical and Temporal, to see the Laws of this Realm against Popish Recusants, to be duly executed; and namely, that the censure of excommunication be declared and certified against them; and that they be not absolved upon public satisfaction by yielding to conformity.

Answer. His Majesty leaves the Laws to their course, and will order in the point of excommunication as is desired.

" X. That your Majesty will be pleased to remove from places of authority and government, all such persons, as are either popish Recusants, or according to direction of former Acts of State, to be justly suspected.

Answer. This his Majesty thinks fit, and will give order for it.

" XI. That present order be taken for disarming all popish Recusants, legally convicted, or justly suspected, according to the Laws in that behalf, and the orders taken by his late Majesty's Privy-Council upon reason of State.

Answer. The Laws and Acts in this case shall be followed, and put in due execution.

" XII. That your Majesty be also pleased in respect to the great resort of Recusants, to and about London, to command forthwith, upon pain of your indignation, and severe execution of the Laws, that they retire themselves to their several Countries, there to remain confined within five miles of their places.

Answer. For this the Laws in force shall be forthwith executed.

" XIII. And whereas your Majesty hath strictly commanded and taken order, that none of the natural born Subjects repair to the hearing of masses, or other superstitious service at the Chapels, or Houses of foreign Ambassadors, or in any other places whatsoever; we give your Majesty most humble thanks, and desire that your order and commandment therein may be continued and observed, and that the offenders therein be punished according to the Laws.

Answer. The King gives assent thereto, and will see that observed which herein hath been commanded by him.

" XIV. That all such incontinencies, as any that are Popishly affected, have lately committed, or shall hereafter commit, to the dishonour of our Religion, or to the wrong of the true professors thereof, be exemplarily punished.

Answer. This shall be done as is desired.

" XV. That the Statute of 1 Eliz. for the payment of twelve pence every Sunday, by such as shall be absent from divine service in the Church, without a lawful excuse, may be put in due execution, the rather, for that the penalty by Law is given to the poor, and therefore not to be dispensed withal.

Answer. It is fit that this Statute be executed, and the penalties shall not be dispensed withal.

" XVI. Lastly, That your Majesty would be pleased to extend your Princely care also over the Kingdom of Ireland, that the like courses may be there taken for the restoring and establishing of true Religion.

Answer. His Majesty's cares are, and shall be, extended over the Kingdom of Ireland; and he will do all that a religious King should do for the restoring and establishing of true Religion there.

" And thus (most gracious Sovereign) according to our duty and zeal to God and Religion, to your Majesty and your safety, to the Church and commonwealth, and their Peace and prosperity, we have made a faithful Declaration of the present estate, the causes and remedies of this increasing disease of Popery; humbly offering the same to your princely care and wisdom. The answer of your Majesty's Father, our late Sovereign of famous memory upon the like petition, did give us great comfort of reformation; but your Majesty's most gracious promises made in that kind, do give us confidence and assurance of the continual performance thereof. In which comfort and confidence reposing ourselves, we most humbly pray for your Majesty's long continuance in all princely felicity."

These gracious answers of the King to the several Articles of the Petition of both Houses, wanted only the performance of the promises. But if it may be judged by the continual complaints of the Parliaments throughout this whole reign, concerning these same articles, on which the King seems to have given entire satisfaction, it will easily be seen that Charles's promises were no better performed than his Father's. The King expected, that his answers to the Petition would gain him the affection of the Commons. But these answers, though so gracious and positive, could not engage them to do what he desired, that is, to lay aside all other business, and think only of granting him money. He was engaged in a war, to which he pretended the Parliament had induced his late Majesty, from whence he inferred, it was great injustice not to enable him speedily to support it. This was true in one sense. The Parliament advised King James to break off the Treaties with Spain, and promised to assist him in case the breach should occasion a war, as it was very likely. But, on the other side, it was now no longer a secret in England, that the former Parliament was moved to give such advice to the King, by the Duke of Buckingham's narrative, a narrative false in every particular, though attested by the late King and the Prince. So the former Parliament's advice being grounded on a wrong foundation, and as I may say, extorted by a mere artifice, the present Parliament did not think themselves obliged to perform very punctually a promise which the Court had obtained rather by art, than fairly stating the case. Nevertheless, this promise still subsisted; and if the Commons had shewn the publick they were not obliged to keep it, they could not have done it without grievously affronting the King, by the discovery of the artifices he had used to procure it. They were willing to avoid this extremity. And therefore, letting the promise subsist without any disobliging reflection on the King, their aim was to excuse themselves from granting him fresh supplies for a war rashly undertaken, and without any likelihood of success. At least, if they should be forced to give any more money, rather than enter into a discussion of causes which had engaged the Kingdom in this war, they intended the King should purchase them, in some measure, with the redress of the grievances, the Nation groaned under. Wherefore, instead of the Money-Bill, as the King desired, they began with examining and even inquiring after the grievances of the Nation, and the state of Religion (1). In this examination, the Duke of Buckingham and the rest of the Ministers were not spared.

The King seeing what course the Commons were ta-

1 They resolved, that Religion should have the first place in their Debates, and then Supplies.

The Commons Declaration

The dissolution of the Parliament hindered not the King from pursuing his design of continuing, or rather of beginning the war with Spain. For though the late King

The King, finding himself without money, and consequently unable to continue the war, resolved at length to call a new Parliament. But to avoid the inconvenience of sitting in the Lower-House such members as had most opposed him, and exclaimed against the Duke in the late Parliament, the Court invented this Stratagem. All these persons were made Sheriffs, and so could not be chosen Members of Parliament. Sir Edward Coke was of this number: but however he and some others were chosen, preferring the service they owed their Country in Parliament to that which they could render it as Sheriffs (5). The Parliament was therefore summoned to meet on the 6th of February 1625-6, and on the 2d being Candlemas-day the King was crowned by Archbishop Abbot; William Laud Bishop of Bath and Wells, the King's favorite Bishop, officiating as Dean of Westminster, in the room of Bishop Williams, who, through the King's disfavour, was sequestrated from this service (6). Before the Coronation, the King ordered by proclamation all such as had forty pounds days by mistake. The Abbots of Wigmore, it seems, had formerly, and afterwards the Deans, a considerable share in the Solemnities of the Coronation. The 1625-6. The King seeing the Commons bent upon the examination of Religious matters, ordered his Attorney-General to acquaint the Judges [of the Circuits] that it was his pleasure they should proceed with rigour against Recusants. He had promised this six months before, in his answer to the former Parliament's Petition: but, in all appearance, this article had been neglected, by the Court, or by those who were commissioned to execute the orders. 'Tis certain, during this reign, such kind of orders were never punctually executed.

The King had demanded a supply of Money to carry on the War; but the Commons were in no haste to grant it. On the contrary, they still proceeded in the examination of grievances, and, among others, of certain reprisals made upon France, with too much precipitation, to the great damage of the English Merchants (1). The Council of War, appointed by the Parliament to manage the three Subsidies granted to King James, were also obliged to give an account of their conduct.

The King bearing this delay very impatiently, pressed the Commons to consider of the supply. The Lords also endeavoured to persuade them to it, in a conference which they desired on this occasion, but it was to no purpose. On the contrary, they heard the Report of the Committee concerning the Nation's Grievances, wherein they had always the Duke of Buckingham in view, and even caused him to be informed of the articles on which the complaints against him were grounded. Whereupon the King sent a Letter to the Speaker, with a message to the House by Sir Richard Weston.

Trusty and Well-beloved,

“HAvING assembled the Parliament early in the beginning of the year, for the more timely help and advice of our People in our great and important affairs; and having of late, not only by message, but also of ourselves, put our House of Commons in mind of our pressing occasions, and of the present estate of Christendom, wherein they have equal interest with us, as well in respect of their own former engagements, as of the common cause; we shall not need to tell them with what care and patience we have in the midst of our necessities attended their resolutions; but because their unreasonable slowness may produce at home as ill effects as a denial, and hazard the whole estate of things abroad; we have thought fit by you the Speaker, to let them know, that without more loss of time, we look for a full and perfect answer of what they will give for our supply, according to our expectation; and their promises; wherein, as we press for nothing beyond the present state and condition of our subjects, so we accept no less than is proportionable to the greatness and goodness of the cause: Neither do we press them to a present resolution in this, with a purpose to precipitate their counsels, much less to enter upon their privileges, but to shew that it is unfit to depend any longer upon uncertainties, whereby the whole weight of the affairs of Christendom may break in upon us upon the sudden, to our dishonour, and the shame of this nation. And for the business at home, we command you to promise them in our name, that after they have satisfied us in this our reasonable demand, we shall not only continue them together at this time, so long as the season will permit, but call them shortly again to perfect those necessary businesses which shall be now left undone; and now we shall willingly apply fit and seasonable remedies, to such just grievances which they shall present unto us in a dutiful and mannerly way, without throwing an ill odour upon our present government, or upon the government of our late blessed Father. And if there be yet who desire to find fault, we shall think him the wisest reprehender of errors past, who, without reflecting backward, can give us counsel how to settle the present estate of things, and, to provide for the future safety and honour of the Kingdom.”

The message brought at the same time and delivered to the House by Weston, contained five articles of expence to be provided for, namely,

“1. That his Majesty's fleet being returned, and the victuals spent, the men must of necessity be discharged, and their wages paid, or else an assured mutiny will follow, which may be many ways dangerous at this time.”

“2. That his Majesty hath made ready about forty ships, to be set forth on a second voyage, to hinder the enemy, which want only victuals and some men, which,

“without present supply of money, cannot be set forth, and kept together.”

“3. That the army which is appointed in every coast, must presently be disbanded, if they be not presently supplied with victuals and clothes.”

“4. That if the companies of Ireland, lately sent thither, be not provided for, instead of defending that Country, they will prove the authors of Rebellion.”

“5. That the season of providing healthful victuals will be past, if this month be neglected.”

And therefore his Majesty commandeth me to tell you, that he desired to know, without further delaying of mine, what Supply you will give him for these his present occasions, that he may accordingly frame his course and counsel.

The Commons were not very well pleased with the Letter or Message, wherein were several things they could not approve. 1. The manner of demanding the supply, which showed it to be not so much a free-gift on their part as an obligation. 2. The King set them a time, by ordering it to be done without delay, and before all other things. 3. He would not accept of less than was necessary, and this could relate only to the five Articles of expence, which was properly specifying to them the sum they were to give. 4. The King demanded money with an extraordinary and unprecedented haughtiness. 5. The King grounded his demands upon King James's promise to the last Parliament, a promise fraudulently obtained by the Duke of Buckingham's false narration. 6. The war, for which so much money was to be given, had been rashly undertaken, at a time when there was no prospect of success, and the King, and Duke of Buckingham were known to be the authors of it, though the King perpetually insisted upon the Parliament's advice to his Father. Had it been undertaken, at the beginning of the quarrel between the King of Bohemia and the Emperour, or even before the loss of the Palatinate, when there was room to hope for the assistance of the Protestant Princes, it might have been expected to be crowned with success. But it was begun at a time, when all the Princes of Germany were either subdued by, or united with the Emperour, at a time when there was not a single place left that might afford the English entrance into the Palatinate, or could possibly be approached by them. How then could it be expected to wrest the two Palatinates from the Emperour and Duke of Bavaria? The whole therefore was reduced to the attacking of the Spaniard. Upon what account? It was either to oblige him to use his interest for the restitution of the Palatinate, in which case a war was needless, since he had promised his mediation, and even engaged to render it effectual, before the breach of the marriage. Or else, to constrain him to employ his arms in wresting the Palatinates from the two Princes in possession, a project which appeared extravagant, and would have drained England of men and money to no purpose. Besides, the late expedition of the fleet was no great encouragement to prosecute this undertaking. 7. Finally, though the Commons did not care openly to enter into all these discussions, they were willing however to shew the King, they did not mean to be amused with a promise extorted by a mere artifice, and, if they granted him money, would reap at least the advantage of procuring the redress of the national grievances. But the King took care to shut that door against them, by deferring the redress of the grievances to another time. As they perceived, and the King himself intimated to them, that the desired supply would not be the last, they could not be sure, but in the next Session of Parliament the King would again expect the money-bill to pass before the grievances, and so there would be no end. These were the true reasons of the tardiness of the Commons, and their little ardor for the King's affairs, though they would not openly declare then for fear of engaging in debates offensive to his Majesty. Nevertheless they were willing to intimate them to him, and, very likely, he perceived them well enough, though it was thought proper on both sides to conceal them from the publick. For this cause the Commons resolved to send an answer to the King's message, full of respect, submission, expressions of their zeal for his service, and even promises of aiding him in his wants, though in a general manner. But without, they artfully intimated to him, that redress of grievances ought to precede the supply they intended to grant him. Their answer was as follows:

Most gracious Sovereign,

“YOUR Majesty's dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Commons now assembled in Parliament, in all humility, present unto your royal wisdom, this their

(1) It seems a Report was made in the House, That the reason why our Merchants Ships, and Goods were seized in France, was, because Sir James Bagg, Vice-Admiral for Cornwall, and others, had seized upon the Goods of the French in our Ports, particularly a Ship called the State of Newburgh, by Dutch registers order, after the King and Council had ordered the Ship to be released upon a just Claim. That twenty three bags of Silver, and eight of Gold, were by Sir Francis Steward delivered to the Duke, who said, he would justify the stay of the Ship by order from the King. Rushworth, Tom. 1. p. 213.

1625-6. "loyal answer to the message, which your Majesty was pleased by the Chancellor of your Exchequer to send unto them, desiring to know, without any further deferring of time, what supply they would give to your Majesty, for your present and extraordinary occasions, that you might accordingly frame your courses and counsels. First of all, they most humbly beseech your Majesty, to know and rest assured, that no King was ever dearer to his People than your Majesty; no People more zealous to maintain and advance the honor and greatness of their King than they; which, as upon all occasions they shall be ready to express, so especially in the support of that cause, wherein your Majesty and your Allies are now justly engaged. And because they cannot doubt, but your Majesty in your great wisdom, even out of justice, and according to the example of your most famous predecessors, will be pleased graciously to accept the faithful and necessary information and advice of your Parliament, which can have no end but the service of your Majesty, and safety of your realm, in discovering the causes, and proposing the remedies of these great evils, which have occasioned your Majesty's wants, and your People's grief.

"They therefore in confidence and full assurance of redress therein, do with one consent propose (though in former time such course hath been unused) that they really intend to assist and supply your Majesty in such a way, and in so ample a measure, as may make you safe at home, and feared abroad; for the dispatch whereof they will use such diligence as your Majesty's pressing and present occasions shall require."

The King fully perceived the intention of the House in sending him this answer. But he had not the same reasons as the Commons to be reserved in his expressions. It was rather his interest to speak freely, for fear, by dissembling his principles and pretensions, he should encourage the Commons to attack the Duke of Buckingham, who was counted the prime author of the grievances. His Majesty therefore makes this reply to the Commons answer.

Mr. Speaker,

The King's
Reply.
Rushworth.
T. I. p. 216.

"THE answer of the Commons delivered by you, I like well of, and do take it for a full and satisfactory answer, and I thank them for it, and I hope you will with all expedition take a course for performance thereof, the which will turn to your own good as well as mine; but for your clause therein, of presenting of grievances, I take that but for a parenthesis in your Speech, and not a condition; and yet for answer to that part, I will tell you, I will be as willing to hear your grievances, as my predecessors have been, so that you will apply yourselves to redress grievances, and not to enquire after grievances. I must let you know, that I will not allow any of my Servants to be questioned amongst you, much less such as are of eminent place, and near unto me. The old question was, What shall be done to the man whom the King will honour? But now it hath been the labour of some, to seek what may be done against him whom the King thinks fit to honour. I see you specially aim at the Duke of Buckingham; I wonder what hath so altered your affections towards him. I do well remember, that in the last Parliament in my Father's time, when he was the instrument to break the Treaties, all of you (and yet I cannot say all, for I know some of you are changed, but yet the House of Commons is always the same) did so much honour and respect him, that all the honour conferred on him was too little; and what he hath done since to alter and change your minds, I wot not; but can assure you, he hath not meddled, or done any thing concerning the Publick or Commonwealth, but by special directions and appointment, and as my servant; and is so far from gaining or improving his estate thereby, that I verily think he hath rather impaired the same. I would you would haften for my Supply, or else it will be worse for yourselves; for if any ill happen, I think I shall be the last shall feel it."

Buckingham's conduct.
Rushworth.
T. I. p. 217.

This Letter hindered not the Commons from proceeding in the examination of the Duke of Buckingham's conduct, it being resolved to impeach him in form. The question was moved by Dr. Turner [a Physician.] Whether common Fame be a good ground of proceeding for the House? This question was decided in the affirmative, after consulting some Lawyers (1), at which the King was extremely offended, and showed his displeasure to the Commons, demanding withal, that Turner might be punished for moving such a question (2). But this message signified but little, and the House still continuing to proceed against the Duke, it was the general opinion of the Members that, in granting the King money, the redress of the grievances was not to be neglected.

Mean while, to take from the King the pretence, which all these delays might furnish him with, the Commons unanimously voted him three Subsidies and three Fifteenths, to which, a month after, was added a fourth Subsidy. Moreover they fixed the payment of the first to the last day of June (3). Nothing is a clearer evidence of the design ascribed by me to the Commons, namely, that in granting money to the King, they meant to render their liberality subservient to the redress of grievances. By this expedient they showed the publick, how ready they were to assist the King in his necessities; but whilst referred to themselves the liberty of passing this vote into an Act, (without which it was of no use to the King) when they should think fit. Now, according to their intention, this Act was not to pass till grievances were presented to, and answered by the King. Thus he was deprived of the pretence to complain of their delays, though indeed what they did for him could be advantageous to him, but on supposition he would regard their desires. This greatly embarrassed the King. He plainly saw the Commons design, and was the more offended, as all their proceedings were levelled at the Duke of Buckingham, or rather at the King himself, who had publicly declared, the Duke had only followed his orders, without being able to prevail for his being left unmolested. As he found they acted with too little respect, he resolved to let them know how much he was displeased with their proceedings, doubtless, to frighten them into another course. He sent therefore for both Houses to Whitehall, where he made the following Speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Have called you hither to day, I mean both Houses of Parliament; but it is for several and distinct reasons: My Lords, you of the Upper-House, to give you thanks for the care of the state of the Kingdom now; and not only for the care of your own proceedings, but enticing your Fellow-House of the Commons, to take that into their consideration. Therefore, (my Lords) I must not only give you thanks, but I must also avow, that if this Parliament do not redound to the good of this Kingdom, (which I pray God it may,) it is not your faults. And you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, I am sorry that I may not justly give the same thanks to you; but that I must tell you, that I am come here to shew you your errors, and, as I may call it, unparliamentary proceedings in this Parliament. But I do not despair, because you shall see your faults so clearly by the Lord-Keeper, that you may so amend your proceeding, that this Parliament shall end comfortably and happily, though at the beginning it hath had some rubs."

Then the Lord-Keeper, by the King's command spoke next.

My Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeesses of the House of Commons.

"YOU are here assembled by his Majesty's commandment, to receive a Declaration of his Royal Pleasure; which although it be intended only to the House of Commons, yet his Majesty hath thought meet, the matter being of great weight and importance, it should be delivered in the presence of both Houses, and both Houses make one general Council: And his Majesty is willing, that the Lords should be witnesses of the honour and justice of his resolutions. And therefore the errand, which by his Majesty's direction I must deliver, hath relation to the House of Commons. I must address my self therefore to you, Mr. Speaker, and the rest of that House."

"And first, his Majesty would have you to understand, that there was never any King more loving to his people, or better affectioned to the right use of Parliaments, than his Majesty hath approved himself to be, not only by his long patience since the sitting down of this Parliament, but by those mild and calm directions which from time to time that House hath received by message and letter, and from his royal mouth; when the irregular humours of some particular persons wrought diversions and distractions there, to the disturbance of Speech.

1. Sir Thomas Widdoworth, Mr. Noy, Mr. Selden, and others. Whitehall, p. 2.
The King, in this message, demanded justice also against Mr. Clement Coke, Sir Edward's Son, and Member for Aylesbury, who told in the House, that he was detest by an enemy, than to suffer at home. Rushworth, Tom. II. p. 218.
And the last of October. Idem, p. 222.

1626. "those great and weighty affairs, which the necessity of the times, the honour and safety of the King and Kingdom, called upon. And therefore his Majesty doth assure you, that when these great affairs are settled, and that his Majesty hath received satisfaction of his reasonable demands, he will, as a just King, hear and answer your just Grievances, which in a dutiful way shall be presented unto him; and this his Majesty doth avow.

"Next his Majesty would have you know of a surety, That as never any King was more loving to his people, nor better affectioned to the right use of Parliaments, so never King more jealous of his honour, nor more sensible of the neglect and contempt of his Royal Rights, which his Majesty will by no means suffer to be violated by any pretended colour of parliamentary liberty; wherein his Majesty doth not forget, that the Parliament is his Council, and therefore ought to have the liberty of a Council; but his Majesty understands the difference betwixt Council and controlling, and between liberty, and the abuse of liberty.

"This being set down in general, his Majesty hath commanded me to relate some particular passages and proceedings, whereat he finds himself aggrieved.

"First, Whereas a seditious Speech was uttered amongst you by Mr. Coke, the House did not, as they ought to do, censure and correct him. And when his Majesty understanding it, did, by a message by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, delivered to the House, require justice of you, his Majesty hath since found nothing but protracting and delays. This his Majesty holds not agreeable to the wisdom and the duty which he expected from the House of Commons.

"Secondly, Whereas Doctor Turner, in a strange unparliamentary way, without any ground of knowledge in himself, or offering any particular proof of the House, did take upon him to advise the House to enquire upon sundry Articles against the Duke of Buckingham, as he pretended, but in truth, to wound the honour and government of his Majesty, and of his renowned Father; and his Majesty, first by a message, and after by his own royal mouth, did declare, That that course of enquiry was an example which by no way he could suffer, though it were against his meanest servant, much less against one so near him; and that his Majesty did much wonder at the foolish insolvency of any man, that can think, that his Majesty should be drawn out of any end to offer such a sacrifice, so unworthy of a King, or a good master; yet for all this, you have been so far from correcting the insolvency of Turner, that ever since that time your Committees have walked in the steps of Turner, and proceeded in an unparliamentary inquisition, running upon generals, and repeating that whereof you have made fame the ground-work. Here his Majesty hath cause to be exceeding sensible, that upon every particular he finds the honour of his Father stained and blemished, and his own no less; and withal you have manifested a great forwardness, rather to pluck out of his bosom those who are near about him, and whom his Majesty hath cause to affect, than to trust his Majesty with the future reformation of these things which you seem to aim at: And yet you cannot deny but his Majesty hath wrought a greater reformation in matters of Religion, execution of the Laws, and concerning things of great importance, than the shortness of his Reign (in which he hath been hindered, partly through sickness, and the distraction of things, which we could have wished had been otherwise) could produce.

"Concerning the Duke of Buckingham, his Majesty hath commanded me to tell you, That himself doth better know than any man living, the sincerity of the Duke's proceedings; with what cautions of weight and discretion he hath been guided in his publick employments, from his Majesty and his blessed Father; what enemies he hath procured at home and abroad; what peril of his person, and hazard of his estate, he ran into, for the service of his Majesty, and his ever-blessed Father; and how forward he hath been in the service of this House, many times since his return from Spain. And therefore his Majesty cannot believe, that the aim is at the Duke of Buckingham, but findeth that these proceedings do directly wound the honour and judgment of himself, and of his Father. It is therefore his Majesty's express and final commandment, that you yield obedience unto those directions which you have formerly received, and cease this unparliamentary inquisition, and commit unto his Majesty's care, and wisdom, and justice, the future reformation of these things which you suppose to be otherwise than they should be: And his Majesty is resolved, that before the end of this Session, he will set such a course, both for the amending of any thing that may be found amiss, and for the settling of his own estate, as he doubteth not but will give you ample satisfaction and comfort.

"Next to this, his Majesty takes notice, that you have suffered the greatest Council of State to be censured and traduced in the House, by men whose years and education cannot attain to that depth: That foreign businesses have been entertained in the House, to the hinderance and disadvantage of his Majesty's Negotiations: That the same year, yea, the first day of his Majesty's inauguration, you suffered his Council, Government, and Servants, to be paralleled with the times of most exception: That your Committees have presumed to examine the Letters of Secretaries of State, nay, his own; and sent a general warrant to his Signet-office, and commanded his officers, not only to produce and shew the Records, but their Books and private Notes, which they made for his Majesty's service. This his Majesty holds as unsufferable, and it was in former times unusual.

"Next I am to speak concerning your Supply of three Subsidies, and three Fifteenths, which you have agreed to tender to his Majesty. You have been made acquainted with the greatness of his affairs, both at home and abroad, with the strong preparation of the enemy, with the importance of upholding his Allies, strengthening and securing both England and Ireland; besides the encountering and annoying the enemy by a powerful fleet at Sea, and the charge of all: This having been calculated unto you, you have professed unto his Majesty, by the mouth of your Speaker, your carefulness to support the cause wherein his Majesty and his Allies are justly engaged; your unanimous content and real intention to supply his Majesty in such a measure as should make him safe at home, and feared abroad; and that in the dispatch hereof, you would use such diligence as his Majesty's pressing and present occasions did require.

"And now his Majesty having erected a proceeding suitable to this engagement, he doth observe, that in two days only of twelve, this business was thought of, and not begun till his Majesty by a message put you in mind of it, whilst your inquisition against his Majesty's direction proceeded day by day.

"And for the measure of this supply, his Majesty findeth it so far from making himself safe at home, and feared abroad; as contrariwise it exposeth him both to danger and disesteem; for his Majesty cannot expect, without better help, but that his Allies must presently disband, and leave him alone to bear the fury of a provoked and powerful enemy: So as both he and you shall be unsafe at home, and ashamed and despised abroad. And for the manner of the supply, it is in itself very dishonourable, and full of distrust; for although you have avoided the literal word of a condition, whereof his Majesty himself did warn you, when he told you of your parenthesis; yet you have put to it the effect of a condition, since the Bill is not come into your House until your grievances be both preferred and answered. No such thing was in that expression and engagement delivered by your Speaker, for which his Majesty holdeth, that you have receded both in matter and manner, to his great disadvantage and dishonour. And therefore his Majesty commandeth, that you go together, and by Saturday next return your final answer, what further supply you will add to this you have already agreed on, and that to be without condition, either directly or indirectly, for the supply of these great and important affairs of his Majesty; which for the reasons formerly made known unto you, can endure no longer delay; and if you shall not by that time resolve on a more ample supply, his Majesty cannot expect a supply this way, nor promise you to sit longer together; otherwise, if you do it, his Majesty is well content that you should sit so long as the season of the year will permit; and doth assure you, that the present addition to your supply to set forward the work, shall be no hinderance to your speedy access again.

"His Majesty hath commanded me to add this, That therein he doth expect your cheerful obedience, which will put a happy issue to this meeting, and will enable his Majesty, not only to a defensive war, but to employ his Subjects in foreign actions, whereby will be added to them both experience, safety, and honour.

"Last of all, his Majesty hath commanded me, in explanation of the gracious goodness of his royal intention, to say unto you. That he doth well know, that there are among you many wise and well tempered men, well affected to the publick, and to his Majesty's service; and that those that are willingly faulty are not many: And for the rest his Majesty doubteth not, but after his gracious admonition, they will, in due time, observe and follow the better sort; which if they shall 1626. "do, his Majesty is most ready to forget whatsoever is past.

Then his Majesty spoke again.

"I must wish put you in mind a little of times past; you may remember, that in the time of my blessed Father, you did with your counsel and persuasion persuade both my Father and me to break off the Treaties: I confess I was your instrument, for two reasons; one was, the times of the time; the other was because I was seconded by so great and worthy a body, as the whole body of Parliament: Then there was no body in so great favour with you as this man, whom you seem now to touch, but indeed my Father's Government and mine. Now that you have all things according to your wishes, and that I am so far engaged, that you think there is no retreat; now you begin to set the dice, and make your own game: But I pray you be not deceived, it is not a parliamentary way, nor it is not a way to deal with a King.

"Mr. Coke told you, It was better to be eaten up by a foreign enemy, than to be destroyed at home. Indeed I think it more honour for a King to be invaded, and almost destroyed by a foreign enemy, than to be despised by his own Subjects.

"Remember, that Parliaments are altogether in my power for their calling, sitting, and dissolution; therefore as I find the fruits of them good or evil, they are to continue, or not to be: And remember, that if in this time, instead of mending your errors, by delay you persist in your errors, you make them greater and irreconcilable: Whereas, on the other side, if you do go on cheerfully to mend them, and look to the distressed state of Christendom, and the affairs of the Kingdom, as it lieth now by this great engagement; you will do your selves honour, you shall encourage me to go on with Parliaments, and, I hope, all Christendom shall feel the good of it."

The Commons take offence at these Speeches.

Rushworth, T. I. p. 225. Annals, p. 118.

The King's and Keeper's Speeches were so plain, that they could not be misunderstood. The King's aim in general was to intimate to the Parliament, they were only his Council, whose advice he might follow or reject, and he could either not assemble this Council, or govern without it. The Commons immediately turned the House into a grand Committee, ordering the doors to be locked, and no Member to depart till the House came to a resolution concerning these Speeches. His Majesty having notice thereof, and perceiving this could not but retard his affairs, ordered a conference between the two Houses, and commanded the Duke of Buckingham to explain his intentions, and give his words a sense less offensive than what they obviously bore. The Duke spoke in the manner following.

The Duke of Buckingham's Speech, wherein he explains the King's Words.
Rushworth, T. I. p. 22.

"Whereas it is objected by some, who with good correspondency betwixt the King and people, that to prefix a day to give or to break was an unusual thing, and might express an inclination to the King to break; to remove this, as his Majesty was free from such thoughts, he hath defended to make this explanation.

"That as his Majesty would not have you condition with him directly or indirectly, so he will not lie to a day, for giving farther supply; but it was the pressing occasion of Christendom that made him to pitch upon a day.

"His Majesty hath here a servant of the King of Denmark, and another from the Duke of Weymer, and yesterday received a Letter from his Sister the Queen of Bohemia; who signified, that the King of Denmark hath sent an Ambassador, with power to perfect the contract which was made at the Hague; so it was not the King, but time, and the things themselves that pressed a time.

"Therefore his Majesty is pleased to give longer time, hoping you will not give him cause to put you in mind of it again; so that you have a greater latitude, if the business require to think further of it.

"I am commanded further to tell you, That if his Majesty should accept of a less sum than will suffice, it will deceive your expectations, disappoint his Allies, and consume the Treasure of the Kingdom: Whereas, if you give largely now, the business being at the crisis, it comes so seasonably, it may give a turn to the affairs of Christendom.

"But while we delay and suffer the time to pass, others abroad will take advantage of it, as the King of Spain hath done, by concluding a Peace, as it is thought, in Italy, for the Palestine, whereby our work is become the greater, because there can be no diversion that way.

"As it was a good rule to fear all things and nothing, and to be liberal was sometimes to be thrifty, so in this particular, if you give largely, you shall carry the war to the enemy's door, and keep that Peace at home that hath been: Whereas, on the contrary, if you draw the war at home, it brings with it nothing but disturbance and fear, all courses of justice stop, and each man's revenue lessened, and nothing that can be profitable.

"Another explanation I am commanded to make, touching the grievances; wherein his Majesty means no way to interrupt your proceedings, but hopes you will proceed in the antient way of your predecessors; and not so much seek faults, as the means to redress them.

"I am farther commanded to tell you, That his Majesty intends to elect a Committee of both Houses, whom he will trust, to take the view of his estate, the defects of which are not fit for the eyes of a multitude; and this Committee will be for your ease, and may satisfy you, without casting any ill odour on his Government, or laying open any weakness that may bring shame upon us abroad. That which is proposed is so little, that when the payment comes, it will bring him to a worse estate than now he is in; therefore wishes you to enlarge it, but leaves the augmentation to your selves; but is sorry, and touched in conscience, that the burthen should lie on the poorest, who want too much already; yet he will not prescribe, but with that you, who were the abettors and counsellors of this war, would take a greater part of the burthen to your selves; and any man that can find out that way, shall show himself best affected, and do the best service to the King and State.

After the Duke had thus spoken for the King, he made his address to them in his own behalf, taking this occasion to vindicate his conduct, or rather to extol the services he had done the State. The Lord Conway, Secretary of State, spoke next, and pretended, among other things, to show, that the three Subsidies and three Fifteenths granted to the late King had been employed according to the Parliament's intention, because nothing was disbursed but by the King's express orders, a reason which must have appeared frivolous to the House of Commons (1).

The explanation of the King's intentions seemed to pacify the Commons a little. How great soever their discontent was, at what the King said about Parliaments, they did not think proper to censure it, whether they feared to enter into so dangerous a discussion, or expected that the Lords would take the affair in hand, since they were no less concerned. The Commons contented themselves therefore with presenting to the King a Remonstrance, to justify their proceedings. This Remonstrance was preceded by an Address on the same subject. But as the Address was only an abstract of the Remonstrance they were preparing, I shall pass it over in silence, and insert only the Remonstrance, which was thus worded:

Annals, p. 120.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

"WHEREAS your Majesty hath been pleased of late, at sundry times, and by several Letters, to impart unto us your royal pleasure, touching some passages and proceedings in this present Parliament: We do first, with unspeakable joy and comfort, acknowledge your Majesty's grace and favour, in that it hath pleased you to cause it to be delivered unto us by the Lord Keeper of your Great Seal, in your own royal presence, and before both Houses of Parliament, That never King was more loving to his People, nor better affected to the right use of Parliaments; withal, professing your most gracious resolution, to hear and redress our just Grievances. And with like comfort we acknowledge your Majesty's goodness shining at the very entrance of your glorious Reign, in commanding the execution of the Laws established to preserve the true Religion of Almighty God, in whose service consisteth the happiness of all Kings and Kingdoms.

"Yet let it not displease your Majesty, that we also express some sense of just grief, intermixed with that great joy, to see the careful proceedings of our sincere intentions so misreported, as to have wrought effects unexpected, and, we hope, undelivered.

"First, Touching the charge against us in the matter concerning Mr. Coke. We all sincerely protest, That neither the words mentioned in your Majesty's message, nor any other of seditious effect were spoken by him, as hath been resolved by the House, without one negative 1626. "voice. Howsoever, in a Speech occasionally uttered, he let fall some few words, which might admit an ill construction; whereat the House being displeased at the delivery of them, as was expressed by a general and instant check, he forthwith so explained himself and his intention, that, for the present, we did forbear to take them into consideration, which since we have done: And the effect thereof had before this appeared, if by importunate business of your Majesty's service we had not been interrupted.

"The like interruption did also befall us in the case of Dr. Turner; wherein the question being formerly stated, a resolution was ordered to have been taken that very day, on which we received your Majesty's command to attend you.

"But for our own proceedings, we humbly beseech your Majesty to be truly informed, That before the overture from Dr. Turner, (out of our great and necessary care for your honour, and welfare of your Realm) we had taken into serious consideration, the evils which now afflict your people, and the causes of them, that we might apply our selves unto the fittest remedies: In the pursuit whereof, our Committees (whatsoever they might have done) have in no particular proceeded otherwise, than either upon ground of knowledge in themselves, or proof by examination of witnesses, or other evidence. In which course of service for the public good, as we have not swerved from the parliamentary ways of our predecessors, so we conceive, that the discovery, and reforming of errors, is so far from laying an asperion upon the present time and government, that it is rather a great honour and happiness to both, yielding matter to great Princes, wherein to exercise and illustrate their noblest virtues.

"And although the grievous complaints of the Merchants from all parts, together with the common service of the Subjects well affected to those who profess our Religion, gave us occasion to debate some businesses that were partly foreign, and had relation to affairs of State; yet we beseech your Majesty to rest assured, it was exceeding far from our intention, either to traduce your Counsellors, or disadvantage your Negotiations. And though some examples of great and potent Ministers of Princes, heretofore questioned in Parliament, have been alleged, yet was it without paralleling your Majesty's Government or Councils, to any times at all, much less to times of exception.

"Touching the letter of your Majesty's Secretary, it was first alleged by your advocate for his own justification, and after by direction of the Committee, produced to make good his allegation.

"And for the search at the Signet-office, the copy of a Letter being divulged, as in your Majesty's name, with pregnant cause of suspicion, both in the body and direction thereof to be suppositions, the Committee, out of desire to be cleared therein, did by their order send some of themselves to the Signet-office, to search whether there were any Records of Letters of that nature, without warrant to the officer for any, much less for a general search.

"But touching public Records, we have not forbore, as often as our businesses have required, to make search into them, wherein we have done nothing unwarranted by the Laws of your Realm, and the constant usage of Parliaments. And if for the ease of their labours any of our Committees have desired the help of the Officers, Repertories, or Breviats of direction, we conceive it is no more than any Subject in his own affairs might have obtained for ordinary fees.

"Now concerning your Majesty's Servants, and namely, the Duke of Buckingham, we humbly beseech your Majesty to be informed by us your faithful Commons; who can have no private end but your Majesty's service, and the good of your Country, that it hath been the ancient, constant, and undoubted right and usage of Parliaments, to question and complain of all persons of what degree soever, found grievous to the Commonwealth, in abusing the power and trust committed to them by their Sovereign. A course approved not only by the examples in your Father's days, of famous memory, but by frequent precedents in the best and most glorious Reigns of your noble progenitors, appearing both in Records and Histories; without which liberty in Parliament, no private man, no servant to a King, perhaps no Counsellor, without exposing himself to the hazard of great enmity and prejudice, can be a means to call great Officers into question for their misdemeanors, but the Commonwealth might languish under "their pressures without redress: and whatsoever we shall do accordingly in this Parliament, we doubt not but it shall redound to the honour of the Crown, and welfare of your Subjects.

"Lastly, We most humbly beseech your Majesty graciously to conceive, that though it hath been the long custom of Parliaments to handle the matter of Supply with the least of their businesses, yet at this time, out of extraordinary respect to your person, and care of your affairs, we have taken the same into more speedy consideration, and most happily, on the very day of your Majesty's inauguration, with great alacrity and unanimous consent: After a short debate we grew to the resolution for a present Supply, well known to your Majesty.

"To which, if addition may be made of other great things for your service, yet in consultation amongst us, we doubt not but it will appear, that we have not receded from the truth of our first intention, so to supply you, as to make you safe at home, and feared abroad, especially if your Majesty shall be pleased to look upon the way intended in our promise, as well as to the measure of the gift agreed.

"With like humility we beseech your Majesty, not to give ear to the officious reports of private persons for their own ends, which hath occasioned so much loss of time, nor to judge our proceedings whilst they are in agitation, but to be pleased to expect the issue and conclusion of our labours, which we are confident will manifest and justify to your Majesty the sincerity and loyalty of our hearts, who shall ever place in a high degree of happiness, the performing of that duty and service in Parliament, which may most tend to your Majesty's honour, and the good of your Kingdom."

By this Remonstrance it appears, the Commons did not look upon Coke's offence as a crime deserving so severe a punishment as the King imagined, especially as the King had been misinformed. Moreover, in showing resentment against Coke, they were afraid of discouraging their Members, and hindering them from freely speaking their minds, besides that they should thereby authorize the King to make continual complaints on the like pretences. But on the other hand, if they declared Coke entirely innocent, they were apprehensive of engaging in a discussion they were willing to avoid. As for Turner, they could not condemn him, since his motion was approved by the House. So, they only evaded the King's denial, for fear of offending him by a refusal, imagining, the King would understand them. But as to the Duke of Buckingham, the case was different. The King having established for a principle, that the Commons had not power to accuse any of his servants without his permission, they could not speak too plainly, by reason of the importance of the King's pretensions, which tended to deprive the House of one of their greatest privileges. As to the Supply, it is very visible, the Commons did not intend the King should have it in his power to prescribe their terms, but were resolved to preserve the right of granting what they thought proper, and when they saw fit. Indeed, it is of so great consequence to the Commons not to lose this Right, that should they suffer the least incroachment upon it, they would assuredly become an empty name without authority.

The King did not think proper to answer this Remonstrance, or at least required time to examine it. Mean while, he desired the Commons to adjourn for a week as the Lords had done; and they did so accordingly.

The King was extremely embarrassed. He wanted money, and the Commons had voted him three Subsidies and three Fifteenths, to which they had lately added a fourth Subsidy. But it evidently appeared they meant not to pass the Bill, till the Duke of Buckingham's affair was finished. So, the King not being able to divert the charge against the Duke, without hindering at the same time the Subsidy-Bill, consented at length, that the House should proceed in the examination of his Favourite's conduct, but it was with intention to put a stop to it, if the affair was carried too far (1).

A few days after, the Commons sent word to the Duke of Buckingham, that they were passing Articles of accusation against him, of which he might be informed by the Clerk's Book (and take a copy thereof) and that they expected his answer, if he pleased to send any (2). Whereupon, the Duke applied to the Lords for leave to answer. But the Lords did not think it convenient to permit him, under colour, that he would thereby give the Commons occasion to defer the Subsidy Bill, which they were presently to take into consideration. But the Commons, without regarding the reason alleged by the Lords, which was signified to them by the Duke, continued their proceedings. Nay, they resolved to annex to the charge, an article concerning the Plaster and Potion applied and given by the Duke to King James in his last sickness, without the advice of the Physicians. The King hearing of this, sent a message to the Commons, "That he having consented to their proceedings against the Duke of Buckingham, and hearing there is new matter intended to be brought against him, nevertheless leaves the House to their own way to pretend the business to him, or to the Lords, without advising them to consider of the season of the year, and to avoid all loss of time." He would probably have been glad, as he was chiefly concerned in the article relating to the King his Father's life, the Commons would have left it to his Determination. But they feigned not to understand him, and only thanked him for his message.

Some interruption was given to the Duke of Buckingham's accusation, and consequently to the Subsidy Bill, by a new affair which unexpectedly arose, and which it will be necessary briefly to mention, though I design not here to descend to particulars. The Earl of Bristol, who had been Ambassador in Spain for the affair of the marriage, according to King James's desire, had however the misfortune to displease the Prince and Duke. As their aim was to hinder the Earl from giving the Parliament an exact account of what passed in Spain, they fo managed, that at his return he was confined to his House, and afterwards sent to the Tower. King James was fully satisfied of the Earl's innocence, but was so little master of his actions the two last years of his life, that he dared not openly protect him. So, the Prince and Duke constrained him, on divers pretences, to keep him in prison, that he might not speak with him. After King James's death, the Earl's case became so much the worse, as the new King and Favorite, his professed enemies, were no longer obliged to use any ceremony. He remained therefore in prison till this second Parliament, that is, about two years, without being brought to a trial, or even any charge entered against him. At last, knowing how the Commons stood affected to the Duke, he resolved to embrace this opportunity, and try to recover his liberty. He wished also to be in a condition to justify his conduct, which the Duke had aspersed, in order to cast on him the whole blame of what had passed in the negotiation of the Prince's marriage with the Infanta of Spain.

Rushworth,

He presented therefore a petition to the House of Lords, showing, that being Peer of the Realm, he had received no summons to the Parliament, desiring them to intercede for him, that he might enjoy his privilege. Whereupon the Lords prayed his Majesty, to send a writ of summons as well to the Earl of Bristol as to some other Peers, whose writs were also stopped, which the King granted. A summons was therefore sent to the Earl, but withal, he received a letter from the Lord Keeper (1), acquainting him, that his Majesty would have him forbear his personal attendance. Upon this, the Earl sent a second Petition to the Lords with the Keeper's Letter, telling them, it was done by the Duke of Buckingham's credit, whose aim was to prevent him from discovering his crimes. Moreover, he besought the Lords to permit him to bring an accusation against the Duke, wherein he would demonstrate how much the Duke had abused the late King, his present Majesty, the State, and the Parliament. The King was so offended with the Earl of Bristol's boldness, that he sent a message to the Lords, declaring, he was determined to exhibit before them a charge of High-Treason against the Earl of Bristol. After this declaration, the Lords could not avoid putting the Earl into the custody of the Black-Rod. Some days after, the Earl being brought to the Bar of the House, the Attorney-General read the charge against him in the King's name, who had corrected it in several places with his own hand. Nevertheless, the Lords received also the accusation entered by the Earl of Bristol against the Duke of Buckingham, and the Lord Conway Secretary of State. The King's charge against the Earl was divided into three heads; namely, his offences, before the Prince's going to Spain: during the Prince's being in Spain: and after the Prince's return. But the Earl made such a defence, as covered his accusers with confusion. He plainly showed, how much the Duke of Buckingham had deceived the Parliament in his narrative of what passed in Spain. This reflected on the King himself, who had not only attested the relation, but persisted still to attest it as true. Wherefore he did not think fit to prosecute a sentence against the Earl. As the charge against the Earl of Bristol, his defence, and his accusation against the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Conway, relate rather to the reign of King James, than to that of King

Charles, I think it unnecessary to insist any farther upon this affair, which would lead me too far. However, as this is a curious point; as in the Earl's defence there is an exact account of what passed in Spain in the negotiation of the projected marriage; and as the characters of James I, Charles I, and the Duke of Buckingham may be there clearly seen, I shall insert at the end of this Book several Papers upon this subject, which to me seem worthy the curiosity of the publick.

Some days after the Earl of Bristol had given his answer, and presented his charge against the Duke and the Lord Conway, the Commons brought up to the Lords their declaration and impeachment against the Duke of Buckingham. It contained thirteen articles, which were explained and aggravated by the Managers appointed by the Commons. It is customary for the Commons on such occasions, to divide the task among several of their Members, each of whom prepares to speak to the article assigned him (2). Sir Dudley Diggs, who was appointed to explain and support the beginning of the charge, [after a short prologue] read the following preamble:

For the speedy redress of great evils and mischiefs, and of the chief cause of these evils and mischiefs which this Kingdom of England now grievously suffereth, and of late years peace hath suffered; and to the honour and safety of our Sovereign Lord the King, and of his crown and dignity; and to the good and welfare of his People, The Commons in this present Parliament, by the authority of our said Sovereign Lord the King, assembled, do, by this their Bill, shew and declare against George, Duke, Marquis, and Earl of Buckingham, Earl of Coventry, Viscount Villers, Baron of Whaddon, Great Admiral of the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and of the Principality of Wales, and of the Dominions and Islands of the same, of the Town of Calais, and of the Marches of the same, and of Normandy, Gascoign and Guienne, General-Governour of the Seas and Ships of the said Kingdom, Lieutenant-General-Admiral, Captain-General and Governour of his Majesty's Royal Fleet and Army lately set forth, Master of the Horse of our Sovereign Lord the King, Lord Warden, Chancellor, and Admiral of the Cinque-Ports, and of the Members thereof, Constable of Dover Castle, Justice in Eyre of the Forests and Chaces on this side the River Trent, Constable of the Castle of Windsor, Gentleman of his Majesty's Bed-Chamber, one of his Majesty's most Honourable Privy-Council in his Realms, both in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and Knight of the most Honourable Order of the Garter: The Misdemeanours, Misprisions, Offences, Crimes, and other matters, comprized in the Articles following; and him the said Duke do accuse and impeach of the said Misdemeanours, Misprisions, Offences and Crimes.

This preamble being read, Sir Dudley Diggs gave a general knowledge of the impeachment, without insisting upon any particular article. He only reduced the charge to four principal heads. In the first, he showed the grievances which sprung from so many offices conferred on a single person, and pretended it was one of the chief causes of the evils which afflicted England, as decay of trade, losses at Sea, and the contempt, the Nation was fallen into. In the second, he spoke in general of Honours being sold or procured by the Duke for undeserving persons. In the third, he said, as the Duke had raised all his poor Kindred to Honours, so he had exhausted and mis-employed his Majesty's lands and revenues. In the fourth, he spoke of the remedies applied and given to the late King in his last sickness, but he only just mentioned them, because that Article was to be enlarged upon by another manager.

As this charge was never decided, I think it needless to relate the particulars, or give an account of what was said by each of the managers on the several Articles. But that the Reader may see in general what the Duke was accused of, I shall insert an abstract of each Article.

I. He was accused of ingrossing into his hands a great number of offices, some whereof could hardly be executed by a single person: and of procuring them by ill means.

II. Of purchasing the office of High Admiral of the Earl of Nottingham, [for the sum of 3000 l. and an annuity of 1000 l.]

III. Of buying the office of Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, of the late Lord Zouch, [for the sum of 1000 l. and an annuity of 500 l.]

IV. Of having neglected to guard the Seas and protect the Merchants.

V. Of confiscating a French Ship, called the St. Peter of Newhaven worth 40,000 l. Sterling: Of detaining the said Ship, after the King's order to restore her to the owner, and of taking out several things for his use.

VI. Of oppressing the East-India Company, by detain-

IX. Of constraining several persons to purchase Titles of Honour (1).

X. Of selling the office of High-Treasurer [to Henry Montague Viscount Mandeville] for twenty thousand pounds, and the office of Master of the Wards and Liveries [to Sir Lionel Cranfield] for six thousand.

XI. Of procuring to his kindred and allies titles of Baron, Viscount, Earl, without their having done the State any service.

XII. Of embezzling and ingrossing the King's money and lands.

XIII. Of applying a plaister to the late King's side in his last sickness, and of giving him a Potion with his own hand at several times, in the absence, and without the order of the Physicians.

These Articles were enlarged upon by the several managers (2), and Sir John Elliot was appointed to make the Epilogue to the impeachment, wherein he summed up what had been said against the Duke, and spoke of him in very offensive terms, but however mentioned not the plaister or potion.

The same or the next day, Diggs and Elliot were by the King's command sent to the Tower (3): and two days after the King went to the House of Lords, and spoke to them after the following manner.

My Lords,

THE cause and only cause of my coming to you this day, is to express the sense I have of all your honours; for he that toucheth any of you, toucheth me in a very great measure. I have thought fit to take order for the punishing some insolent Speeches lately spoken. I have been too remiss heretofore in punishing such Speeches as concern my self; not that I was greedy of their monies, but that Buckingham, through his importunity, would not suffer me to take notice of them, lest he might be thought to have set me on, and that he might come the forwarder to his trial. And to approve his innocency as touching the matters against him, my self can be a witness to clear him in every one of them.

I speak not this to take any thing out of your hands; but to shew the reason why I have not hitherto punished those insolent Speeches against my self. And now I hope you will be as tender of my honour, when time shall serve, as I have been sensible of yours.

The King's aim in this Speech was, first, to persuade the Lords, they were all concerned in the disrespectful things spoken by the managers against the Duke of Buckingham and some other Members of their House, and that he had committed Diggs and Elliot to the Tower on purpose to vindicate their injured honour. But he succeeded not in his design. Secondly, by offering to be a witness for the Duke of Buckingham, and to clear his innocence in every article of his impeachment, he proposed to the Lords, a kind of dilemma, which he thought they would not be able to get clear of. For they were either to declare the Duke innocent upon the King's evidence, or, by condemning him, openly reject his royal testimony, to which he imagined they would not easily be persuaded. But they were not imposed upon by this artifice, as will hereafter appear.

The King was no sooner departed from the House but the Commons sent a message to the Lords, to desire the Duke of Buckingham might be taken into safe custody: but the Lords durst not commit him for fear of offending the King.

Mean while, the imprisonment of Diggs and Elliot made a terrible impression in the House of Commons, who considered it as an express breach of their privileges. [Sir Dudley Carleton] one of the Court-Party, observing the unusual [and as he termed it, fullen] silence of the House, stood up and justified the King saying, "his Majesty conceived that Diggs went beyond his Commission, when speaking of the plaister and potion given to King James," he said, That he did forbear to speak farther in regard of the King's honour. And as for Sir John Elliot, he affected to speak of the Duke with great contempt, and in very injurious terms. What displeased the King most was, that Elliot in speaking of the Plaister and Potion, used expressions intimating as if there were some thing hidden, which it was not proper to reveal, and in so doing, exceeded the Commission he had received from the House."

Unhappily, there was nothing of truth in what was ascribed to these two Members, except the little respect they had shown for the Duke of Buckingham. For Elliot had not mentioned the Plaister or Potion, and Diggs had said nothing like what he was accused of. Wherefore, the House of Commons taking advantage of these false charges, ordered that all the Members there present should sign the following Protestation.

I protest before Almighty God, and this House of Parliament, that I never gave consent that Sir Dudley Diggs should speak these words that he is now charged withal, or any words to that effect; and I have not affirmed to any that he did speak such words, or any to that effect.

Besides this, thirty six Lords who were present at the conference, where the impeachment of the Duke was presented, attested under their hands, that they did not hear Sir Dudley Diggs speak any such words. It followed therefore from the testimony of the Lords, and the Protestation of the Commons, either that the King was falsely and maliciously informed, or that the charge against Diggs was invented, to have an opportunity of punishing him for speaking of the Duke in so disrespectful a manner.

Elliot's crime was of the same nature, that is, he had spoken of the Duke in uncivil terms, though he was falsely accused of mentioning the Plaister in terms injurious to the King. But the Commons took care to clear their two Members, by declaring publicly, that neither had exceeded his Commission. All this was not for the King's honour, who seeing no way to support what he had done, caused the two imprisoned Members to be released. In all appearance, his design was to terrify the Commons, but he was disappointed.

The King's condescension to the Commons, drew upon him an affair of the like nature from the Lords. He had sent the Earl of Arundel to the Tower for much the same crime as that of Diggs and Elliot, and the Lords had not complained of it. But when they saw the Commons had obtained the release of their Members, by insisting upon their privileges, they thought proper to take this occasion to maintain their rights also. They presented therefore a petition to the King, praying him to release the Earl of Arundel, according to the tenor of their privileges. The King perceived how prejudicial to him this petition was, the Lords pretending by means of their privileges, to limit the Prerogative Royal. For which reason he long resisted before he granted the Lords request. There were several remonstrances from the Lords to the King, and several messages from the King to the Lords. Nay, the Peers went so far, as to declare it was an express breach of their privileges, to imprison any of their Members, the Parliament sitting, without sentence or order of the House (4), and to resolve to take no other business into consideration till they had received satisfaction. At last the King was forced to release the prisoner, though against his will. As by the custom of England, Members of Parliament are not privileged from arrest in cases of Treason and Felony, the King pretended the House of Lords ought not to take exception at his having committed one of their Members. His reason was, because the prisoner might possibly be guilty of Felony or Treason, and consequently the House ought to wait till it should please the King to declare the cause of his imprisonment. But as under colour of this possibility, the King had sent the Earl of Arundel to the Tower, and had not yet declared the cause, the Lords plainly saw the possibility alleged by the King, was but an artifice to evade their most undoubted privileges. So, the King affirmed, that as the untimely discovery of a Treason might happen to be extremely prejudicial to the State, he could not allow to this pretended privilege of the Members of Parliament, all the extent required by the Lords, because there were cases, wherein for the good of the State, it was absolutely necessary to limit it. But the Lords replied, if, on pretence of such cases which were very rare, the King could imprison a Peer

(3) Upon the impeachment of the Duke, a Paper was privately conveyed to the King, importing, That this great opposition against the Duke, was stirred up and maintained by such, as seek the destruction of this free Monarchy. That since the time of Henry VI, these parliamentary discouragements might never be suffered, as being symptoms of Rebellion, and debauching our King, and no one Patriot daring to oppose them, lest he incur the reputation of a Fool or Coward in his Country's cause. His Majesty therefore strengthened himself ever with some favorite, in whom he might better trust than many of the Nobility, tainted with this Oligarchy. It behooved his Majesty to uphold the Duke, who, if he be deceived, it will be the Corner Stone, on which the dissolving of his Monarchy will be built. For if they prevail in this, they will pull the other feathers of Royalty. They will appoint him Counsellors, Servants, &c. That the King and his Father are concerned in the Duke's accusation; and if he suffer for obeying his Sovereign, the next attempt will be to call the King to an account, &c. Ibid. p. 356.

the consent of the House, and declaration of the
it would follow, that in all sorts of cases, he might gain a Peer in custody as long as he pleased, and thereby abridge the Lords of their privileges. If it is asked, why this dispute was never raised in the former Reigns, the question is easily answered. For if a King happened to send a Peer to the Tower, the Parliament sitting, either the cause was known, or, if a secret, the House took no offence, because the Lords not mistrusting the King, did not fear he would draw it into a precedent to abolish their Privilege. But it was not the same in the Reign of Charles I. Besides that the Earl of Arundel was known to be sent to the Tower only for speaking too freely in the House (1), what the King's principles were concerning the Privileges of the People, was no secret, and it was manifest, that upon a bare possibility, he was endeavouring to establish a principle which tended to render the Privilege in question entirely useless. And therefore the Lords being warranted by the example of the Commons, would not omit this opportunity to maintain their Privilege.

Before the Duke of Buckingham had given in his answer to the Commons impeachment, the Chancellorship of the University of Cambridge becoming void by the Earl of Suffolk's death, the King caused the Duke his Favorite to be elected in the room of the late Chancellor. The House of Commons were extremely offended at this election, considering as a manifest contempt, that the Duke should be chosen whilst under an impeachment, and when one of the Articles against him was plurality of Offices.
Besides, they maintained, there was a fort of contradiction in this choice, since the University themselves, by their Representatives in Parliament, had given their consent to the Duke's Impeachment. But the King openly supported the election in spite of the Commons.

At length, on the 8th of June, the Duke gave in his answer to the impeachment of the House of Commons.
As I have not given the particulars of the accusation, it would be needless to insert here the answers, which had a necessary reference to what was alledged against the Duke.
This affair having never been decided, 'tis easy to judge, that as the accusation was very much aggravated, so the answers were palliated with great care. The proofs and evidences of the facts produced for or against, would be the only means to inform us of the truth; but the affair was not carried so far. It will suffice therefore to say, that the Commons desiring a copy of the answer, the next day the King writ the following letter to the Speaker.

Trusty and Well-beloved, &c.

OUR House of Commons cannot forget, how often we have earnestly we have called upon them for the speeding of that aid which they intended us for our great and weighty affairs, concerning the safety and honour of us and our Kingdoms: And now the time being so far spent, that unless it be presently concluded, it can neither bring us money nor credit by the time which themselves have fixed, which is the last of this month, and being further deferred would be of little use, we being daily advertised from all parts, of the great preparations of the enemy ready to assail us; we hold it necessary by these our Letters, to give them our last and final admonition, and to let them know that we shall account all further delays and excuses to be expressions of denials. And therefore we will and require you to fignify unto them, that we do expect that they forthwith bring in their bill of Subsidy to be passed without delay or condition, so as it may fully pass the House by the end of the next week at the furthest: which if they do not, it will force us to take other resolutions. But let them know, if they finish this according to our desire, that we are resolved to let them sit together for the dispatch of their other affairs so long as the season will permit, and after their recess, to bring them together again the next winter. And if by their denial or delay, any thing of ill consequence shall fall out either at home or abroad, we call God and Man to witness, that we have done our part to prevent it, by calling our people together to advise with us, by opening the weight of our occasions unto them, and by requiring their timely help and assistance in these actions wherein we stand engaged by their own counsels. And we will and command you, that this Letter be read publicly in the House.

(1) It does not appear that the Earl of Arundel was committed for any thing said in the House, but, as it is thought, for his Son's marrying the Duke of Lennox's Sister, whom the King designed for the Lord Lorn. The Earl of Arundel had five Proxies, which were lost by his Imprisonment. Rushworth, Tom. 1. p. 363, 364.

(2) Among whom were the Earl of Rutland, the Viscounts Montagu and Dunbar, the Lords Eure, Abergavenny, Tenham, Wilton, Melby, Mordun, &c. J. Inol. Buzze, Serap. The rest were Commoners. Rushworth, Tom. 1. p. 394.

(3) Rapin, by mistake, says two Papers, but it was but one, as appears by the Speaker's Speech. Though the Copy of this Answer, containing a Declaration and Petition, is not to be found, it was ingrossed and allowed of, and the substance was delivered by the Speaker, Sir Henry Finch. Rushworth, Tom. 1. p. 395.

It was manifest, this Letter, written at the time the Duke of Buckingham was going to be tried, was but an artifice to evade it. For it was not possible, that if the Subsidy-bill was passed by the time fixed by the King, the Duke's affair could be dispatched by the same time. 'Tis true, the King promised to let the Parliament sit, so long as the Season would permit. But by that very thing he reserved to himself the liberty of proroguing it when he pleased, on pretence, the season was too far advanced to sit any longer, especially as he feigned to press the Subsidy-bill, purely out of fear of a pretended invasion, which, he said, the Kingdom was threatened with. It was therefore to be expected, that the Duke of Buckingham's affair would be dropped, and be forced to be revived in the next Session, since a prorogation puts an end to all affairs.

The Commons not thinking fit to comply with the King's will, presented a fresh petition to him against popish Recufants. This was to shew the Publick, the King's answer to the petition of the Oxford Parliament, contained only empty promises, without being followed by any effects. They had a mind also to shew, that the Duke of Buckingham's ill administration was not the only Grievance they desired to be redressed. The Petition was as follows:

To the King's most excellent Majesty,

YOUR Majesty's most obedient and loyal Subjects the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, do with great comfort remember the many testimonies which your Majesty hath given of your sincerity and zeal of the true Religion established in this Kingdom, and in particular your gracious answer to both Houses of Parliament at Oxford, upon their petition concerning the causes and remedies of the increase of Popery; that your Majesty thought fit, and would give order to remove from all places of authority and government, all such persons, as are either popish Recufants, or, according to direction of former Acts of State, justly to be suspected; which was then presented as a great and principal cause of that mischief. But not having received so full redress herein as may conduce to the peace of this Church, and safety of this Regal State, they hold it their duty, once more to resort to your sacred Majesty, humbly to inform you, that upon examination, they find the persons under-written, to be either Recufants, Papists, or justly suspected according to the former Acts of State, who now do, or, since the sitting of the Parliament, did remain in places of government and authority, and trust, in your several Counties of this your Realm of England, and Dominion of Wales.

Then followed a List of fifty-nine Recufants, and suspected Papists, who were in places of trust and authority in several Counties (2).

Wherefore they humbly beseech your Majesty, not to suffer your loving Subjects to continue any longer discouraged, by the apparent sense of that increase both in number and power, which by the favour and countenance of such like ill-affected Governors accrue to the popish Party; but that, according to your own wisdom, goodness, and piety, (whereof they rest assured) you will be graciously pleased to command that answer of your Majesty's to be effectually observed, and the parties above-named, and all such others to be put out of such commissions and places of authority wherein they now are in your Majesty's Realm of England; contrary to the Acts and Laws of States in that behalf.

It was not for the King's honour to be pressed so often to perform what he had so positively promised. But it must be considered, it was not easy for him to withstand the solicitations and intrigues of the Queen, of the Duke of Buckingham, whose mother was a professed Papist, of Sir Richard Weston his chief Counsellor, and of the Lord Conway Secretary of State, both likewise Papists, since these were the men that were nearest his person, and by whom he was in a manner kept.

A few days after, the Commons resolved to wait upon the King, and present to him, by their Speaker, a declaration of their conduct, serving for answer to his Letter, and a petition to remove the Duke of Buckingham from his person. The audience they had desired being granted, the Speaker, before he presented the answer, made the following Speech to him (3):

Most gracious and dread Sovereign,

"According to that liberty of access, and liberty of speech which your Majesty and your Royal progenitors have ever vouchsafed to your House of Commons, your Majesty's most humble and loyal Subjects, the Commons now assembled in Parliament, have been suitors for this access to your royal throne.

"And out of their consideration of the nature, and of the weight and importance of the business, they have thought the attendance of the whole House, with their Speaker, not too solemn; and yet they have not thought fit barely to commit those words which express their thoughts, to the trust of any man's speech, but are bold to present them in writing to your gracious hands that they may not vanish, but be more lasting than the most powerful words of a more able speaker like to be.

"I have much to read, and shall therefore, as little as I can, weary your Majesty with speeches.

"This parchment contains two things, the one by way of declaration, to give your Majesty an account, and humble satisfaction of their clear and sincere endeavours and intentions in your Majesty's service; and the other an humble petition to your Majesty, for the removal of that great person the Duke of Buckingham, from access to your royal presence.

"For the first, they beseech your most excellent Majesty to believe, that no earthly thing is so dear and precious to them, as that your Majesty should retain them in your grace and good opinion; and it is grief to them, beyond my expression, that any misinformation or misinterpretation, should at any time render their words or proceedings offensive to your Majesty.

"It is not proper for any one to hear the echo of a voice, that hears not the voice; and if echo's be sometimes heard to double and redouble, the echo of the echo is still fainter, and sounds not louder.

"I need not make the application, words mis-reported, though by an echo, or but an echo of an echo, at a third or fourth hand, have oft a louder sound than the voice it self, and may found disloyalty, though the voice had nothing undutiful or illoyal in it.

"Such misinformations, they fear, have begot those interruptions and diversions which have delayed the ripening and expediting of those great councils, which concern your Majesty's important service, and have enforced this declaration.

"I pass from that to the petition, in which my purpose is not to urge those reasons, which your Majesty may hear expressed in their own words in the language of the People.

"I am only directed to offer to your great wisdom, and deep judgment, that this petition of theirs is such, as may stand with your Majesty's honour and justice to grant.

"Your Majesty hath been pleased to give many Royal testimonies and arguments to the world, how good and gracious a Master you are; and that which the Queen of Sheba once said to the wisest King, may without flattery be said to your Majesty, Happy are those servants which stand continually before you.

"But the relations by which your Majesty stands in a gracious aspect towards your People, do far transcend, and are more prevalent and binding, than any relation of a Master towards a Servant; and to hear and satisfy the just and necessary desires of your People, is more honourable than any expression of grace to a Servant.

"To be a master to a servant is communicable to many of your Subjects; to be a King of People, is regal and incommunicable to Subjects.

"Your Majesty is truly stiled with that name, which the greatest Emperors, though they borrowed names and titles from those Countries, which they gained by conquest, most delighted in, Pater Patria. And desires of children are preferred before those of servants, and the servant abideth not in the house for ever, but the son abideth ever.

"The government of a King was truly termed by your Royal Father, a politic marriage betwixt him and his People; and I may safely say, there was never a better union between a married pair, than is between your Majesty and your People."

Having ended his Speech, the Speaker put into the King's hands the declaration and petition, which his Majesty was so displeased with, that he determined to dissolve the Parliament. The Commons having intimation of it, resolved to present a Remonstrance to him, of which every Member was ordered to have a copy. Whilst this Remonstrance was preparing, the Lords being informed by the King himself of his resolution, presented a Petition to him to divert him from his purpose. But he would hearken to nothing, and, on the 15th of January, caused the Parliament to be dissolved by a Commission under the Great Seal.

It was not doubted that the Duke of Buckingham's interest was the sole cause of this dissolution. The Commons were so persuaded of it, that they chiefly inflicted upon the great prejudice the Duke's credit occasioned to the Kingdom, in the Remonstrance they had prepared, but were hindered from presenting by the dissolution of the Parliament. It will not be amiss however to insert here this Remonstrance.

Most gracious Sovereign,

"WE your loyal and faithful Subjects, the Commons assembled by your Majesty's most Royal authority in this present Parliament, having with all dutiful affection, from the time of our first meeting, earnestly endeavoured to proceed speedily in those affairs, that might best and soonest conduce to our dispatch of the intended Supply, of your Majesty's great designs, to the enlargement of your support, and to the enabling of our selves, and them whom we represent, to the full and timely performance of the same; have, notwithstanding, by reason of divers informations, interruptions, and other preventions, been hitherto so retarded in the prosecution of these affairs, that we now thought it a necessary part of our most humble duties, thus to declare, both those interruptions and preventions, with the true original and continual cause of them; as also our most earnest devotion of the Parliamentary service of your most excellent Majesty, and of the careful safety and defence of your Dominions, Crown and Dignity: And we most humbly therefore beseech your most excellent Majesty, to be graciously pleased here to cast your eye on some particulars, that have relation as well to your first Parliament as to this; out of which we cannot doubt, but that your great goodness may receive an ample satisfaction, touching our most loyal and faithful intentions.

"In the first Parliament of the first year of your Majesty's most happy Reign over us, the Commons then assembled, after they had cheerfully presented to your Majesty, as the first-fruits of their affections, two entire Subsidies, were exceedingly pressed by the means of the Duke of Buckingham, and for his own ends, as we conceive, to enlarge that Supply: which when he conceived would not be there effected, he procured, for the same ends, from your Majesty, an adjournment of the Parliament to the City of Oxford; where the Commons then taking into just consideration the great mischiefs which this Kingdom variously hath suffered, and that chiefly by reason of the exorbitant power and frequent misdoings of the said Duke, were entering into a Parliamentary course of examination of those mischiefs, power, and misdoings: But no sooner was there any mention made of his name to this purpose, but that he, fearing lest his actions might so have been too much laid open to the view of your most excellent Majesty, and to the just censure that might have then followed, presently, through his misinformations to your Majesty, of the intentions of your said Commons, (as we have just cause to believe) procured a dissolution of the said Parliament: And afterwards also in the same year, through divers misreports made to your Majesty in his behalf, touching some Members of the said Commons, who had more particularly drawn his name into just question, and justly professed themselves averse to his ends there, procured (as we cannot but conceive) the said Members to be made the Sheriffs of several Counties for this year that followed, to the end that they might have all been precluded from being chosen Members of the present Parliament, lest they should again have there questioned him; and by the like practice also (as we are persuaded) he procured, soon after the said dissolution, another Member of the said House (1), because he had justly professed himself against his ends, to be sent as Secretary of your Majesty's last fleet, hereby indeed to punish him, by such drawing him from his practice of the Law, which was his profession, under colour of an honourable employment.

"It pleased your Majesty afterwards, in February last, to call this present Parliament, wherein though none of those whom the said Duke had so procured to be made High-Sheriffs have sat as Members; yet we finding in our selves the like affection, first to the service of your Majesty, and next to the good of the Commonwealth, we took into serious consideration several Propositions, how far the safety and happiness of your Majesty's Kingdoms and Allies, we might enlarge your supports, and add to the military strength without charge to the poorer sort of your Subjects, and give a larger Supply to your Majesty for your instant and pressing occasions, than hath ever yet but once been given in Parliament: Whereupon, for the enabling of our selves, and those whom we represent, we conceive it first necessary to search into the causes of those mischiefs which this your Kingdom suffereth, and divers of the Grievances that overburden your Subjects; without doing of which, we could neither be faithful to your Majesty, nor to the Country that doth trust and employ us, as your Royal Father also, of blessed memory, admonished the House of Commons in the fourth Session of his first Parliament. In this consideration we found, that the most pressing and comprehensive mischief and grievance that he suffered, was fundamentally settled in the vast power and enormous actions of the said Duke, being such, that by reason of his plurality of Offices, all gotten by ambition, and some for money, expressly against the laws of your Realm; his breach of trust in not guarding the Seas; his high injustice in the Admiralty, his extortion; his delivering over the ships of this Kingdom into the hands of a foreign Prince; his procuring of the compulsory buying of Honour for his own gain; his unexampled exhauling of the Treasures and Revenues of the Kingdom; his transcendent presumption of that unhappy applying of physick to your Royal Father of blessed memory, few days before his death; and some other his offences carefully and maturely examined by us, we made a Parliamentary charge of the same matters and offences against him, to the Lords, by your Majesty assembled in Parliament, there expecting some remedy by a speedy proceeding against him: But, may it please your most excellent Majesty, not only during the time of our examination of the matters and offences of the same charge, we were diversely interrupted and diverted by messages procured through misinformation from your Majesty, which with most humble duty and reverence we did ever receive; whence it first fell out, that so not only much time was spent amongst us, before the same charge was perfected; but also within two days next after the same charge was transmitted by us to the Lords, upon untrue and malicious misinformations, privately and against the privilege of Parliaments, given to your Majesty, of certain words supposed to have been spoken by Sir Dudley Digges and Sir John Elliot, Knights, two of the Members of our House, in their service of the transmitting of the said charge, both of them having been especially employed in the chairs of Committees with us, about the examination of the said matters and offences, they were both by your Majesty's command committed to close imprisonment in the Tower of London, and their lodgings presently searched, and their papers there found, presently taken away; by reason whereof, not only our known Privileges of Parliament were infringed, but we our selves, that, upon full hope of speedy course of justice against the said Duke, were preparing with all dutiful affection to proceed to the dispatch of the supply, and other services to your Majesty, were wholly, as the course and privilege of Parliament binds us, diverted for divers days, to the taking only into consideration some courses for the ratifying and preservation of the Privileges so infringed; and we think it our duties, most gracious Sovereign, most rightly to inform hereby your most excellent Majesty, of the course held in the commitment of the two Members: For, whereas by your Majesty's warrant to your messengers for the arresting of them, you were pleased to command, that they should repair to their lodgings, and there take them; your Majesty's principal Secretary, the Lord Conway, gave the said messengers (as they affirmed) an express command, contrary to the said warrants, that they should not go to their lodgings, but to the House of Commons, and there take them; and if they found them not there, they should stay until they were come into the House, and apprehend them wheresoever else they should find them. Which, besides that it is contrary to your Majesty's command, is an apparent testimony of some mischievous intention there had against the whole House of Commons, and against the service intended to your Majesty. All which, with the several interruptions that preceded it, and the misinformation that hath caused all of them, we cannot doubt but that they were wrought and procured by the Duke, to his own behoof, and for his advantage, especially because the said interruptions have, through misinformation, come amongst us, only at such times wherein we have had the matters and offences charged against him in agitation; but your Majesty, out of your great goodness and justice, being afterwards informed truly of our privilege, and the demerit of the cause that concerned our two Members, graciously commanded the delivery of them out of the Tower, for which we render unto your Majesty most humble thanks; and were then again, by reason of our hopes of the dispatch of proceedings with the Lords upon our charge against him the said Duke, in a cheerful purpose to go on with the matter of Supply, and other services to your Majesty, when again these hopes failed in us, by reason of some new exorbitances now lately shewed in the exercise of his so great power and ambition; for by such his power and ambition, notwithstanding our declaration against him for his so great plurality of Offices, he also procured to himself, by the solicitation of his Agents, and of such as depended upon him, the office of Chancellor of the University of Cambridge; whereas the same University having two Burgesses in Parliament, did, by the same Burgesses, a few weeks before, consent with us in the charge against him for his ambition, for procuring such a plurality of Offices; such was his ambition to sue for it, such was his power to make them give it him, contrary to what themselves had agreed in Parliament with all the Commons of England. And he procured also the same Office, by the special labours and endeavour (as we are informed) of a factious party, who adhereth to that dangerous innovation of Religion, published in the seditious Writings of one Richard Montague Clerk; of whom it is thence also, and heretofore upon other reasons it hath been conceived, that the said Duke is, and long hath been an abettor and protector.

These actions of the said Duke have thus amongst us hindered the service of your Majesty, by reason both of the interruptions that have so necessarily accompanied them, and of the prevention of our cheerfulness, which otherwise had long since been most effectually shewed in us, that having nothing else in our cares, next to our duty to God, but the loyal service of your Majesty, the safety of your Kingdom, and the subsistence of our selves, and those whom we represent, for the continuance of that service and safety which we cannot hope for: And we beseech your most excellent Majesty, graciously to receive this our humble and free Protestation, that we cannot hope for it, so long as we thus suffer under the pressures of the power and ambition of the said Duke, and the divers and false informations so given to your Majesty on his behalf, and for his advantage; especially when we observe also, that in such his greatness, he preventeth the giving of true information to your Majesty, in all things that may any ways reflect to his own misdoings, to shew unto your Majesty, the true state of your Subjects and Kingdoms, otherwise than as it may be represented for his own ends. And to that purpose also hath he procured so many persons depending on him, either by alliance or advancement, to places of eminency near your sacred person. Through his misinformations of that kind also, and power, we have seen, to our great grief, both in the time of your Majesty's Royal Father of blessed memory, and of your Majesty, divers Officers of the Kingdom, so often by him displaced and altered, that within these few years past, since the beginning of his greatness, more such displacings and alterations have by his means happened, than in many years before them: Neither was there in the time of your Royal Father of blessed memory, any such course held, before it was by the practice of the said Duke thus induced. And since that time, divers Officers of the Crown, not only in this your Kingdom of England, but also in Ireland, as they have been made friends, or adverse to the said Duke, have been either so commended, or misrepresented by him to his Sovereign, and by his procurement to placed or displaced, that he hath always herein, as much as in him lay, made his own ends and advantage the measure of the good or ill of your Majesty's Kingdoms.

But now at length, may it please your most excellent Majesty, we have received from the Lords, a copy of the said Duke's answer to our charge transmitted against him; whereunto we shall presently in such sort reply, according to the Laws of Parliament, that unless his power and practice again undermine our proceedings, we do not doubt, but we shall upon the same have judgment against him.

In the times also (most gracious Sovereign) of these interruptions which came amongst us, by reason of the procurement of two of our Members committed, a gracious message was formerly received from your Majesty, wherein you had been pleased to let us know, That if you had not a timely Supply, your Majesty would betake yourself to new counsels; which we cannot doubt were intended by your most excellent Majesty to be such as stood with justice and the laws of this Realm. But these words, New Counsels, were remembered in a 1626. "Speech made amongst us, by one of your Majesty's Privy-Council, and lately a Member of us (1), who in the same Speech told us, He had often thought of those words, New Counsels; that in his consideration of them, he remembered, that there were such kinds of Parliaments anciently among other nations, as are now in England; That in England he saw the Country-people live in happiness and plenty, but in these other nations he saw them poor both in persons and habit, or to that effect; which state and condition happened (as he said) to them, where such New Counsels were taken, as that the use of their Parliaments ended.

"This intimation, may it please your Majesty, was such, as also gave just cause to fear, there were some ill Ministers near your Majesty, that in behalf of the said Duke, and together with him, who is so strangely powerful, were so much against the Parliamentary course of this Kingdom, as they might perhaps advise your most excellent Majesty such new counsels as these, that fell under the memory and consideration of that Privy-Counsellor. And one especial reason among others hath increased that fear among us, for that whereas the Subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage, which determined upon the death of your most Royal Father, our late Sovereign, and were never payable to any of your Majesty's ancestors, but only by a special Act of Parliament, and ought not to be levied without such an Act; yet ever since the beginning of your Majesty's happy reign over us, the said Subsidies have been levied by some of your Majesty's Ministers, as if they were still due; although also one Parliament hath been since then begun, and dissolved by procurement of the said Duke, as is before shewed, wherein no Act passed for the same Subsidies. Which example is so much against the constant use of former times, and the known right and liberty of your Subjects, that it is an apparent effect of some new counsels given against the ancient settled course of government of this your Majesty's Kingdom, and chiefly against the right of your Commons; as if there might be any subsidy, tax, or aid, levied upon them, without their consent in Parliament, or contrary to the settled Laws of this Kingdom. But if any such do so ill an office, as by the misrepresentation of the State, and right of your Majesty's loyal Subjects, advise any such new counsels, as the levying any aid, tax, or subsidy, among your people, contrary to the settled Laws of your Kingdom, we cannot, most gracious Sovereign, but esteem them that shall so advise, not only as vipers, but pests to their King and Commonwealth, (as all such were to both Houses of Parliament, expressly titled by your most Royal Father) but also capital enemies, as well to your Crown and Dignity, as to the Commonwealth. And we shall, for our parts, in Parliament shew, as occasion shall require, and be ready to declare their offences of this kind, such as that may be rewarded with the highest punishment, as your Laws inflict on any offenders.

"These and some of these things, amongst many other, (most gracious Sovereign,) are those which have so much prevented a right understanding between your Majesty and us, and which have possessed the hearts of your People and loyal Commons with unspeakable sorrow and grief, finding apparently all humble and hearty endeavours misinterpreted, hindered, and now at last almost frustrated utterly, by the interposition of the excessive and abusive power of one man; against whom we have just cause to protest, not only in regard of the particulars wherewith he hath been charged, which Parliamentary way we are enforced to insist upon, as matters which lie in our notice and proof, but also because we apprehend him of so unbridled ambition, and so averse to the good and tranquillity of the Church and State, that we verily believe him to be an enemy to both: And therefore unless we would betray our own duties to your Majesty, and those from whom we are trusted, we cannot but express our infinite grief, that he should have so great power and interest in your Princely affections, and under your Majesty, wholly in a manner to engross to himself the administration of your affairs of the Kingdom, which by that means is drawn into a condition most miserable and hazardous.

"Give us then leave, most dear Sovereign, in the name of all the Commons of this your Kingdom, prostrate at the feet of your sacred Majesty, most humbly to beseech you, even for the honour of Almighty God, whose Religion is directly undermined by the practice of that Party whom this Duke supports; for your honour, which will be much advanced in the relieving of your People, in this their great and general grievance; for the honour, safety, and welfare of your Kingdom, 1626. "which by this means is threatened with almost unavoidable dangers, and for the love which your Majesty, as a good and loving Father, bears unto your good people, to whom we profess, in the presence of Almighty God, (the searcher of all hearts,) you are as highly esteemed and beloved as ever any of your Predecessors were, that you would be graciously pleased to remove this person from access to your sacred presence, and that you would not balance this one man with all these things, and with the affairs of the Christian world, which do all suffer so far as they have relation to this Kingdom, chiefly by his means. For we protest to your Majesty, and to the whole world, that until this great person be removed from intermeddling with the great affairs of State, we are out of hope of any good success; and do fear that any money we shall or can give, will through his mis-employment, be turned rather to the hurt and prejudice of your Kingdom, than otherwise, as by lamentable experience we have found, in those large Supplies we have formerly and lately given.

"But no sooner shall we receive redress and relief in this, (which of all others, is our most insupportable grievance,) but we shall forthwith proceed to accomplish your Majesty's own desire, for supply, and likewise with all cheerfulness apply ourselves to the perfecting of divers other great things, such as we think no one Parliament in one age can parallel, tending to the stability, wealth, and strength, and honour of this your Kingdom, and the support of your friends and allies abroad: And we doubt not but through God's blessing, as you are the best, so shall you ever be the best beloved, and greatest Monarch that ever sat on the royal Throne of this famous Kingdom."

Having thus seen the complaints of the House of Commons against the Duke of Buckingham, or rather against the King himself, who was governed by his Favorite, and had several times declared, that the Duke did nothing without his orders, it is but just, we should now see the King's complaints against the Commons, and the grounds and causes of his dissolving this, and the former Parliament. Though his Declaration published on this occasion be very long, as well as the foregoing Remonstrance, I believed it necessary to insert the whole, that the Reader, by comparing them together, may be able to form a clearer Idea of the causes and origin of the divisions between the King and the Parliament, through the whole course of this Reign.

The King's Declaration, Notifying the causes of assembling and dissolving the two last Parliaments.

"THE King's most excellent Majesty, since his happy access to the imperial Crown of this Realm, June 13. 1626. having by his royal authority summoned and assembled R. H. W. by T. J. p. 406. two several Parliaments; the first whereof was in August Annals, p. 203. last, by adjournment held at Oxford, and there dissolved; and the other begun in February last, and continued until the fifteenth day of this present month of June, and then, to the unspeakable grief of himself, and (as he believeth) of all his good and well affected Subjects, dissolved also: Although he well knoweth that the calling, adjourning, proroguing, and dissolving of Parliaments, being his great Council of the Kingdom, do peculiarly belong unto himself by an undoubted prerogative inseparably united to his imperial Crown; of which, as of his other royal actions, he is not bound to give an account to any but to God only, whose immediate Lieutenant and Vicegerent he is in these Realms and Dominions, by the divine Providence committed to his charge and government: yet forasmuch as by the assistance of the Almighty, his purpose is so to order himself and all his actions, especially in the great and publick actions of State, concerning the weal of his Kingdoms, as may justify themselves, not only to his own conscience, and to his own people, but to the whole world; his Majesty hath thought it fit and necessary, as the affairs now stand both at home and abroad, to make a true, plain, and clear Declaration of the causes which moved his Majesty to assemble, and after enforced him to dissolve these Parliaments, that to the mouth of malice itself may be stopped, and the doubts and fears of his own good Subjects at home, and of his friends and allies abroad may be satisfied, and the deserved blame of so unhappy accidents may justly light upon the authors thereof.

"When his Majesty, by the death of his dear and royal Father of ever blessed memory, first came to the Crown, he found himself engaged in a war with a potent enemy; not undertaken rashly, nor without just and honourable grounds, but enforced for the necessary defence of himself and his Dominions, for the support of his friends and allies, for the redeeming of the ancient 1626. "honour of this Nation, for the recovery of the patri-

 "mony of his dear Sister, her consort, and their children,
 "injuriously, and under colour of treaties and friendship,
 "taken from them, and for the maintenance of the true
 "Religion, and invited thereunto, and encouraged therein
 "by the humble advice of both the Houses of Parliament
 "and by the large promises and protestations to his late
 "Majesty, to give him full and real assistance in those en-
 "terprizes, which were of so great importance to this "Realm, and to the general peace and safety of all his "friends and allies: but when his Majesty entered into a "view of his treasure, he found how ill provided he was
 "to proceed effectually with so great an action, unless he "might be assured to receive such supplies from his loving "Subjects, as might enable him to manage the same.

"Hereupon his Majesty, being willing to tread in the "steps of his royal progenitors, for the making of good
 "and wholesome Laws, for the better government of his "people, for the right understanding of their true grie"vances, and for the supply of moneys to be employed
 "for those publick services, he did resolve to summon a "Parliament with all convenient speed he might, and "finding a former Parliament already called in the life of "his Father, he was desirous, for the speedier dispatch of "his weighty affairs, and gaining time, to have continued
 "the same without any alteration of the Members there-
 "of, had he not been advised to the contrary by his
 "Judges and Council at Law, which he desired to avoid.
 "But as soon as possible he could, he summoned a new "Parliament, which he did with much confidence and "assurance of the love of his people, that those (who had "not long before, with some importunity won his Father
 "to break off his former Treaties with Spain, and to "effect it, had used mediation of his now Majesty, being "then Prince, and a Member of the Parliament, and had "promised in Parliament their utmost assistance, for the "enabling of his late Majesty to undergo the war, which "they then foresaw might follow,) would assuredly have "performed it to his now Majesty, and would not have "suffered him, in his first enterprise of so great an expec"tation, to have run the least hazard through their de"faults.

"This Parliament (after some adjournment, by reason "of his Majesty's unavoidable occasions interposing) being "assembled on the eighteenth day of June, it is true,
 "that his Commons in Parliament taking into their due
 "and serious consideration the manifold occasions, which
 "at his first entry did press his Majesty, and his most im"portant affairs, which both at home and abroad were "then in action, did with great readiness and alacrity, as "a pledge of their most bounden duty and thankfulness,
 "and as the first-fruits of the most dutiful affections of "his loving and loyal Subjects, devoted to his service, pre"sent his Majesty with the free and cheerful gift of two "entire Subsidies: which their gift, and much more the "freeness and heartiness expressed in the giving thereof,
 "his Majesty did thankfully and lovingly accept: But "when he had more narrowly entered into the considera"tion of his great affairs, wherein he was embarked,
 "and from which he could not, without much dishonour
 "and disadvantage, withdraw his hand, he found that this "sum of money was much short of that which of neces"sity must be presently expended, for the setting forward
 "of those great actions, which by advice of his Council,
 "he had undertaken, and were that summer to be pursued.
 "This his Majesty imparted to his Commons House of "Parliament; but before the same could receive that de"bate and due consideration which was fit, the fearful vi"sitation of the plague in and about the Cities of London
 "and Westminster, where the Lords and the principal
 "Gentlemen of quality of his whole Kingdom were, for "the time of this their service, lodged and abiding, did
 "so much increase, that his Majesty, without extreme "peril to the lives of his good Subjects, which were dear
 "unto him, could not continue the Parliament any longer
 "in that place.

"His Majesty therefore on the eleventh day of July
 "then following, adjourned the Parliament from Westmin- "ster, until the first day of August then following, at the "City of Oxford. And his Highness was so careful to "accommodate his Lords and Commons there, that as he "made choice of that place, being then the freest of all "others from the danger of that grievous sickness, so he
 "there fitted the Parliament-men with all things conven"ient for their entertainment: and his Majesty himself
 "being in his own heart sincere and free from all ends
 "upon his people, which the fearer of hearts best know-
 "eth, he little expected that any misconstruction of his "actions would have been made as he there found. But "when the Parliament had been a while assembled, and "his Majesty's affairs opened unto them, and a further

"supply desired as necessity required, he found them so "slow, and so full of delays and diversions in their reso"lutions, that before any thing could be determined, the "fearful contagion daily increased, and was dispersed into "all parts of this Kingdom, and came home even to their "doors where they assembled. His Majesty therefore ra"ther preferred the safety of his people from that present
 "and visible danger, than the providing for that which "was more remote, but no less dangerous to the state of
 "this Kingdom, and of the affairs of that part of Chri- "stendom which then were, and yet are in friendship
 "and alliance with his Majesty. And thereupon his Ma"jesty, not being then able to discern when it might please
 "God to stay his hand of visitation, nor what place might "be more secure than other, at a time convenient for their
 "re-assembling, his Majesty dissolved that Parliament.

"That Parliament being now ended, his Majesty did "not therewith cast off his royal care of his great and "important affairs; but by the advice of his Privy Coun"cil, and of his Council of War, he continued his pre"parations and former resolutions; and therein not only
 "expended those monies, which by the two Subsidies afore"said were given unto him for his own private use, where-
 "of he had too much occasion, as he found the state of his "Exchequer at his first entrance, but added much more
 "of his own, as by his credit, and the credit of some of "his servants, he was able to compass the same. At last,
 "by much disadvantage, by the retarding of provisions,
 "and uncertainty of the means, his Navy was prepared
 "and set to sea, and the designs unto which they were "sent, and especially directed, were so probable, and so
 "well advised, that had they not miscarried in the execu"tion, his Majesty is well assured, they would have given
 "good satisfaction, not only to his own people, but to all "the world, that they were not lightly or unadvisedly un"dertaken and pursued. But it pleased God, who is the "Lord of Hosts, and unto whose Providence and good "pleasure his Majesty doth, and shall submit himself, and
 "all his endeavours, not to give that success which was "desired: and yet were those attempts not altogether so "fruitless, as the envy of the times hath apprehended,
 "the enemy receiving thereby no small loss, nor our party
 "no little advantage. And it would much avail to fur"ther his Majesty's great affairs, and the peace of Chri- "stendom, which ought to be the true end of all hosti"lity, were these first beginnings, which are most sub"ject to miscarry, well seconded and pursued, as his Ma"jesty intended, and as in the judgment of all men, con-
 "servant in his actions of this nature, were fit not to "have been neglected.

"These things being thus acted, and God of his infi"nite goodness, beyond expectation, affording the rage of "the pestilence, and, in a manner, of a sudden restoring "health and safety to the Cities of London and Westmin- "ster, which are the fittest places for the resort of his "Majesty, his Lords and Commons to meet in Parlia"ment; his Majesty, in the depth of winter, no sooner
 "desired the probability of a safe assembling of his Peo"ple, and in his princely wisdom and providence foresaw,
 "that if the opportunity of season should be omitted, pre"parations both defensive and offensive could not be made
 "in such sort, as was requisite for their common safety,
 "but he advised and resolved of the summoning of a new "Parliament, where he might freely communicate the "necessities of the State, and the counsel and advice of the "Lords and Commons in Parliament, who were the re"presentative body of the whole Kingdom, and the great
 "counsel of the Realm, might proceed in these enterprises,
 "and be enabled thereunto, which concern the common "good, safety and honour both of Prince and People; and
 "accordingly the 6th of February last, a new Parliament "was begun. At the first meeting, his Majesty did for"bear to press them with any thing which might have the "least appearance of his own interest, but recommended
 "unto them the care of making good Laws, which are the "ordinary subject for a Parliament.

"His Majesty believing, that they could not have suf"fered many days, much less many weeks, to have pas"sed by, before the apprehension and care of the common
 "safety of this Kingdom, and the true Religion protested
 "and maintained therein, and of our friends and allies,
 "who must prosper, or suffer with us, would have led
 "them to a due and timely consideration of all the means
 "which might best conduce to those ends; which the "Lords of the higher House, by a Committee of that "House, did timely and seasonably consider of, and in"vited the Commons to a conference concerning that "great business. At which conference, there were opened
 "unto them the great occasions which pressed his Majesty,
 "which making no impression with them, his Majesty
 "did, first by message, and after by letters, put the House
 "of

“ of Commons in mind of that which was most necessary; the defence of the Kingdom, and due and timely preparations for the same.

“ The Commons House after this, upon the 27th of March last, with one unanimous consent at first, agreed to give unto his Majesty three entire Subsidies, and three Fifteens, for a present supply unto him; and upon the 26th of April after, upon second cogitations, they added a fourth Subsidy, and ordered the days of payment for them all, whereof the first should have been on the last day of this present June. Upon this, the King of Denmark, and other Princes and States, being engaged with his Majesty in this common cause, his Majesty fitted his occasions according to the times which were appointed for the payment of those Subsidies and Fifteens, and halted on the Lords Committees, and his Council of War, to perfect their resolutions for the ordering and settling of his designs; which they accordingly did, and brought them to that maturity, that they found no impediment to a final conclusion of their counsels, but want of money to put things into action. His Majesty hereupon, who had with much patience expected the real performance of that which the Commons had promised, finding the time of the year passing away, and having intelligence not only from his own Ministers and Subjects in foreign parts, but from all parts of Christendom, and of the great and powerful preparations of the King of Spain, and that his design was upon this Kingdom, or the Kingdom of Ireland, or both, (and it is hard to determine which of them would be of worse consequence) he acquainted the House of Commons therewith, and laid open unto them truly and clearly, how the state of things then stood, and yet stand, and at several times, and upon several occasions reiterated the same: But that House being abused by the violent and ill-advised passions of a few Members of the House, for private and personal ends, ill becoming public Persons, trusted by their country, as then they were, not only neglected, but wilfully refused to hearken to all the gentle admonitions which his Majesty could give them, and neither did nor would intend any thing, but the prosecution of one of the Peers of this Realm, and that in such a disordered manner, as being set at their own instance into a legal way, wherein the proofs on either part would have ruled the cause, which his Majesty allowed, they were not therewith content, but in their intemperate passions and desires to seek for errors in another, fell into a greater error themselves, and not only neglected to give just satisfaction to his Majesty in several cases which happened concerning his Regality, but wholly forgot their engagements to his Majesty for the public defence of the Realm: Whereupon his Majesty wrote the forementioned letter to the Speaker, dated the ninth day of June 1626.

“ Notwithstanding which letter read in the House, being a clear and gracious manifest of his Majesty's resolutions, they never so much as admitted one reading to the bill of Subsidies, but instead thereof, they prepared and voted a remonstrance or declaration, which they intended to prefer to his Majesty, containing (though palliated with glossing terms) as well dishonourable aspersions upon his Majesty, and upon the sacred memory of his deceased Father, as also dilatory excuses for their not proceeding with the Subsidies, adding thereto also coloured conditions, crossing thereby his Majesty's direction; which his Majesty understanding, and esteeming (as he had cause) to be a denial of the promised Supply, and finding that no admonitions could move, no reasons or persuasions could prevail, when the time was so far spent, that they had put an impossibility upon themselves to perform their promises, which they esteemed all gracious messages unto them to be but interruptions: His Majesty, upon mature advisement, discerning that his further patience would prove fruitless, on the fifteenth day of this present month he hath dissolved this unhappy Parliament: the acting whereof, as it was to his Majesty an unexpressible grief, so the memory thereof doth renew the hearty sorrow, which all his good and well-affected Subjects will compassionate with him.

“ These passages his Majesty hath at the more length, and with the true circumstances thereof, expressed and published to the world, lest that which hath been unfortunate in itself, through the malice of the author of so great a mischief, and the malevolent report of such as are ill-affected to this State, or the true Religion here professed, or the fears or jealousies of Friends and dutiful Subjects, might be made more unfortunate in the consequences of it, which may be of worst effect than at the first can be well apprehended; and his Majesty being best privy to the integrity of his own heart, for the constant maintaining of the sincerity and unity of the true Religion professed in the Church of England, No. 56. VOL. II.

“ and to free it from the open contagion of Popery, and secret infection of Schism, of both which, by his public acts and actions, he hath given good testimony, and with a single heart, as in the presence of God, who can best judge thereof, purposeth resolutely and constantly to proceed in the due execution of either; and observing the subtilty of the adverse party, he cannot but believe, that the hand of Jeab hath been in this disaster, that the common incendiaries of Christendom have subtilly and secretly insinuated those things, which unhappily (and, as his Majesty hopeth, beyond the intentions of the actors) have caused these diversions and distractions: And yet notwithstanding, his most excellent Majesty, for the comfort of his good and well-affected Subjects, in whose loves he doth repose himself with confidence, and esteemeth it as his greatest riches; for the assuring of his Friends and Allies, with whom, by God's assistance, he will not break in the substance of what he hath undertaken; for the discouraging of his adversaries, and the adversaries of his cause; and of his Dominions, and Religion, hath put on this resolution, which he doth hereby publish to all the world, that as God hath made him King of this great People, and large Dominions, famous in former ages both by land and sea, and trusted him to be a father and protector both of their persons and fortunes, and a defender of the Faith and true Religion; so he will go on cheerfully and constantly in the defence thereof, and (notwithstanding so many difficulties and discouragements) will take his sceptre and sword into his hand, and not expose the persons of the People committed to his charge, to the unsatiable desires of the King of Spain, who hath long thirsted after the universal Monarchy, nor their consciences to the yoke of the Pope of Rome: And that at home he will take that care to redress the just grievances of his good Subjects, as shall be every way fit for a good King.

“ And in the mean time his Majesty doth publish this to all his loving Subjects, that they may know what to think with truth, and speak with duty of his Majesty's actions and proceedings in these two last dissolved Parliaments.”

Given at his Majesty's Palace at Whitehall, this Thirtieth Day of June, in the second Year of his Majesty's Reign of Great-Britain, France and Ireland.

This Declaration, which seems to be in the same stile with the Lord-Keeper Coventry's Speeches, full of long periods, and parenthesis, contained, under a vast heap of words, but two things to the purpose, namely, the two reasons which obliged the King to dissolve the two last Parliaments. It is said there, the plague which approached Oxford, occasioned the dissolution of the first. But this reason, which seems plausible, proves at most but a necessity to discontinue the Parliament, which might have been done by prorogation, as easily as by an entire dissolution. In the second place, when this declaration was published, every one knew what the Commons had said in their Remonstrance, that the end of dissolving the first, was to preclude from the following Parliament such Members as had been against the Duke of Buckingham, by causing them to be made Sheriffs of their several Counties. As to the dissolution of the second, it is wholly grounded in the Declaration, upon the King's being pleased to consider as an absolute denial the Commons delay to supply him with money, though they affirmed the contrary. But none were so blind as not to see that the Commons demand, that the King would be pleased to remove the Duke of Buckingham from his presence, and the fear of the ill success of this dissolution. So, the Declaration had no great effect among the People, who, besides, were not apprehensive of the pretended invasion of England or Ireland by the Spaniards, though the King did his utmost to inspire them with such a dread. It was something extraordinary, that within little more than a year, the war which was undertaken for the recovery of the Palatinate, should be changed into a defensive war, for the preservation of the King's Dominions, and support of the Church of England, though the English had not yet received any check.

A few days after the Declaration was published, two Proclamations appeared, which afforded ample matter of discourse to such as were not of the Court-party. By the first, the King commanded all persons who had any copies of the Commons Remonstrance to burn the same, on pain of his highest displeasure. But such precautions serve generally only to cause the prohibited writings to be more carefully preserved. The King's injunction could not hinder this remonstrance from being transmitted to posterity.

The second Proclamation contained very express commands, not to preach or dispute upon the controverted points of Arminianism, either for or against them, under colour that such sort of disputes served only to breed contention.

"and instant occasion not admitting any such dispute, which would but disturb and protract the Sheriff."

"Lastly, The Commissioners were required and commanded, upon their faith and allegiance to his Majesty, to keep secret to themselves, and not impart or disclose these instructions to others."

For the advancement of the loan, care was taken to publish a list of such as had freely subscribed, for a good example to others, and all the Peers and Gentlemen were ordered to repair to their Country-seats, that their absence might cause no delay or obstacle to the subscriptions. Sir Randolph Crew, Lord Chief Justice, showing no zeal for advancing the loan, was removed from his place, which was given to Sir Nicholas Hyde (1). The King believed it necessary to show by this example, that he would admit of no excuse (2).

Besides this example, the Court used, to promote the loan, some other ways, which, probably, would not be less effectual. The first was, the billeting of Soldiers upon private houses, contrary to the constant custom of England, where all, but such as keep public houses, have the privilege of not being obliged to lodge Soldiers against their wills. It is easy to perceive, that those who showed any reluctance to lend the King money, were not spared on this occasion, and that the Soldiers quartered upon them took care to let them see, what they exposed themselves to by disobeying the King. Moreover, such as were sufferers by these troublesome guests, could not summon them before the usual Judges; but by the King's express orders, they were obliged to apply to a Council of war, so that the Officers were the sole Judges of their Soldiers. This is never practised in England, where Councils of war have no jurisdiction but what the Parliament allows them by an Act on purpose, limiting both the time and the occasions. In short, it evidently appeared, that the King would not be contradicted, and was resolved to raise money upon the Subject as he pleased. It is true, he grounded his proceedings upon former precedents. But that some of his predecessors had, many ages before, practised these methods, whether out of necessity or otherwise, was sufficient for him to consider such a precedent as the foundation of his Right, and a prerogative of the Crown. Notwithstanding all this, the people in general were so averse to the loan, that the money flowed but slowly into the King's Exchequer. The Court therefore was obliged to use a more violent remedy to force the most obdurate. And that was, to order such of the common sort as refused to subscribe to the loan, to be enrolled as Soldiers to serve in his Majesty's Troops. As for persons of birth and rank, they were summoned to appear before the Council, and upon a second refusal to lend money, were confined to places at a great distance from their habitations, and such as refused to be thus confined, were committed to the several prisons in London. Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, and a zealous adherent of the King, was among the imprisoned (3).

Besides these means, the Court practised another, from whence they expected great advantages, but which proved more detrimental than beneficial to the King. And that was, to cause Ministers, gained for that purpose, to preach as a Scripture-doctrine, that Subjects were obliged to obey the King's commands, without examination. Two of these Ministers distinguished themselves by their Sermons on this subject. Dr. Sibthorp, who was once, says, among other things, in a Sermon [preached at Northampton, at Lent assizes:]

That the Prince, who is the Head, and makes his Court and Council, it is his duty to direct and make Laws, Eccles. viii. 3, 4. He doth whatsoever pleases him. Where the word of a King is, there is power, and who may say unto him, What dost thou? — If Princes command any thing which Subjects may not perform, because it is against the laws of God, or of nature, or impossible, yet Subjects are bound to undergo the punishment, without either resisting, or railing, or reviling, and so to yield a passive obedience where they cannot exhibit an active one. — I know no other case, but one of those three, wherein a Subject may excuse himself with passive obedience; but in all other he is bound to active obedience.

But Dr. Manwaring spoke still more plainly in one of his Sermons. He said, That the King is not bound to observe the Laws of the Realm concerning the Subjects Rights and Liberties, but that his Royal will and command in imposing loans and taxes, without common consent in Parliament, doth oblige the Subjects conscience upon pain of eternal damnation. That those who refused to pay this Loan, offended against the Law of God, and the King's supreme authority, and became guilty of impiety, disloyalty, and rebellion. And that the authority of Parliament is not necessary for the raising of Aids and Subsidies; and that the slow proceedings of such great Assemblies, were not fitted for the supply of the States urgent necessities, but would rather produce sundry impediments to the just designs of Princes.

It can hardly be thought, that such a doctrine was publicly preached in England, or at least, it is apt to be imagined, that these preachers were men of no name, who sought to please the Court, and were not openly approved. But this belief must be changed, when it is considered, that Archbishop Abbot was suspended from all his Archiepiscopal functions, and confined to one of his Country-houses (4), for refusing to license Sibthorp's Sermon: that Manwaring, after having been sentenced by the Lords in the next Parliament, to pay a thousand pounds fine, to make a publick submission at the Bars of the two Houses, and to be imprisoned [during the pleasure of the Lords,] after having been suspended for three years, and declared incapable of holding any Ecclesiastical dignity, or secular office, obtained nevertheless the King's pardon, with a good Benefice, and afterwards a Bishoprick. One cannot therefore help thinking, that the doctrine preached by these Ministers, was approved, favored, and countenanced by the Court. Indeed, the King's, and his Minister's conduct plainly showed, it was their intention to establish an arbitrary Power, and set the King above the Laws. Of this we shall see farther proofs in the sequel.

Notwithstanding the King's hopes to succeed at length in his project, he was not easy: the war he had undertaken for the recovery of the Palatinate, was so slowly and unsuccessfully carried on, that it was evident he would never compass his ends by continuing it in such a manner. Hitherto, every thing had miscarried. The twelve thousand men intended for the Palatinate, under the command of Count Mansfeldt, were lost for want of proper measures for their passage, as was shown in the Reign of King James. The projected expedition against Cadix and the Spanish West-India Fleet, had met with no better success. The King of Denmark beginning a war with the Emperor, at the instance of his Nephew the King of England, was entirely defeated. The United Provinces of the Low-Countries in alliance with England, were rather in want of assistance, than able to give any. Lewis XIII. had flattered the King of England with hopes of a League against the House of Austria, only to obtain the better terms from the Spaniards in Italy, and since he had concluded a peace in that Country, did not show the least inclination to join with England for the recovery of the Palatinate. Thus Charles saw himself farther than ever from the execution of his grand projects. To this may be added, that the dissolution of his two first Parliaments, without obtaining the expected Supplies, rendered him contemptible to his neighbours. There was no State desirous to enter into a strict alliance with a Prince who had imprudently quarrelled with his Subjects, when he most wanted their assistance. In short, though he had intended to free himself from the yoke of Parliaments, and put himself in a condition to raise what money he pleased upon his Subjects, by the methods he had devised, he daily perceived he had taken wrong measures. The Loan-money came in but very slowly. To raise it, he was obliged continually to use rigour and violence, the English for the most part refusing voluntarily to submit to a Power, they believed contrary to their Liberties and Laws. The Court therefore was forced to be cautious in the examples of rigour against the disobedient, that it might not cause an open Rebellion, for fear if a flame broke out in any part, it would spread over the whole Kingdom.

The King in his present situation, seems to have had but one of these two courses to take, either to agree with his People, or make peace with Spain. By the first course, he would have been enabled to push the war he had undertaken more vigorously. By the second, he would have been freed from the trouble of demanding extraordinary Supplies of his Parliament, or of raising money by unusual methods, which gained him the hatred of his people. But

(2) The Papists contributed very freely in the Loan, but the Puritans were very backward in it. Whitelock, p. 2. This did beget in the King at first a tenderness towards the Papists, and afterwards a trust and confidence in them: which was unhappily mistaken by his other Subjects, as if he trusted to their Religion. Whitwood, p. 37.

(3) The following Gentlemen were appointed to several confinements, not in their own but distant Counties. George Ratcliffe, Esq; Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Strangways, Sir Thomas Greenham, Sir John Thynne, Sir Nathaniel Bernardine, William Corbett, Esq; Richard Knightly, Esq; Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir Robert Pelet, John Hampden. These, with many others, were secured in foreign Counties for refusing the Loan. Many of these Gentlemen were afterwards sent for by Pursuivants out of the Counties where they were confined by order of the Council, and committed to several Prisons, (some to the Fleet, some to the Marshalsea and Gate-house). From which last place, Sir John Elliot sends a Petition to his Majesty, which the Reader may see in Rushworth, Tom. I. p. 429.

both these courses were contrary to his temper, his character, his projects, the interests of his Favorite and Ministers. As to the first, I believe I may affirm, he had formed the project of establishing in England a despotick Power. I shall not lose time in proving it. I had rather the Reader would judge for himself, by the King's own Speeches, by his Messages to the House of Commons, by his conduct, and by that of his Ministers and Council. What has been hitherto seen may serve to give some idea of it, but what will appear hereafter, will, as I think, afford undeniable proofs. This being supposed, Charles could not divert himself of the principles imbibed from his infancy, and deeply rooted in him by his Father's instructions and examples, without relinquishing his projects, and forming a new Plan of Government, directly contrary to his temper and inclination. In a reconciliation with his people, he must have submitted to the maxims of the Parliament, who were continually urging the Laws of the Land, and the Liberties of the People, and been obliged to become, if I may so say, less a King than he had hitherto been, and than he thought he had right to be. The suffering the extent of the Prerogative Royal to be questioned on all occasions, was a thing too opposite to his temper. This was a point of which he was no less, or rather more, tender than his Father. Besides, the Duke of Buckingham, who had a great influence over him, plainly saw, that an agreement between the King and People, would infallibly be followed with his own ruin. The rest of the Ministers, who were all his creatures, perceived likewise, that their welfare depended on the Favorite's, and that the Favorite's credit could not subsist with a good understanding between the King and his Parliament. It was necessary therefore, that the King, to extricate himself out of this labyrinth, should become, as I may say, quite another man, should alter his principles, should have strength of mind sufficient to discern clearly his true interests, from those of his Favorites and Ministers, and resolution to proceed without their assistance, and follow counsels more agreeable to his Subjects. But this was a thing impossible, considering the King's character, who seemed then of an inflexible temper. He perceived in the end, he had taken a wrong course, but not till it was too late to forsake it.

As to the other course, which was to make Peace with Spain, besides that the King thought himself bound in honour to support a war of which he was the sole author, though he always affected to impute it to the Parliament, this Peace was entirely contrary to his private interest. How little success could he have expected from the continuance of the war, in his present circumstances, it served him for pretence to levy money upon his people, and afforded him means to put in practice his projects to establish an absolute power. On the other hand, it being the interest of his Favorite and Ministers to keep him at variance with his people, to whom they were all very odious, they could not do it better than by putting him under an indispensable necessity of raising money upon the Subject, without consent of Parliament.

The effect of this policy evidently appeared at the very time I am speaking of. Instead of persuading the King to make Peace with Spain, they engaged him by degrees to proclaim war with France, at a time when he knew not how to continue the war he had begun with the House of Austria. To engage France to afford some pretence for the rupture which was meditating in England, the King upon some disgust concerning the Queen's French Chaplains and Domesticks (1), dismissed them all, having first paid what was due for wages or salaries. The King of France highly resented this manifest breach of the marriage-treaty; but however, did nothing that showed a design to be revenged by way of arms. So the disgust received from the Queen's Domesticks, who were sufficiently punished, could not serve for pretence of a rupture on the side of England, since on the contrary, France had reason to complain of the breach of the Treaty. Nevertheless, it was intended to make war upon France, under colour of supporting the Huguenots who were oppressed, and threatened with utter destruction (2). But when the character of the King, of the Favorite, and of the Ministry is considered, it can hardly be thought, that the desire of maintaining the Protestant Religion, such as it was in France, was the real motive of this war. The King and his whole Court mortally hated the Presbyterians. The Duke of Buckingham had properly no Religion at all. Wiston and Conway were Catholics. Laud and Neile thought it impossible to be saved out of the Church of England. How then can it be imagined that all these men who were the King's most intimate Counsellors, should combine to support in France a Religion for which they had the utmost contempt? It is much more probable, that the King's Ministers seeing little likelihood of recovering the Palatinate by arms, and fearing the King would at length be tired of a fruitless war with Spain, induced him to carry his arms into France, in order still to keep him under a necessity of raising money by extraordinary methods, and thereby perpetuating his misunderstanding with his Subjects, on which the continuance of their credit entirely depended. But I own this is only conjecture. Another cause is alleged of this war with France, namely, the Duke of Buckingham's pride, who being sent to Paris to conduct the Queen into England, became amorous of Ann of Austria Wife to Lewis XIII, and had the confidence to disclose his passion. It is said, the Court of France threatened him with a punishment suitable to his insolence, and refused to let him see the Queen any more, but that he swore, he would see her in spite of them all. To this oath is ascribed the resolution intilled into the King his master to make war upon France, in hopes it would give him an opportunity to perform his oath. I own, I see very little probability in this pretended project, which however the Lord Clarendon has thought fit to mention (3).

The war with France being resolved, the King declared the grounds of it to his Council, namely,

I. That the House of Austria had such an influence upon the Council of France, as to prevail with them to obstruct the landing of Count Mansfield's army, contrary to promise, with whom the French should have joined Forces, for the relief of the Palatinate, and the German Princes; which failure of performance in them, proved the ruin of that Army.

I have spoken of this affair in the Reign of King James I, and showed that it was an error of the Council of England to depend upon a general promise as upon a Treaty. Besides, it was too late for the King to think of revenging this pretended affront, which had not prevented his espousing the French King's sister.

II. That having by his mediation prevailed for a Peace between the French King and his Protestant Subjects, and engaged his word, that the Protestants should observe the articles of agreement: Nevertheless the King of France, contrary to the said articles, blocked up their towns, garrisons and forts, and had committed many spoils upon them when they had done nothing in violation of the dict of Peace.

'Tis very true, it was the interest of England to support the Huguenots, who were unjustly oppressed. But by what law is a Prince, who procures a peace between two enemies, but is not guarantee for performance of articles, empowered to go to war with one of the parties that breaks it? Had the King been satisfied with saying, the interest of England would not suffer the Huguenots to be oppressed, this political reason might have been allowed. But in such cases there is a wide difference between interest and right.

III. That the King of France had committed an example of great injustice in full peace, to seize upon one hundred and twenty English Ships, with all their merchandise and artillery.

The King passes over in silence, that the French acted only by way of reprisal, and that the English were the aggressors, as the Parliament had complained to the King himself. It is evident therefore, that the grounds of this war could not be more frivolous.

The King's design was to send a Fleet to Rochel, under colour of relieving that place, which was threatened with a siege. This affair had been managed at the Court of England by the Duke of Soubize, and Monsieur St. Blancard a Gentleman of Languedoc, without the knowledge of the Rochellers. This gives occasion to suspect, that their intention was to deliver the town to the English, on pretence of relieving it. However this be, the affair was kept very private, and ever since April a fleet had been equipping with all expedition, without any possibility of guessing for what it was intended. When it was ready, the King gave the Duke of Buckingham a commission, which plainly showed, the affair was to be a secret. XVIII. By this commission, the Duke was made Admiral of the fleet, and Commander in chief of the land-forces, which should be embarked for the recovery of the Palatinate, according to such private instructions as he should receive from his Majesty.

2 The Duke of Buckingham is reasonably supposed to have been the Author of this War; either out of revenge, for having been expelled against his will, in 1619, when he was appointed to go Ambassador to France; or on account of some affront put upon him by that Court, when he was sent to bring the Ann's dowry, from that time, he took all the ways he could to undermine the French Court, and behaved himself very cruelly to her. See Clarendon, T. II. p. 316.

1627. on board seven thousand soldiers, sailed from Portsmouth the 7th of June, and on the 20th of July appeared before Rochel. At the Duke's approach, the Rochellers shut their gates for fear of a surprize, as having no notice that an English fleet was to come so near them. Presently after were seen to arrive the Duke of Soubise, with Sir William Beecher, who told them from the Duke of Buckingham, that the King of England, out of Compassion to their sufferings, had sent a Fleet and Army to their assistance, and if they refused his aid, he declared he was fully quit of his engagement of honour and conscience for their relief. The Mayor replied in the name of the inhabitants, that they most humbly thanked his Majesty for the care he had of them; but that being in strict union with all the rest of the Protestants in the Kingdom, they could not receive into the city the offered succours, without consulting their friends, and without the previous consent of the whole body of the Huguenots. The Duke of Buckingham finding by this answer, it would not be easy to get his troops into Rochel, directed his course to the Isle of Rhe, where Tairas commanded. Tairas endeavoured at first to hinder the landing of the English; but as his forces were few, he was obliged to retreat to his citadel at St. Martin's, which was in a good state of defence. Had the Duke understood the art of war, he would, without losing a moment, have marched to the fort, and thereby hindered Tairas from getting in provisions. But he spent so much time in landing, and in preparing to march, that Tairas had leisure to store the place with ammunition. At last he marched to St. Martin's, and besieged it in form, but with little success. He had to deal with one more expert than himself, and who found means to keep him employed in the siege till November, though he had sent the King word he should be master of the place in eight days. Mean while, the King of France, who had not expected this invasion, ordered his troops to march with all speed towards the sea, and came in person to hasten the relief of the Isle of Rhe. When every thing was ready, Count Schomberg passed into the Isle with six or seven thousand men, without any opposition from the English fleet. Then he marched to St. Martin's, the siege whereof the Duke of Buckingham raised with precipitation, being vigorously pushed by the French to the very sea-side, so that it was with great difficulty that he re-embarked his remaining troops. 'Tis said, of the seven thousand men he brought from England, near five thousand perished in this unfortunate expedition. It was rumoured however in England, that not above fifteen hundred were lost, and some even say, the King was made to believe it.

Whilst the Duke of Buckingham was employed in this expedition, Sir John Elliot, imprisoned for refusing to lend the King money, presented to his Majesty a petition for his liberty, which he did not ask as a favour, but as justice. He grounded his request upon several Statutes which he cited, and by which he pretended to shew, that the King could not exact money from the Subject by way of loan, nor were the Subjects bound to submit to it. As the King then stood disposed, this petition could be of no service to the person that presented it. In November following, some other Gentlemen (1), committed for the same reason, brought their Habeas Corpus, that is, desired to be discharged upon bail, a privilege enjoyed by all Englishmen (2). This cause was pleaded very solemnly before all the Judges of the Realm. There were two points to be decided. The first, whether the prisoners were committed by the special command of the King, since the Warden said only, that the prisoners were detained by command of the King, signified to him by warrant of several of the Privy-Council. Now the prisoners pleaded, that, according to law, the King's order should be produced, not barely for detaining them, but for committing them; and that besides, the signifying of the order by the Lords of the Council, shewed, it was not by special command of his Majesty. The second point was, whether the King could imprison any subject without declaring the cause of the commitment, and whether in such case, the prisoners ought not to have the benefit of a Habeas Corpus, that is, to be discharged upon bail. The counsel for the prisoners represented the terrible consequences of such a power in the King, since thereby the liberty of every Subject would be at the King's mercy, who could detain them in prison as long as he pleased, and there would be no remedy by law. But the Judges unanimously decided against the prisoners, who were all remanded to their several prisons.

The ill success of the Isle of Rhe expedition raised numberless complaints and murmurs against the Duke of Buckingham, who had many enemies. Multitudes were lost in that unfortunate undertaking, and among the rest, Major-general Barrroughs, one of the best officers in England; and these misfortunes were imputed to the Duke of Buckingham's incapacity, who had never been in the wars, and knew nothing of the sea-service, though the King had made him both Admiral and Captain-general. To these complaints were added others upon other accounts. The 33 mariners complained, they had received no wages for three years past, and deserted in great numbers, not to be forced to serve any longer without pay. The merchants made bitter complaints, that the seas were neglected, that within three years they had lost a great number of ships, and that the fishermen were taken almost in the very harbours. In a word, no one ventured to build any new ships, because as soon as they were ready the King seized them for his service, against the will of the owners.

Though the King did not much regard all these complaints, which perhaps reached him not; he was however very attentive to the petition which the Rochellers, upon the point of being besieged, sent him by their Deputies, for relief. He had engaged in a war with France, upon his good opinion of his Fleet, and of his Favorite's ability, and the experience shewed him this opinion was ill-grounded, he would proceed, let what would be the consequence. Mean while, he saw himself without money, and the opposition he met with in the affair of the Loan, made him sensible how difficult it would be to raise it by such methods. For this reason he consulted Sir Robert Cotton, upon the present situation of his affairs. Cotton advised him to call a Parliament, as the best means to free himself from all difficulties. But as Sir Robert foresaw the House of Commons would attack the Duke of Buckingham, he advised withal, that the Duke might be the first, who, in full Council, should move the calling of a Parliament. This advice was followed, and the Duke having acted his part, the Parliament was summoned by the unanimous resolution of the Council, to meet the 17th of March 1628. Immediately after, warrants were sent to all parts to release the imprisoned and confined Gentlemen for the affair of the Loan money, and the King had the mortification to see but of almost all of them, to the number of twenty-seven, chosen to serve for Representatives in the ensuing Parliament (3). He sent writs of summons also to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was confined to one of his houses, to the Bishop of Lincoln prisoner in the Tower, and to the Earl of Bristol. At the same time, the Council ordered the Lord-Mayor of London to use moderation in demanding the Loan-money. This shews that there were still some people who stood out, and that violence was hitherto used to compel them.

The Parliament being assembled the 17th of March, the King made the following Speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

THESE times are for action: Wherefore, for example sake, I mean not to spend much time in words; expecting accordingly, that your (as I hope) good resolutions will be speedy, not spending time unnecessarily, or (that I may better say) dangerously: For tedious consultations at this conjuncture of time are as hurtful as ill resolutions.

"I am sure you now expect from me, both to know the cause of your meeting, and what to resolve on: Yet I think that there is none here but knows, that common danger is the cause of this Parliament, and that Supply at this time is the chief end of it: So that I need but point to you what to do. I will use but few persuasions: For if to maintain your own advices, and as now the case stands for the following thereof, the true Religion, Laws, and Liberties of this State, and the just defence of our true friends and allies; be not sufficient, then no eloquence of men or angels will prevail.

"Only let me remember you, that my duty most of all, and every one of yours according to his degree, is to seek the maintenance of this Church and Commonwealth: And certainly, there never was a time in which this duty was more necessarily required than now.

(1) Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Hevingham, Sir Edward Hampden. Rushworth, Tom. I. p. 439.

(2) For the better understanding of what follows, it must be observed, that when any person is committed (unless for Treason or Felony) upon his sending a Copy of the Mittimus to the Chancellor, or any one of the Judges of the Exchequer, they are obliged to grant him a Writ called Habeas Corpus, upon the receipt of which, the Head Officer or Keeper must carry up the Prisoner, and return the causes of his Commitment and Detainment to the Court, to which the Writ is returnable. Then the Judge determines whether the case be bailiable. If not, the Prisoner is remanded back to Prison. In the present case, the Warden of the Fleet made this Return: "That Sir Walter Earl, Kt. named in the Writ, is detained in the Prison of the Fleet in his custody, by special command of the King, to him signed by Warrant of several of the Privy-Council." Now it was pleaded in behalf of the Prisoners, that the form of the Return was not good, the cause of the Commitment not being specified, as the Writ requires. And therefore, if the Prisoners were not bailed, but remanded, the Subjects of the Kingdom may be refused of the Liberty for ever, and by law there can be no remedy. See Rushworth, Tom. I. p. 439.

(3) There were released in all seventy-eight. See Rushworth, Tom. I. p. 473, where they are all named.

1627-8. " I therefore judging a Parliament to be the ancient, speediest, and best way in this time of common danger, to give such Supply as to secure ourselves, and to save our friends from imminent ruin, have called you together. Every man now must do according to his conscience: wherefore if you (as God forbid) should not do your duties, in contributing what the State at this time needs, I must, in discharge of my conscience, use those other means which God hath put into my hands, to save that, which the follies of particular men may otherwise hazard to lose.

" Take not this as a threatening, for I scorn to threaten any but my equals, but an admonition from him, that both out of nature and duty, hath most care of your preservations and prosperities: And (though I thus speak) I hope that your demeanours at this time will be such, as shall not only make me approve your former Counsels, but lay on me such obligations, as shall tie me by way of thankfulness to meet often with you: For be assured, that nothing can be more pleasing unto me, than to keep a good correspondence with you.

" I will only add one thing more, and then leave my Lord Keeper to make a short paraphrase upon the text " I have delivered you, which is To remember a thing, to the end we may forget it. You may imagine that I came here with a doubt of success of what I desire, remembering the distractions of the last meeting: But I assure you, that I shall very easily and gladly forget and forgive what is past, so that you will at this present time leave the former ways of distractions, and follow the counsel late given you, To maintain the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace.

The Lord Keeper seconded his Majesty in this manner.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

*The Lord Keeper's
Speech.*

Y E are here in Parliament by his Majesty's writ and royal command, to consult and conclude of the weighty and urgent business of this Kingdom. Weighty it is and great, as great as the honour, safety, and protection of Religion, King, and Country: and what can be greater? Urgent it is; it is little pleasure to tell or think how urgent: And to tell it with circumstances, were a long work: I will but touch the sum of it in few words.

" The Pope and House of Austria have long affected, the one a spiritual, the other a temporal Monarchy: And to effect their ends, to serve each other's turn, the House of Austria, besides the rich and vast territories of both the Indies, and in Africa, joined together, are become masters of Spain and Italy, and the great Country of Germany. And although France be not under their subjection, yet they have environed all about it; the very bowels of the Kingdom swayed by the Popish faction: They have gotten such a part, and such intercession in the Government, that under pretence of Religion, to root out the Protestants and our Religion, they have drawn the King to their adherence, so far, that albeit upon his Majesty's interposition by his ambassadors, and his engagement of his Royal word, there was between the King and his Subjects articles of agreement, and the Subjects were quiet; whereof his Majesty, interested in that great Treaty, was bound to see a true accomplishment; yet against that strict alliance, that Treaty hath been broken, and those of the Religion have been put to all extremity, and undoubtedly will be ruined without present help. So as that King is not only diverted from assisting the common cause, but hath been misled to engage himself in hostile acts against our King and other Princes, making way thereby for the House of Austria, to the ruin of his own and other Kingdoms.

" Other Potentates, that in former time did balance and interrupt the growing greatness of the House of Austria, are now removed and diverted. The Turk hath made peace with the Emperor, and turned himself wholly into wars with Asia: The King of Sweden is embroiled in a war with Poland, which is invented by Spanish practices, to keep that King from succouring our part: The King of Denmark is chased out of his Kingdom, on this and on that side the Sound; so as the House of Austria is on the point to command all the sea-coasts, from Dantzick to Embden, and all the rivers falling into the Sea in that great extent: So, as besides the power by land, they begin to threaten our party by sea, to the subversion of all our State.

" In the Baltic sea, they are providing and arming all the Ships they can build or hire; and have at this time their Ambassadors treating at Lubeck, to draw into their service the Hanse Towns, whereby taking from us and our neighbours the east-land trade, by which our shipping is supplied, they expect, without any blow given, to " make themselves masters of that sea. In these western parts, by the Dunkirkers, and by the now French and Spanish Admiral, to the ruin of fishing (of infinite consequence both to us and the Low-Countries) they infect all our coast, so as we pass not safely from Port to Port. And that fleet which lately assisted the French at the Isle of Rhe, is now preparing at St. Andrews, with other Ships built in the coast of Biscay to re-inforce it, and a great fleet is making ready at Lisbon; where, besides their own, they do serve themselves upon all strangers bottoms coming to that coast for trade: And these great preparations are, no doubt, to assault us in England or Ireland, as they shall find advantage, and a place fit for their turn.

" Our friends of the Netherlands, besides the fear that justly troubles them, left the whole force of the Emperor may fall down upon them, are distracted by their voyages into the East, which hath carried both men and money into another world, and much weakened them at home.

" Thus are we even ready on all sides to be swallowed up; the Emperor, France, and Spain, being in open war against us; Germany over-run; the King of Denmark distressed; the King of Sweden diverted; and the Low-Country men disabled to give us assistance.

" I speak not this to increase fear, unworthy of English courages, but to press to provision worthy the wisdom of a Parliament: And for that cause his Majesty hath called you hither, that by a timely provision against those great imminent dangers, ourselves may be strengthened at home, our friends and allies encouraged abroad, and those great causes of fear scattered and dispelled.

" And because, in all warlike preparations, Treasure bears the name, and holds the semblance of the nerves and sinews; and if a sinew be too short or too weak, if it be either shrunk or strained, the part becomes unuseful: It is needful, that you make a good and timely supply of Treasure, without which all counsels will prove fruitless. I might press many reasons to this end, but I will name but few.

" First, For his Majesty's sake, who requires it. Great is the duty which we owe him by the law of God; great by the law of nature, and our own allegiance; great for his own merit, and the memory of his ever blessed Father. I do but point at them: but methinks our thoughts cannot but recoil on one consideration touched by his Majesty, which to me seems so found, like a parliamentary pact or covenant.

" A war was devised here, assistance professed, yea, and protested here: I do but touch it, I know you will deeply think on it; and the more, for the example the King hath set you; his hands, his plate, his jewels, he hath not spared, to supply the war: What the People hath protested, the King, for his part, hath willingly performed.

" Secondly, For the cause sake. It concerns us in Christian charity, to tender the distresses of our friends abroad; it concerns us in honour not to abandon them, who have stood for us. And if this come not close enough, you shall find our interest so woven and involved with theirs, that the cause is more ours than theirs. If Religion be in peril, we have the most flourishing and orthodox Church: If Honour be in question, the stories and monuments in former ages will shew, that our ancestors have left us as much as any nation: If Trade and Commerce be in danger, we are Islanders, it is our hue. All these at once lie at stake, and so doth our safety and being.

" Lastly, In respect of the manner of his Majesty's demand, which is in Parliament, the way that hath ever best pleased the subjects of England. And good cause for it: For, aids granted in Parliament work good effects for the People; they be commonly accompanied with wholesome laws, gracious pardons, and the like. Besides, just and good Kings finding the love of their People, and the readiness of their Supplies, may the better forbear the use of their Prerogatives, and moderate the rigour of the laws towards their Subjects.

" This way, as his Majesty hath told you, he hath chosen; not as the only way, but as the fittest; not as destitute of others, but as most agreeable to the goodness of his own most gracious disposition, and to the desire and weal of his People. If this be deferred, necessity and the sword of the enemy make way to the others. Remember his Majesty's admonition, I say, remember it.

" Let me but add, and observe God's mercy towards this land above all others. The torrent of war hath overwhelmed other Churches and Countries; but God hath hitherto restrained it from us, and still gives us warning of every approaching danger, to save us from surprize. And our gracious Sovereign, in a true sense of it, calls together his high Court of Parliament, the 1627-8. "lively representation of the wisdom, wealth and power of the whole Kingdom, to join together to repel those hostile attempts, which distressed our friends and allies, and threatened ourselves.

"And therefore it behoves all to apply their thoughts unto counsel and consultations, worthy the greatness and wisdom of this Assembly; to avoid discontents and divisions, which may either distemper or delay; and to attend that Unum necessarium, the common cause; propounding for the scope and work of all the debates, the general good of the King and Kingdom, whom God hath joined together with an indissoluble knot, which none must attempt to cut or untie. And let all, by unity and good accord, endeavour to pattern this Parliament by the best that have been, that it may be a pattern to future Parliaments, and may insure into Parliaments a kind of multiplying power and faculty, whereby they may be more frequent, and the King our Sovereign may delight to sit on his throne, and from thence to distribute his graces and favours amongst his People.

"His Majesty hath given you cause to be confident of this, you have heard from his royal mouth; which nevertheless he hath given me express command to redouble: If this Parliament, by their dutiful and wise proceedings, shall but give this occasion, his Majesty will be ready, not only to manifest his gracious acceptance, but to put out all memory of those distastes that have troubled former Parliaments.

"I have but one thing more to add, and that is, as your consultations be serious, so let them be speedy. The enemy is beforehand with us, and flies on the wings of success. We may dally and play with the hour-glass that is in our power, but the hour will not stay for us; and an opportunity once lost, cannot be regained.

"And therefore resolve of your Supplies, that they may be timely and sufficient, serving the occasion: your counsel, your aid, all is but lost, if your aid be either too little, or too late: And his Majesty is resolved, that his affairs cannot permit him to expect it over long."

These two Speeches need no comment, since they plainly speak both the King's principles concerning the use of Parliaments, and his intention, in case he received not from the present Parliament the satisfaction he expected. The King does not seem to have made use of a proper means to gain the good-will of the Commons. But it must be observed, that nothing was more opposite to his temper, than to stoop to court his Parliament. He thought it great condescension to declare, that though he had other ways of raising money, he was very willing to follow the old method of demanding a supply from the Parliament. But for fear the Commons should think he was forced to it by a kind of necessity, he took care to intimate, that in case the money he demanded was not granted, he could raise it other ways. This was the sole aim of these two Speeches.

As to the arguments alledged by the Lord-Keeper to excite the Commons to give a plentiful supply to the King, they were too much exaggerated to produce a great effect. The pretended preparations of the Spaniards to invade England were a groundless chimera. Indeed, during this whole war, the Spaniards made no attempt upon Great-Britain or Ireland. Nay, it was in the King's power to make peace with the Spaniard, who had no demands upon him, and yet, he would make believe that England was in imminent danger. As to the argument so often repeated, that the Parliament advised the war, it was so worn-out, that it could not make the least impression. There was not then a man in England, but what was perfectly informed, that the King and Duke of Buckingham were the real authors of the Spanish war, and had fraudulently obtained from the Parliament the advice continually insisted upon by the King.

Before the Commons had entered into any debates, there was a long letter communicated to them, directed, To my noble Friends of the Lower House of Parliament, and dispersed under the title of A Speech without doors. The author who was unknown, pretended to have been formerly a Member of the Lower House, though he was not chosen to serve in the present Parliament. His aim was to advise the Commons how they were to proceed, and to lay before them the sundry grievances complained of by the people. This writing made a great noise at that time, but I do not think it necessary to insert the contents, since they were only the sentiments of a private person.

After the two Houses had presented a petition to the King for a fast, the Commons began to examine the grievances of the Nation, and seemed determined to grant no supply till these grievances were redressed. The first they took into consideration were, billeting of Soldiers, loans by benevolence and privy-seals, imprisonment of Gentlemen refusing to lend, denial of release upon a Habeas Corpus; and several Speeches were made upon these occasions.

Sir Francis Seymour among other things said — How can we think of giving of Subsidies, till we know whether we have any thing to give or no? For if his Majesty be persuaded by any to take from his Subjects what he will, and where it pleaseth him; I would gladly know what we have to give? — Hath it not been preached in our Pulpits, that all we have is the King's JURE DIVINO? —

Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards so well known by the name of Earl of Strafford, distinguished himself by a Speech against the Government. He said truly, these things were not to be imputed to the King but to the Projectors, that is, to the Ministers or others who had formed the design of stretching the Prerogative beyond its due bounds, of whom he spoke in this manner: They have brought the Crown into greater want than ever, by anticipating the Revenues: And can the shepherd be thus smitten, and the sheep not scattered? They have introduced a Privy-Council, ravishing at once the spheres of all ancient Government, imprisoning us without either bail or bond; they have taken from us, what? What shall I say indeed, what have they left us? All means of supplying the King and ingratiating ourselves with him, taking up the root of all propriety. —

Sir Edward Coke, a great Lawyer, spoke chiefly to the grievance of the loans, and said among other things: Who will give Subsidies, if the King may impose what he will? And if after Parliament, the King may increase what he pleaseth? — The King cannot tax any by way of loans.

Thereupon he quoted the Statute of 25 Edward III, wherein it is said, That loans against the will of the Subject, are against reason, and the franchises of the land; — and concluded with this paragraph out of Magna Charta —

Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur aut diffidetur de libero tenemento suo, &c. nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ. Another speaking of the imprisonment of those who had refused to lend the King money, said, — O improvident Ancestors! O unwise Fore-fathers! to be so curious in providing for the quiet possession of our lands, and liberties of Parliament, and to neglect our persons and bodies, and to let them die in prison, and that durante beneplacito, remedies: If this be Law, what do we talk of our liberties? Why do we trouble ourselves with the dispute of law, franchises, propriety of goods? What may a man call his, if not liberty?

I intend not to enlarge any farther upon what was said in the House of Commons upon these points. This suffices to shew how the Majority were disposed. All their arguments tended to demonstrate, that if the King had power to take the goods of his Subjects by a bare act of his will, whether by way of loan or otherwise, and to imprison such as refused to obey his orders without being admitted to bail, they were either to be entirely subject to the King's pleasure, or to begin with firmly establishing the rights of the people, to the prevention of tyranny. The Court-party durst not directly oppose this general sentiment, but endeavoured by several arguments, to intimate, that to gain his Majesty's good will, supplies were in the first place to be granted. Then, they gave hopes, that the King, moved with such a mark of affection for his person, would not be against redressing the grievances (1).

But this made little impression upon the rest, who were by far the majority, and who verily believed, that to begin with the subsidies was the ready way to have the grievances un-redressed. Mean while, to make a diversion, Secretary Coke presented to the House certain propositions from the King, concerning supply: but it was resolved, that the reading thereof shall be deferred till the House had taken some resolution with respect to the grievances, especially the imprisonment of the Subjects, and denial of bail. There were very great debates upon these points, and the Judges themselves were heard. At last, the House came to the following resolutions, directly contrary to the King's pretensions, and the Judges determinations: That is, they established maxims opposite to those of the King; namely,

"I. That no freeman ought to be detained or kept in prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the King or Privy-Council, or any other, unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint be expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained.

"II. That the writ of Habeas Corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, though it be by the command of the King, the Privy-Council, or any other, he praying the same.

"III. That if a freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the King, the Privy-Council, or any other, no cause of such commitment, detainer, or restraint being expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained, and the same be returned upon a Habeas Corpus, granted for the said party, then he ought to be delivered or bailed.

IV. That it is the ancient and undoubted right of every freeman, that he hath a full and absolute property in his goods and estate; that no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence, or other like charge ought to be commanded or levied by the King, or any of his Ministers, without common consent by act of Parliament (1).

1628. The propositions tendered the day before by Secretary Coke from his Majesty, were now received and read, but the debate thereof was referred to another day. The propositions were these:

1. To furnish with men and victuals thirty ships to guard the narrow seas, and along the coasts.

2. To let out ten other ships for relief of the Town of Rochel.

3. To let out ten other ships for the preservation of the Elbe, the Sound, and the Baltick sea.

4. To levy arms, cloth, victual, pay, and transport an army of ten thousand Horse, and ten thousand Foot, for foreign service.

5. To pay and supply six thousand more for the service of Denmark.

6. To supply the forts of the office of ordnance.

7. To supply the stores of the Navy.

8. To build twenty ships yearly for the increase of the Navy.

9. To repair the forts within the land.

10. To pay the arrears of the office of ordnance.

11. To pay the arrears of the victuallers office.

12. To pay the arrears of the treasure of the Navy.

13. To pay the arrears due for the freight of divers Merchant-ships employed in his Majesty's service.

14. To provide a magazine for victuals for Land and Sea-service.

The House easily perceived by the reading of these Articles, that it would be a work of infinite labour, to examine the necessity and justice of each, and as there were no estimates made, they plainly saw, if they should take the particulars into consideration, the Court would mount the expense very high. Wherefore, without entering into any discussion, they resolved in general to grant the King a large Supply (2).

After that, they returned to the examination of this particular grievance, that the King's Council, by their bare authority, had confined to their houses, some that refused to lend money; had sent away others to distant places from their homes; and constrained some on the same account, to go and serve the King in foreign Countries (3).

Upon this point, Sir Thomas Wentworth said, If any man owes a man a displeasure, and shall procure him to be put into foreign employment, it will be a matter of high concernment to the Subject: We know the honour and justice of the King, but we know not what his Ministers, or the mediation of Ambassadors may do, to work their own wrath upon any man. These debates produced this resolution:

That no freeman ought to be confined by any command from the King, or Privy-Council, or any other, unless it be by Act of Parliament, or by other due course, or warrant of law.

All these determinations promised the King no good with respect to his Prerogative; and as he feared the Commons would again attack the Duke of Buckingham, he tried to divert them from it by a message delivered to the House by Secretary Coke. It was upon a rumour, that the Duke had spoken ill of the Parliament at the Council-board. The King assured, it was not true, and the Secretary added, if the Duke had so spoken, he would have contradicted himself, for the whole Council could bear him witness, he was the first mover of calling the Parliament. But he took care not to tell them, it was merely out of policy, pursuant to Cotton's advice.

The next day the King sent another message to the Commons, desiring them to take the affair of Supply into consideration. He told them likewise, that as to the freedom of persons, and propriety of goods, he was willing to come into any expedients which should be judged convenient, by way of Bill, or otherwise; and that the more confidence they should shew in his grace and goodness, the more they should prevail to obtain their desires.

Upon this message, the House unanimously voted five Subsidies to the King (4), but returned immediately to the examination of Grievances, and held a conference with the Lords upon that subject.

Easter Holidays approaching, the King sent and desired the Commons not to adjourn, that affairs might be the more speedily dispatched. This message occasioned a debate, some members fearing such a precedent might be a prejudice to the privileges of the House, and the King for the future think he had power to hinder an adjournment when he pleased. But at length it was resolved to do as the King desired.

The 11th of April, Secretary Coke moved the dispatch of the Subsidies, laying, the votes to grant the King money were nothing till turned into a Bill. But being opposed by several, it was resolved, that grievances and Supply should go hand in hand.

The day following, Coke brought another message from the King to the House, to this effect: "That his Majesty had long since expected some fruit of that which was so happily begun; but finding a stop beyond all expectation, his command was, that without any further delay, they should proceed in the affair of Supply. For notwithstanding his consenting that Supply and Grievances should go together, his meaning was not, that the one should give interruption to the other, nor the time be spun out on any pretence. And therefore bid them take heed, that they did not force him to make an unpleasing end of what was so well begun."

This message did the King great injury. 1. Because of the threatening. 2. By reason of his instances, that the affair of Supply should be dispatched before that of Grievances: for it was not doubted, that if the first were finished, the Parliament would be immediately prorogued. 3. Lastly, The King's unwillingness to redress the Grievances, was a clear evidence, he would never be brought to it of his own accord, and consequently it was necessary to constrain him thereto. This was the more probable, as Coke, when he delivered the message, added, "That the King would willingly hear any thing concerning the abuses of Power, but not about Power itself." These expressions were liable to many cavils, and plain intimations, that the King referred to himself, by this restriction, a means to evade the Grievances. And indeed, Coke being moved to explain what he meant by the word [Power,] refused it (5).

Two days after, the Secretary delivered another message from the King, to hasten the affair of Supply. These messages, which came thus one upon another, gave frequent occasions to the Court-party to press the House to content his Majesty. All their Speeches upon this head, met in one point, namely, to inspire the House with a dread, that a quarrel between them and the King, would be fatal to Parliaments, and give the King occasion to proceed without them for the future. As the King himself, and the Lord Keeper (by his order,) had frequently made use of the same means to frighten the Commons, it could not be doubted, that these men spoke pursuant to the intentions, and perhaps by the order, of the Court. A Privy-Counsellor's Speech in the Lower-House last Parliament was not yet forgot, and of which the Commons had thought fit to take notice, in the Remonstrance they would have presented to the King. The design of that Speech was to intimate to the Commons, that if they did not content the King, they would run the risk of being the cause of no more Parliaments in England. This threat so often insinuated by the King himself, by the Lord Keeper, by Members of the House, known to be devoted to the Court, sometimes in dark, sometimes in plain terms, had a quite contrary effect to what the King expected. Instead of terrifying the Commons, it convinced them, how watchful they ought to be of the King's proceedings, lest their condescension, or even their silence, should authorize some things very prejudicial to the liberties of the nation, whom they represented. What! said most of the Members among themselves, we are threatened, that if we don't grant the King whatever he requires, and when he pleases, if we oppose his pleasure, even when contrary to the Laws, he will govern without a Parliament, that is, with an unlimited power; he will imprison our persons, seize our estates, and consider the whole Kingdom as his property! But he does not only threaten us, he has put his threats in execution already. Which then is best, either for him to usurp an absolute Power against our will, or for us to suffer it, nay, ap-

1628. proves it by our silence, and servile fears? Of the two, certainly the first is least dangerous. A time may come, when the King shall have occasion for Parliaments, and then we shall be able to recover the ground we shall have lost. But if we betray the interest of our Country, by tamely yielding to the King the Power, he would assume, our Liberty will be irrecoverably lost. We shall lay upon ourselves and posterity, a yoke which our forefathers could never bear, and be held in abhorrence by the whole Nation. And after all, what shall we gain by our condescension? Why, the King will continue the use of Parliaments, provided he shall be absolute master; order them to give him such a sum, and by such a time; forbid them to examine Grievances; in a word, manage them entirely as he pleases. Thus we shall prevent the King's governing without a Parliament, but shall establish a precedent which will render Parliaments for ever slaves to the King and his Ministers.

Such were the reasonings of the greatest part of the Commons, and though they did not openly say these very words, the House showed by their whole conduct, that these considerations were the real foundation of all their proceedings. For this reason it was, they resolved to desire an audience, in order to answer all his Majesty's messages, and to present to him withal a petition concerning billeting of Soldiers upon the Subject. Their representation to the King by the mouth of their Speaker, was as follows:

Most gracious and dread Sovereign,

*Y*OUR dutiful and loyal Commons here assembled, were lately humble Suitors to his Majesty for access to your Royal presence; the occasion that moved their desires herein, was a particular of importance, worthy your princely consideration; which, as it well deserves, should have been the only subject of my Speech at this time.

But since your gracious answer for this access, obtained by a message from your Majesty, they have had some cause to doubt, that your Majesty is not so well satisfied with the manner of their proceedings, as their hearty desire is you should be, especially in that part which concerns your Majesty's present Supply, as if in the prosecution thereof, they had of late used some slackness or delay.

And because no unhappiness of theirs can parallel with that which may proceed from a misunderstanding in your Majesty, of their clear and loyal intentions, they have commanded me to attend your Majesty, with an humble and summary declaration of their proceedings, since this short time of their sitting, which they hope will give your Majesty abundant satisfaction, that never People did more truly desire to be endeared in the favour and gracious opinion of their Sovereign; and withal to let you see, that as you can have no where more faithful Counsel, for your great designs and occasions can no way be so speedily or heartily supported, as in this old and antient way of Parliament.

For this purpose they humbly beseech your Majesty to take into your Royal consideration, that although by antient Right of Parliament, the matters there debated are to be disposed in their true method and order, and that their constant custom hath been to take into their considerations the common grievances of the Kingdom, before they enter upon the matter of Supply; yet to make a full expression of that zeal and affection which they bear to your Royal Majesty, equalling at least, if not exceeding the best affections of their predecessors, to the best of your progenitors; they have in this Assembly, contrary to the ordinary proceedings of Parliament, given your Majesty's Supply precedence, before the common grievance of the Subject, now pressing forever, joining with it only those fundamental and vital liberties of the Kingdom, which give subsistence and ability to your Subjects.

This was their original order and resolution, and was grounded upon a true discerning, that these two considerations could not be severed, but did both of them entirely concern your Majesty's service, consisting no less in enabling and encouraging the Subject, than in proportioning a present suit to your Majesty's occasions, and their abilities; nay, so far have they been from using any unnecessary delays, as though, of the two, that of Supply were the latter proposition amongst them, the grand Committee to which both were referred, hath made that of your Majesty's Supply first ready for conclusion.

And, to be sure your Majesty's Supply might receive no interruption by the other, differing from usage and custom (in cases of this nature) sent up of those that concern the Subjects by parcels, some to your Majesty, and some to the Lords, to the end your Majesty might receive such speedy content, as suited with the largest and best extent of their first order.

No. 57. Vo. I. II.

"Sir, you are the breath of our nostrils, and the light of our eyes, and besides those many comforts, which under you and your Royal progenitors, in this frame of Government, this nation hath enjoyed, the Religion we profess hath taught us whose image you are; and we do all most humbly beseech your Majesty to believe, that nothing is or can be more dear unto us, than the sacred rights and prerogatives of your Crown; no person or council can be greater lovers of you, nor be more truly careful to maintain them; and the preserving of those fundamental Liberties which concern the freedom of our persons, and propriety of goods and estates, is an essential means to establish the true glory of a Monarchy.

"For rich and free Subjects, as they are best governed, so they are most able to do your Majesty service either in peace or war, which next under God hath been the cause of the happy and famous victories of this nation, beyond other Kingdoms of larger territories and greater number of people.

"What information soever contrary to this shall be brought unto your Majesty, can come from no other than such, as for their own ends, under colour of advancing the Prerogative, do indeed undermine and weaken Royal power by impoverishing the Subjects, render this Monarchy less glorious, and the People less able to serve your Majesty.

"Having (by this that hath been said) cleared our hearts and proceedings to your Majesty, our trust is, that in your Royal judgment we shall be free from the least opinion of giving any necessary stop to our proceedings in the matter of your Supply, and that your Majesty will be pleased to entertain belief of our alacrity, and cheerfulness in your service, and that hereafter no such misfortune shall befall us, to be misunderstood by your Majesty in any thing.

"We all most humbly beseech your Majesty, to receive no information in this or any other business from private relations, but to weigh and judge of our proceedings by those resolutions of the House that shall be represented from our selves.

"This, rightly and graciously understood, we are confident from the Knowledge of your goodness and our own hearts, that the ending of this Parliament shall be much more happy than the beginning, and be to all ages styled the blessed Parliament, for making perfect union between the best King and the best People, that your Majesty may ever delight in calling us together, and we in the comforts of your gracious favour towards us.

"In this hope I return to my first errand, which will best appear by that which I shall humbly desire you to hear, and being an humble petition from the House of Commons, for redressing of those many inconveniences and distractions that have befallen your Subjects by the billeting of soldiers in private mens houses against their wills.

"Your Royal progenitors have ever held your Subjects hearts the best garrison of this Kingdom, and our humble suit to your Majesty is, that our faith and loyalty may have such place in your Royal thoughts, as to reit assured, that all your Subjects will be ready to lay down their lives for the defence of your sacred person, and this Kingdom.

"Not going our selves into our countries this Eagles, we should think it a great happiness to us, as we know it would be a singular comfort and encouragement to them that sent us hither, if we might but send them the news of a gracious answer from your Majesty in this particular, which the reasons of the petition we hope will move your most excellent Majesty graciously to vouchsafe us."

The Petition concerning the billeting of Soldiers presented to the King's most excellent Majesty.

*I*N all humility complaining, sheweth unto your most excellent Majesty your loyal and dutiful Commons now in Parliament assembled, that whereas by the fundamental laws of this realm, every freeman hath, and of right ought to have, a full and absolute propriety in his goods and estate, and that therefore the billeting and placing the soldiers in the house of any such freeman against his will, is directly contrary to the said laws, under which we and our ancestors have been so long and happily governed; yet in apparent violation of the said antient and undoubted right of all your Majesty's loyal Subjects of this your Kingdom in general, and to the grievous and insupportable vexation and detriment of many counties and persons in particular, a new and almost unheard of way hath been invented and put in practice, to lay soldiers upon them, scattered in companies here and there, even in the heart and bowels of

"this Kingdom; and to compel many of your Majesty's Subjects to receive and lodge them in their own houses, and both themselves and others to contribute towards the maintenance of them, to the exceeding great disservice of your Majesty, the general terror of all, and utter undoing of many of your people, inasmuch as we cannot sufficiently recount, nor in any way proportionable to the lively sense that we have of our miseries herein, are we able to represent unto your Majesty, the innumerable mischiefs and most grievous vexations that by this means alone we do now suffer, whereas we will not presume to trouble your sacred ears with particular instances; only, most gracious Sovereign, we beg leave to offer to your most gracious view, a compassionate consideration of a view of them in particular.

"1. The service of Almighty God is hereby greatly hindered, the People in many places not daring to repair to the Church, least in the mean time the soldiers should rifle their houses.

"2. The antient and good government of the country is hereby neglected, and almost contemned.

"3. Your Officers of Justice in performance of their duties have been resisted and endangered.

"4. The rents and revenues of your gentry greatly and generally diminished; farmers to secure themselves from the soldiers' insolence, being by the clamour of solicitation of their fearful and injured wives and children, enforced to give up their wonted dwellings, and to retire themselves into places of more secure habitation.

"5. Husbandmen, that are as it were the hands of the country, corrupted by ill example of the soldiers, and encouraged to idle life, give over work, and rather seek to live idly at another man's charges, than by their own labours.

"6. Tradesmen and artificers almost discouraged, and being enforced to leave their trades, and to employ their time in preserving themselves and their families from cruelty.

"7. Markets unfrequented, and our ways grown so dangerous, that the people dare not pass to and fro upon their usual occasions.

"8. Frequent robberies, assaults, batteries, burglaries, rapes, rapines, murders, barbarous cruelties, and other most abominable vices and outrages, are generally complained of from all parts, where these companies have been and had their abode, few of which insolences have been so much as questioned, and fewer according to their demerit punished.

"These, and many other lamentable effects (most dread and dear Sovereign) have by the billeting of soldiers already fallen upon us your loyal Subjects, tending no less to the disservice of your Majesty, than to their impoverishing and destruction, so that thereby they are exceedingly disabled to yield to your Majesty those Supplies for your urgent occasions, which they heartily desire; and yet they are further perplexed with apprehension of more approaching danger, one in regard of your Subjects at home, the other of enemies from abroad, in both which respects it seems to threaten no small calamity to the meaner sort of your people, being exceedingly poor, whereof in many places are great multitudes, and therefore in times of more settled and most constant administration of justice, not easily ruled, are most apt upon this occasion to cast off the reins of Government, and by joining themselves with those disordered soldiers, are very like to fall into mutiny and rebellion; which in faithful discharge of our duties we cannot forbear most humbly to present to your high and excellent wisdom, being pressed with probable fears that some such mischief will shortly ensue, if an effectual and speedy course be not taken to remove out of the land, or otherwise to disband, those unruly companies.

"For the second, we do most humbly beseech your Majesty to take into your Princely consideration, that many of those companies, besides their disolute dispositions and carriages, are such as do openly profess themselves Papists, and therefore to be suspected, that if occasion serve, they will rather adhere to a foreign enemy of that Religion, than to your Majesty, their liege Lord and Sovereign, especially some of their captains and commanders, being as popishly affected as themselves, and having served in the wars on the part of the King of Spain, and Arch-duchess against your Majesty's allies; which of what pernicious consequence it may prove, and how prejudicial to the safety of your Kingdom, we leave to your Majesty's high and princely wisdom.

"And now upon these, and many more which might "be alledged, most weighty and important reasons, grounded on the maintenance of the worship and service of Almighty God, the continuance and advancement of your Majesty's high honour and profit, the preservation of the antient and undoubted liberties of your people, and therein of justice, industry, valour, which nearly concern the glory and happiness of your Majesty and all your Subjects, and the preventing of calamity and ruin both of Church and Commonwealth:

"We your Majesty's most humble and loyal Subjects, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeesses of your House of Commons, in the name of all the Commonalty of your Kingdom, who are upon this occasion most miserably disconsolate and afflicted, prostrate at the throne of your grace and justice, do most ardently beg a present remove of this insupportable burden, and that your Majesty would be graciously pleased to secure us from the like pressure in the time to come."

The manner in which the King and Commons transacted together is very pleasant. There was nothing but plainness and artifice on both sides. They expressed not their real thoughts, when they spoke to each other, and yet, understood one another perfectly, though they made as if they did not. The Commons knew, that the reasons to justify the delay of Supply, alledged in their representation, were not valid, and that the King was persuaded of the same. But they thought he would seem to be satisfied with them, in order not to oblige them to tell him to his face they could not rely on his promises, and considered this delay as the only way to have their grievances redressed. The King feigned to be ignorant of this motive, and took advantage of the Commons using obscure intimations, instead of speaking plainly. On the other hand, tho' the King had no design to redress Grievances, he would however have it thought, he intended it as soon as the affair of Supply was dispatched. The Commons on their part, feigning not to know his intention, had a mind to make believe, that the delay of Supply proceeded from quite another cause, though they were sure, the King could not mistake. But as the King did not think himself obliged to use the same ceremony with the Commons, as they ought to use with him, he talked to them in a higher tone, knowing, they would not without necessity, be induced to speak more clearly. To their representation therefore he made this reply.

Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen,

"WHEN I sent you my last message, I did not expect a reply, for I intended it to hasten you to be present in words, and I am sure it is less fit for disputes, which if I had a desire to entertain, Mr. Speaker's preamble might have given me ground enough: The question is not now what liberty you have in disposing of matters handled in your House, but rather at this time what is fit to be done.

"Wherefore I hope you will follow my example, in eschewing disputes, and fall to your important business. You make a protestation of your affection and zeal to my Prerogative, grounded upon such good and just reasons, that I must believe you: But I look that you use me with the like charity, to believe what I have declared more than once, since your meeting with us, that I am as forward as you for the necessary preservation of your true Liberties. Let us not spend so much time in this, that may hazard both my prerogative and your liberties to our enemies.

"To be short, go on speedily with your business, without any more apologies, for time calls fast on you, which will neither stay for you nor me: Wherefore it is my duty to hasten, as knowing the necessity of it, and yours to give credit to what I say, as to him that sits at the helm.

"For what concerns your petition, I shall make answer in a convenient time."

The Commons, as I said, meant to reap some advantage by the five subsidies, they were willing to grant the King; and this was a necessary condition, which they continually insinuated, though they avoided using that expression (1). To this end, they had prepared a Petition to be presented to the King in the name of both Houses, to which they desired the concurrence of the Lords. This Petition was termed the Petition of Right, because it was pretended not to desire of the King any grace or favour, but only the maintenance of the liberties of the Subject. For this reason it was to be solemnly presented to the King on his Throne by way of Bill, and the King was to reply to it in a parliamentary manner. A draught of it had been sent to the Lords for their concurrence (1). The King was alarmed at it. He was desirous to avoid receiving such a Petition, which too plainly established the rights of the people, because he law, if he rejected it, he should lose the five Subsidies, the Bill not being yet passed. On the other hand, in granting the contents of the Petition, he himself tied up his hands for the future, and confessed withal, that the acts of authority he had hitherto exercised, were contrary to law. Into this streight precisely it was that the Commons meant to draw him by the Petition of Right. Wherefore he omitted nothing in his power to divert this blow. As he had a great influence in the Upper House, he so managed, that the Lords, by pretending to agree with the Commons upon the substance of the Petition, moved the praying his Majesty to make the following declarations.

1. That the good old law called Magna Charta, and the six Statutes, conceived to be declarations and explanations of that law, do still stand in force to all intents and purposes.

2. That his Majesty would be pleased graciously to declare, That according to Magna Charta, and the Statutes afore-named, as also according to the most ancient customs and laws of this land, every free Subject of this Realm hath a fundamental propriety in his goods, and a fundamental liberty of his person.

3. That his Majesty would be graciously pleased to declare, that it is his royal pleasure to ratify and confirm unto all and every his loyal and faithful Subjects, all their ancient, several, just liberties, privileges, and rights, in as ample and beneficial manner, to all intents and purposes, as their ancestors did enjoy the same under the best of his most noble progenitors.

4. That his Majesty would be further pleased graciously to declare, for the good content of his loyal Subjects, and for the securing them from future fear, That in all cases within the cognizances of the common law, concerning the liberties of the subject, his Majesty would proceed according to the common law of this land, and according to the laws established in the Kingdom, and in no other manner or wife.

5. As touching his Majesty's royal prerogative, intrinsic to his Sovereignty, and entrusted him withal from God, ad communem totius populi salutem, & non ad destructionem, That his Majesty would resolve, not to use or divert the same, to the prejudice of any his loyal people in the propriety of their goods, or liberty of their persons: And in case for the security of his Majesty's royal person, the common safety of his people, or the peaceable government of this Kingdom, his Majesty shall find just cause, for reason of State, to imprison or restrain any man's person, his Majesty would graciously declare, That within a convenient time he shall, and will express the cause of the commitment or restraint; either general or special; and upon a cause so expressed, will leave him immediately to be tried according to the common justice of the Kingdom.

But the Commons avoided this snare, plainly perceiving it was only an artifice to evade the Petition of Right, which would become as useless, after these declarations. Indeed, there was a great difference, as we shall see presently, between these declarations, and what was required in the Petition. The declarations were all expressed in general terms, which gave the King room to cavil upon the performance of each article, as he had done in the affair of the loans, and the imprisonment of those that refused to comply. In those cases, the King did not pretend to act contrary to the laws, but rather thought himself authorized by the law; and the Judges of the Realm had countenanced his pretensions. But the Petition of Right was more full and express, and left but little room for Cavils. On the other hand the difference was not less, between the direct and parliamentary reply demanded by the Commons, and the bare and general declarations which were not capable of contenting the people. So, the Commons entirely rejected the proposition of the Lords.

The King not succeeding in his design, by means of the Upper-House, tried to satisfy the Commons, by making them, of his own accord, the same offers the Lords had seemed only to desire of him. To that purpose, having sent for both Houses to Whitehall, the Lord-Keeper, in his presence, spoke to them in the following manner:

My Lords, and ye the Knights, Citizens and Burgeesses of the House of Commons.

“YE cannot but remember the great and important affairs, concerning the safety both of State and Religion, declared first from his Majesty's own mouth, to be the causes of the assembling of this Parliament; the “sense whereof, as it doth daily increase with his Majesty, so it ought to do, and his Majesty doubts not but it doth so with you, since the danger increaseth every day, both by effluxion of time, and preparations of the enemy.

“Yet his Majesty doth well weigh, that this expence of time hath been occasioned by the debate which hath arisen in both Houses, touching the liberty of the subject; in which, as his Majesty takes in good part the purpose and intent of the Houses, so clearly and frequently professed, that they would not diminish or blemish his just prerogative; so he presumes that ye will all confess it a point of extraordinary grace and justice in him, to suffer it to rest so long in dispute without interruption: But now his Majesty considering the length of time which it hath taken, and fearing nothing so much as any future loss of that, whereof every hour and minute is so precious; and foreseeing that the ordinary way of debate, though never so carefully husbanded, in regard of the form of both Houses, necessarily takes more time than the affairs of Christendom can permit; his Majesty out of great princely care, hath thought of this expedient to shorten the business, by declaring the clearness of his own heart and intention: And therefore hath commanded me to let you know, That he holdeth the Statute of Magna Charta, and the other six Statutes insisted upon for the Subjects liberty, to be all in force, and assures you, that he will maintain all his Subjects in the just freedom of their persons, and safety of their estates; and that he will govern according to the laws and statutes of this Realm; and that ye shall find as much security in his Majesty's royal word and promise, as in the strength of any law ye can make; so that hereafter ye shall never have cause to complain. The conclusion is, That his Majesty prayeth God, who hath hitherto blessed this Kingdom, and put into his heart to come to you this day, to make the success thereof happy both to King and people: And therefore he desires that no doubt or distrust may possess any man, but that ye will all proceed unanimously to the business.”

The Commons avoided this snare, as the former, and firmly adhered to the Petition of Right. A few days after Secretary Coke brings then a fresh message from the King, to know whether the House will rest on his royal word, declared to them by the Lord-Keeper; which if they do, he assures them, it shall be royally performed.

This message occasioned great debates (2), because Coke and the rest of the Court-party used their utmost endeavours, to persuade the House to what the King proposed, that is to lay aside the Petition of Right, and rest upon his Majesty's promise. Sir Thomas Wentworth concluded the debate, saying, That never House of Parliament trusted more in the goodness of their King, for their own private, than the present, but we are ambitious that his Majesty's goodness may remain to posterity, and we are accountable to a publick trust: And therefore seeing there hath been a publick violation of the Laws by his Ministers, nothing will satisfy him but a publick amend; and our desire to vindicate the Subjects Right by Bill, are no more than are laid down in former Laws with some modest provision for instruction, performance and execution. This so well agreed with the sense of the House, that they made it the subject of a message to be delivered by the Speaker, to his Majesty.

Amidst those deliberations, another message was delivered from his Majesty by Secretary Coke, to this effect: “That howsoever we proceed in this business we have in hand, which his Majesty will not doubt, but to be according to our constant profession, and so as he may have cause to give us thanks; yet his resolution is, that both his royal care, and hearty and tender affection towards all his loving Subjects, shall appear to the whole Kingdom, and all the world, that he will govern us according to the laws and customs of this Realm; that he will maintain us in the liberties of our persons, and properties of our goods, so as we may enjoy as much happiness as our forefathers in their best times; and that he will rectify what hath been, or may be found amiss amongst us, so that hereafter there may be no just cause to complain. Wherein, as his Majesty will rank himself amongst the best of Kings, and shew he hath no intention to invade or impeach our lawful liberties, or right; so he will have us to match ourselves with the best Subjects, not by inroaching upon that Sovereignty or Prerogative, which God hath put into his hands for our good, but by containing ourselves within the bounds and laws of our forefathers, without restraining them, or enlarging them by new explanations, interpretations, expolitions, or additions in any sort, which, he telleth us, he will not give way unto.

1628. "That the weight of the affairs of the Kingdoms and Christendom do press him more and more, and that the time is now grown to that point of maturity, that it cannot endure long debate or delay; so as this Session of Parliament must continue no longer than Tuesday come sevennight at the furthest: In which time his Majesty, for his part, will be ready to perform what he promised; and if the House be not as ready to do that is fit for themselves, it shall be their own faults.

All this was not able to divert the Commons from their purpose of turning the Petition of Right into an Act of Parliament. The threat of putting an end to the Session frightened them not, the King having gone too far to recede. The only point was to know, whether he would grant by Bill, what he was willing to grant any other way; and he could not break with the Parliament on that account, without forfeiting entirely the love of his People, and losing the five Subsidies. So the Commons would not miss this opportunity of firmly establishing the Rights of the Subjects. Here follows what the Speaker said to the King, in the name of the Commons, having first thanked him for his gracious assurance, that he would govern according to the Laws, and told him, that the Commons greatest confidence was in his goodness.

*The Speaker's speech to the King.
Ibid.
Annals.*

"— True it is, they cannot but remember the publick trust, for which they are accountable to present and future times; and their desires are, that your Majesty's goodness might, in fruit and memory, be the blessing and joy of posterity.

"They say also, that of late there hath been publick violation of the Laws, and the Subjects Liberties, by some of your Majesty's Ministers, and thence conceive, that no less than a publick remedy will raise the dejected hearts of your loving Subjects, to a cheerful Supply of your Majesty, or make them receive content in the proceedings of this House.

"From those considerations, they most humbly beg your Majesty's leave, to lay hold of that gracious offer of yours, which gave them assurance, that if they thought fit to secure themselves in their Rights and Liberties, by way of Bill, or otherwise, so it might be provided with due respect to God's honour, and the publick good, you would be graciously pleased to give way unto it. Far from their intentions it is, any way to encroach upon your Sovereignty or Prerogative; nor have they the least thought of stretching or enlarging the former Laws in any sort, by any new interpretations or additions; the bounds of their desires extend no farther, than to some necessary explanation of that which is truly comprehended within the just sense and meaning of those Laws, with some moderate provision for execution and performance, as in times past upon like occasion hath been used.

"The way how to accomplish these their humble desires, is now in serious consideration with them, wherein they humbly assure your Majesty, they will neither lose time, nor seek any thing of your Majesty, but that they hope may be fit for dutiful and loyal Subjects to ask, and for a gracious and just King to grant."

His Majesty's answer was delivered by the Lord Keeper, as follows:

*Rushworth.
Annals.*

Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"His Majesty hath commanded me to tell you, that he expected an answer by your actions, and not delay by your discourse: Ye acknowledge this trust and confidence in your proceedings, but his Majesty sees not how you require him, by your confidence of his word and actions: For what need explanations, if ye doubted not the performance of the true meaning? For explanations will hazard an encroachment upon his prerogative. And it may well be said, what need a new Law to confirm an old, if you repose confidence in the declaration his Majesty made by me to both Houses? And our selves acknowledge, that your greatest trust and confidence must be in his Majesty's grace and goodness, without which nothing ye can frame will be of safety, or avail to you: Yet, to shew clearly the sincerity of his Majesty's intentions, he is content that a Bill be drawn for a confirmation of Magna Charta, and the other six Statutes, insisted upon for the Subjects liberties, if ye shall chuse that as the best way, but so as it may be without additions, paraphrases, or explanations.

"Thus if you please you may be secured from your needless fears, and this Parliament may have a happy

"wished for end: whereas by the contrary, if you seek to tie your King by new, and indeed impossible, bonds, you must be accountable to God and the Country for the ill success of this meeting. His Majesty hath given his royal word, that ye shall have no cause to complain hereafter; less than which hath been enough to reconcile great Princes, and therefore ought much more to prevail between a King and his Subjects.

"Lastly, I am commanded to tell you, that his Majesty's pleasure is, that without further replies or messages, or other unnecessary delays, ye do what ye mean to do speedily, remembering the last message that Secretary Coke brought you in point of time; his Majesty always intending to perform his promise to his people."

To this answer the King presently after adds the following message, brought by Secretary Coke, to press the House to rely on the King's word, notwithstanding the intimation of his good pleasure for a Bill. "That he had rather follow others, than begin to enter into this business; loss of time hath been the greatest complaint; the matter fallen now into consideration, is what way to take, whether to rely on his Majesty's word, or on a bill: If we will consider the advantage we have in taking his Majesty's word, it will be of the largest extent, and we shall chuse that that hath most assurance; an Act of Parliament is by the consent of the King and Parliament; but this assurance by word, is, that he will govern us by the Laws; the King promises that, and also, that they shall be so executed, that we shall enjoy as much freedom as ever: This contains many Laws, and a grant of all good Laws; nay, it contains a confirmation of those very Laws, assurance, which binds the King further than the Law can: First, it binds his affection, which is the greatest bond between King and Subject, and that binds his judgment also, nay, his honour, and that not at home, but abroad; the Royal word of a King, is the ground of all Treaty; nay, it binds his conscience: This confirmation between both Houses, is in nature of a vow; for my part, I think it is the greatest advantage to rely on his Majesty's word. He further added, this debate was fitter to be done before the House, and not before the Committee, and that it was a new course to go to a Committee of the whole House (1).

This answer and message clearly shew, how much the King dreaded the Petition of Right, which was preparing for him. He justly supposed, it would contain not only the substance of Magna Charta, and the six Statutes, but also explanations which would prevent all cavils concerning the true meaning of these Laws, which was what he would have avoided to approve, for fear of tying up his hands. The Great Charter and the six Statutes had long been in force; but that had not prevented his exacting money from his Subjects by way of loan, and imprisoned such as refused to comply. He was so far from owning, he had acted contrary to the Laws, that he had caused his proceedings to be approved by the Judges of the Realm. In offering therefore to confirm Magna Charta by a Bill, he left things in their present state, and the people would have reaped no benefit from the new Bill. This is what the Lord Keeper could not forbear intimating, when he said, he did not see any occasion for a new Law to confirm an old. By that he would have insinuated, that the old Law was not infringed, and therefore the King was very willing to confirm it, provided there were no additions, explanations, and interpretations. But nothing was more apt to shew the Commons the necessity of these explanations, than the King's endeavours to avoid them. His extreme desire, that his word should be relied on, was a very strong reason to secure the liberties of the Subject, by something more binding. It is true indeed, the words of Princes are capable of reconciling them, when at variance; but this supposes a mutual confidence, without which the bare word cannot beget a perfect reconciliation. Now the point was to know, whether the King's word might safely be taken, which the Commons did not believe, though they durst not openly declare it. Besides, their having been told, that the King's promise to govern according to Law, was a greater security than the Laws themselves, was a plain indication, that the King did not think it impracticable to evade the Law. Hence therefore they drew a fresh argument for binding the King by a more express and positive Law than those hitherto enacted.

We may further observe, that 'tis very surprising, the Secretary, in the conclusion of the message, should teach the Commons how this matter ought to be debated in the House, insinuating, that to go to a Committee of the whole House was a new course. For the better understanding the design of this insinuation, the Reader must know, that before the House a Member cannot speak but

1628. once upon the same point, and having asserted his opinion, is not allowed to answer or reply. But when the House is turned into a Committee, there is greater freedom. Every one may argue, answer, reply, as he thinks fit. By this means the points in debate are fully cleared, so that 'tis easy for each to form his opinion upon the arguments, answers, and replies he has heard. It seems therefore, by what the Secretary insinuated to the Commons, the King feared all explanations that might arise from this way of debating. But they did not think proper to receive his instructions, or alter their usual method (1). The House therefore was turned into a Committee, to take into consideration, all that could be said for or against what the King desired. The general sense of the House was expressed as follows, by one of the Members, with whom the majority agreed.

Was it ever known (said he) that general words were a sufficient satisfaction to particular Grievances? Was ever a verbal declaration of the King, Verbum Regni? When Grievances be, the Parliament is to redress them. Did ever Parliament rely on messages? They put up Petitions of their Grievances, and the King never answered them: The King's answer is very gracious; but what is the law of the Realm? that is the question. I put no difference in his Majesty, the King must speak by a record, and in particular, and not in general. Did you ever know the King's message come into a bill of Subsidies? All succeeding Kings will say, Ye must trust me as well as ye did my predecessors, and trust my messages; but messages of love never come into a Parliament. Let us put up a petition of Right: Not that I distrust the King, but that I cannot take his trusts, but in a Parliamentary way.

As the Commons had resolved, that Supply and Grievances should go hand in hand, the Petition of Right was no sooner ready, but they made a farther progress in the affair of the Subsidies, ordering that the two first should be paid the 10th of July, one more the 12th of October, another the 20th of December, and the last the 1st of March. This was done to take from the King all pretence of complaining, that the affair of Supply was neglected; but this did not satisfy him. He wished the Subsidy-bill to be drawn and passed, before the Petition of Right was presented to him, which the Commons were fully resolved not to do, being persuaded, that as soon as the Subsidy-bill should be passed, the Parliament would be prorogued or dissolved. So, that same day, they sent the Petition of Right to the Lords for their concurrence (2). But, before it was obtained, the Commons saw themselves obliged to sustain two fresh attacks, one from the King, the other from the House of Lords, where the Court-party was very strong.

The Lords being employed in examining the Petition of Right, desired a conference with the Commons, where the Lord Keeper said, he had proposed to the House some alterations in the Petition, to render it less harsh, and more agreeable to his Majesty, to the end, what was desired might be the more readily obtained. That whilst the Lords were debating upon the commitments, they received a Letter from his Majesty, which they desired to communicate to the Commons; and it was read to them accordingly.

To the Right Temporal and Right Well-beloved, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, of the Higher-House of Parliament.

Carolus Rex,

WE being desirous of nothing more than the advancement of the peace and prosperity of our People, have given leave to free debate upon the highest points of our Prerogative Royal, which in the time of our predecessors, Kings and Queens of this Realm, were ever restrained as matters that they would not have discussed; and in other things we have been willing to far to defend to the desires of our good-Subjects, as might fully satisfy all moderate minds, and free them from all just fears and jealousies, which those messages we have hitherto sent into the Commons House, will well demonstrate unto the world; yet we find it still insisted upon, that in no case whatsoever, should it never so nearly concern matters of State or Government, we, or our Privy-Council, have no power to commit any man without the cause shewed; whereas it often happens, that should the cause be shewed, the service itself would thereby be destroyed and defeated, and the cause alleged must be such as may be determined by our

Judges of our Courts of Westminster, in a legal and ordinary way of justice; whereas the causes may be such, as those Judges have not capacity of judicature, nor rules of Law to direct and guide their judgment in cases of that transcendent nature; which happening so often, the very encroaching on that constant rule of Government, for so many ages within this Kingdom practised, would soon dissolve the very foundation and frame of our Monarchy. Wherefore as to our Commons, we made fair propositions, which might equally preserve the just Liberty of the Subject: So, my Lords, we have thought good to let you know, that without the overthrow of Sovereignty, we cannot suffer this power to be impeached; notwithstanding, to clear our conscience and just intentions, this we publish, that it is not in our heart, nor will we ever extend our Royal Power, lent unto us from God, beyond the just rule of moderation, in any thing which shall be contrary to our Laws and Customs, wherein the safety of our People shall be our only aim. And we do hereby declare our Royal pleasure and resolution to be, which, God willing, we shall ever constantly continue and maintain, that neither we nor our Privy-Council shall, or will, at any time hereafter, commit, or command to prison, or otherwise restrain the person of any, for not lending Money to us, nor for any just cause, which in our conscience doth not concern the publick good and safety of us and our People, we will not be drawn to pretend any cause, wherein our judgment and conscience is not satisfied with; base thoughts, we hope, no man can imagine will fall into our Royal breast; and that in all cases of this nature, which shall hereafter happen, we shall, upon the humble petition of the party, or address of our Judges unto us, readily and really express the true cause of their commitment or restraint, in so far as with conveniency and safety the same is fit to be disclosed and expressed; and that in all causes criminal, of ordinary jurisdiction, our Judges shall proceed to the deliverance or bailment of the prisoner, according to the known and ordinary rules of the laws of this land, and according to the Statutes of Magna Charta, and those other fix Statutes insisted upon, which we do take knowledge, stand in full force, and which we intend not to abrogate and weaken against the true intention thereof. This we have thought fit to signify, the rather to shorten any long debate upon this great question, the season of the year being so far advanced, and our great occasions of State, not lending any more days for longer continuance of this Session of Parliament."

Given under our Signet, at our Palace at Westminster, 20 Maii, the fourth year of our Reign.

The Commons took no notice of this Letter, or rather, dissembled their vexation at the King's artifices, who by obscure and doubtful expressions, and by sundry restrictions, was preparing means to evade his promises, at the very time he would have them to be received as solemn, authentic, and satisfactory. This may be plainly seen, if the terms of this Letter be carefully considered, as well as the King's intent in writing it: which was to evade the Petition of Right, and be left at liberty to use his Prerogative as he had hitherto done.

The second attack the Commons had to sustain, came from the Lords. They moved, [at a conference] the adding to the Petition of Right, a clause which would have rendered it useless, at least, according to the Court's intention, by whom, very probably, the House of Lords was directed. The additional clause was as follows:

We present this our humble Petition to your Majesty, with the care not only of preserving our own Liberties, but with due regard to leave entire that Sovereign Power wherewith your Majesty is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of the People.

This addition was examined and debated with great exactness in the House of Commons (3), and the general opinion was, that it ought to be rejected, chiefly for three Reasons. The first, because of the ambiguity of the words Sovereign Power, which the Parliaments had never used in speaking of the King's Prerogatives. The second, because this addition was in the nature of a saving of the King's Sovereignty, which rendered the Petition of no force. It was alleged, that in the Reign of Edward I. the Parliament having presented the like Petition to the King, he would have added these words, saving the King's Right and Sovereignty, but the Parliament would not consent to it, because such savings render useless whatever they are annexed to. It was said likewise, that for the same reason the Kings would never suffer the Clergy to infer in any of their acts, saving the honour of God and the Church. The third reason was, that if this addition was general, and had no reference to the Petition, there was no need of admitting it. But if, on the contrary, it did refer to the Petition, it evidently rendered the Petition of no effect.

(1) Sir John Elliot replied to the King's Message, That the proceeding in a Committee, is more honourable and advantageous to the King and the House, for that way leaves most to truth, and it is a more open way, and where every man may say his reason, and make answer upon the clearing of other man's reasons and arguments. Rushworth, Tom. I. p. 557.

(2) It was carried up by Sir Edward Coke, Sir Dudley Digges, and Mr. Littleton. Six weeks were spent in hearing the King's Council against the Petition, and the Commons defence of it. The managers for the Petition were, Sir Edward Coke, Mr. Selden, Sir Dudley Digges, Sergeant Guise, Sir Henry Martin, and Mr. Major. Coke, p. 207. Edit. 1697.

(3) By Mr. Alfred, Mr. Pym, Mr. Haverhill, Sir Edward Coke, Sir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Ney, Mr. Sellen, Mr. Maje, Mr. Glavie, and Sir Henry Martin. See Rushworth, Tom. I. p. 562.

This clause being thus rejected by the Commons, the Lords durst not throw out the Petition (1), on account of this addition, which, in truth, was not absolutely necessary. So, being satisfied with giving the King this testimony of their affection for his service, they insisted no longer upon the additional clause. Then the two Houses resolved to present the Petition to the King, and to pray his Majesty to give his answer in full Parliament, that it might be enrolled and serve hereafter for rule to the Courts of Justice, as an act of Parliament. The 2d of June the King came to the Parliament to give the Royal assent to the Petition of Right, and spoke thus to both Houses.

Gentlemen,

"I Am come hither to perform my duty. I think no man can think it long, since I have not taken so many days in answering the Petition, as ye spent weeks in framing it: And I am come hither to shew you, that as well in formal things as in essential, I desire to give you as much content as in me lies.

The Lord-Keeper added something farther; but, as there is nothing very material in his Speech, I do not think it necessary to infer it. After he had done speaking, the Petition was read aloud, being exprest in these

To the King's most excellent Majesty,

"Humbly shew unto our Sovereign Lord the King, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in Parliament assembled, that, whereas it is declared and enacted by a Statute, made in the time of the Raigne of King Edward the first, commonly called Statutum de Tallagio non concedendo, that no Tallage or Aide should be laid or levied, by the King or his heires, in this realme; without the good-will and assent of the Archbishops, Bishops, Earles, Barons, Knights, Burgesses, and other the freemen of the cominality of this realme: And by authority of Parliament holden in the five and twentieth yere of the Raigne of King Edward the third, it is declared and enacted, that from thenceforth no person should be compelled to make any loanes to the King against his will, because such loanes were against reason, and the franchise of the land; and by other lawes of this realme it is provided, that none should be charged by any charge or imposition, called a Benevolence, nor by such like charges, by which the Statutes before-mentioned, and other the good lawes and statuts of this Realme, your Subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any Tax, Tallage, Aide, or other like charge, not sett by common consent in Parliament.

"Yet nevertheless of late divers commissions, directed to sundrie commissioners in severall Counties, with instructions, have been issued, by means whereof your People have bene in divers places assembled, and required to lend certain sommes of money unto your Majestie, and many of them upon their refusal soe to doe, have had an oath administred unto them, not warrantable by the lawes or statuts of this Realme, and have bene constrained to become bound to make appearance, and give attendance before your Privie-Councell, and in other places, and others of them have bene therefore imprisoned, confined, and sundrie other wayes molested and disquieted: And divers other charges have been laide and leavied upon your People in severall Counties, by Lord-lieutenants, Deputie-lieutenants, commissioners for musters, Justices of peace, and others, by commande or direction from your Majestie, or your Privie-councell, against the lawes and free customes of the realme.

"And where alsoe by the Statute called, The greater Charter of the Liberties of England, it is declared and enacted, that no freeman may be taken or imprisoned, or be disseized of his freehold or liberties, or his free customes, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the Lawfull judgment of his Peeres, or by the Law of the land.

"And in the eight and twentieth yere of the Raigne of King Edward the Third, it was declared and enacted by authoritie of Parliament, that no man of what estate or condition that he be, should be put out of his Lands or Tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disseized, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of Law.

"Nevertheless against the tenor of the said statuts, and other the good lawes and statuts of your Realme, to that end provided, divers of your Subjects have of late bene imprisoned, without any cause shewed; and when for their deliverance they were brought before your Justices, by your Majesties writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergoe and receive as the Court should order, and their Keepers commaunded to certify the causes of their detainer; noe cause was certified, but that they were detained by your Majesties special commaund, signified by the Lords of your Privie-Councell, and yett were returned back to severall prisons without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer according to the law.

"And whereas of late great companies of souldiers and mariners have been disperfed into divers Counties of the realme, and the inhabitants against their wills have bene compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojorne, against the lawes and customes of this realme, and to the great grievance and vexation of the People.

"And whereas alsoe by authority of Parliament in the 25th yere of the raigne of King Edward III, it is declared and enacted, that no man should be fore-judged of life or lymbe, against the forme of the great Charter, and the law of the land, and by the said great Charters, and other the lawes and statuts of this your realme, no man ought to be adjudged to death, but by the lawes established in this your realme, either by the customes of the same realme, or by Acts of Parliament: And whereas noe offender of what kind soever, is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inflicted by the lawes and statuts of this your realme; nevertheless of late time, divers commissions under your Majesties Greate-Scale have issued forth, by which certaine persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners, with power and authoritie to procede within the land, according to the justice of martiall lawe against such souldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joyninge with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felonie, mutiny, or other outrage or misdemeanour whatsoever; and by such summarie course and order as is agreeable to martiall Lawe, and as is used in armies in time of war, to proceed to the tryall and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and putt to death according to the Lawe-martiall.

"By pretext whereof, some of your Majesties Subjects have bene by some of the said commissioners put to death, when and where, if by the lawes and statuts of the Land they had deserved death, by the same lawes and statuts alsoe they might, and by noe other ought, to have been judged and executed.

"And alsoe sundrie grievous offenders by colour thereof, clayming an exemption, have escaped the punishments due to them by the lawes and statuts of this your realme, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused, or forborne to proceed against such offenders according to the same lawes and statuts, upon pretence that the said offenders were punishable only by martiall Lawe, and by authority of such commissions as aforesaid; which commissions, and all others of like nature, are wholly and directly contrary to the said lawes and statuts of this your realm.

"They doe therefore humbly pray your most excellent Majesty, That noe man hereafter be compelled to make or yeilde any guisse, loane, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by Act of Parliament; and that none be called to make answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise molested or disquieted concerning the same, or for refusall thereof: And that noe freeman, in any such manner as is before-mentioned, be imprisoned or detained: And that your Majestie would be pleased to remove the said souldiers and mariners, and that your People may not be so burthened in the tyme to come: And that the aforesaid commissions for proceedinge by martiall Lawe, be utterly suppressed, and that hereafter, noe commissions of like nature may issue forth to any person or persons whatsoever, to be executed as aforesaid, least by colour of them, any of your Majesties Subjects be destroyed or putt to death, contrary to the lawes and franchise of the Land.

"All which they most humbly pray of your most ex-

1628. "cellent Majesty, as their Rights and Liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this Realm: And that your Majesty would alſo vouchſafe to declare, That the awards, doings, and proceedings, to the prejudice of your People in any of the premises, ſhall not be drawne hereafter into conſequence or example: And that your Majesty would be alſo graciously pleaſed, for the further comfort and ſafety of your People, to declare your royal will and pleaſure, That in the things aforeſaid, all your officers and miniſters ſhall ſerve you, according to the laws and ſtatutes of this Realm, as they tender the honour of your Majesty, and the proſperity of this Kingdom."

The King, as hath been ſeen, had uſed all poſſible endeavours to hinder this Petition from being preſented, and to ſatisfy the Commons with general promiſes, which properly bound him to nothing, and did not deſtroy his ſyſtem of Government. So, though he ſeigned to come to the Parliament on purpoſe to paſs the Petition of Right, and give a ſatisfactory answer, he purſued however his plan, and threw by his answer, how much he dreaded to promiſe. Here follows his answer, wherein may be eaſily perceived the ſame general promiſes, and the ſame reſtrictions as in what he had offered already.

The King's answer to the Petition of Rights.

THE King willeth that Right be done according to the laws and cuſtoms of the Realm; and that the Statutes be put in due execution, that his Subjects may have no cauſe to complain of any wrong or oppreſſion, contrary to their juſt Rights and Liberties, to the preſervation whereof, he holds himſelf in conſcience as well obliged, as of his Prerogative.

It would be needleſs to make any remarks on this answer, ſince the King's intention appears fo very plainly. It ſuffices only to obſerve, the King had endeavoured to content the Parliament with general promiſes, and the Commons not thinking that ſufficient, had inſiſted upon the Petition of Right, where ſeveral particular caſes were ſpecified. Now the King inſtead of giving the Parliament the ſatisfaction they deſired, kept in his answer to his general promiſes, without touching upon any of the particular caſes ſpecified in the Petition.

The Commons not being ſatisfied with the King's Answer, made no haſte to finiſh the affair of Supply. On the contrary, they deſired a conference with the Lords, where the point of commitments was thoroughly diſcuſſed (1). The Thing in queſtion was, the power aſſumed by the King to impriſon the Subjects, without declaring the cauſe, which the King had not leſſened by his answer, though it was one of the chief motives of the Petition of Right. Wherefore the Commons willing to ſhew the King their diſſatisfaction, inſtead of proceeding with the Subſidy-Bill, returned to the conſideration of Grievances. On this occaſion, and at the inſtance of the Commons, the Lords paſſed upon Dr. Manwaring, the ſentence I have mentioned in another place.

The King ſeeing the Commons otherways employed than in the buſineſs of Subſidies, ſent them the following Meſſage by their own Speaker.

"That his Majesty having, upon the Petition exhibited by both Houſes, given an answer full of juſtice and grace, for which we and our poſterity have juſt cauſe to bleſs his Majesty, it is now time to grow to a concluſion of the ſeſſion; and therefore his Majesty thinks fit to let you know, That as he doth reſolve to abide by that answer, without further change or alteration, ſo he will royally and really perform unto you what he hath thereby promiſed: And further, that he reſolves to end this ſeſſion upon Wednesday the 11th of this month; and therefore wiſheth, that the Houſe will ſeriously attend thoſe buſineſſes which may beſt bring the ſeſſion to a happy concluſion, without entertaining new matters, and ſo huſband the time, that his Majesty may with the more comfort bring us ſpeedily together again: At which time, if there be any further Grievances not contained or expreſſed in the Petition, they may be more maturely conſidered, than the time will now permit."

This meſſage made the Commons believe (2), the Duke of Buckingham had done them ill offices with the King. This was mentioned in the Houſe, and Sir John Elliot ſtanding up, and beginning to ſpeak in ſuch manner that it was thought he was going to fall upon the Favorite and Miniſtry, the Speaker ſtared from the chair and ſaid, "There is a command laid upon me, that I muſt command you not to proceed." Whereupon Elliot ſat down. But others more bold propoſed to go and ſhew their dangers to the Lords, and then carry their complaints together to the King. Some of the Court-party ſaying, That the Speech lately ſpoken by Sir John Elliot (3) had given offence to his Majesty, the Houſe declared: That every Member is free from Declaration any undutiful Speech, from the beginning of the Parliament to that day; and ordered, that the Houſe be turned into a Committee, to conſider what is fit to be done for the ſafety of the Kingdom; and that no man go out upon pain of going to the Tower. But Sir John Finch the Speaker, deſiring leave to go out, obtained it, and immediately informed the King of what was paſſing in the Houſe. In his abſence it was debated, and going to be voted by a majority, to make a Remonſtrance to the King, wherein it ſhould be ſaid that the Duke of Buckingham was the chief cauſe of all the miſeries of the Kingdom. But before the debate was ended, the Speaker returned with a meſſage from the King, commanding the Houſe to adjourn till next day, and all Committees to ceaſe in the mean time. The Lords received the ſame order. On the morrow the Speaker brings the following meſſage from the King.

"Whereas his Majesty underſtanding, that yedid conceive his laſt meſſage to reſtrain you in your juſt privileges, to complain of any of his Miniſters; theſe are to declare his intentions, That he had no meaning of barring you from what hath been your right, but only to avoid all ſcandals on his Council and actions paſt, and that his Miniſters might not be, nor himſelf, under their names, taxed for their counſel unto his Majesty, and that no ſuch particulars ſhould be taken in hand, as would aſk a longer time of conſideration than what he hath prefixed, and ſtill reſolves to hold, that ſo for this time all Chriſtendom might take notice of a ſweet parting between him and his people: Which if it fall out, his Majesty will not be long from another meeting, when ſuch (if there be any) at their leiſure and convenience may be conſidered."

It may have been hitherto obſerved, in King Charles's whole conduct, that he was fo firm in his principles concerning government, that he could not reſolve to recede from any thing, or if he ſeemed to make any conſeſſion, he immediately rendered it uſeleſs by ſome reſtriction. This may be ſeen in his answer to the Petition of Right, but ſtill more particularly in this laſt meſſage to the Commons. He would not (as he ſaid) bar them from the privilege to complain of his Miniſters, but would not have them caſt any blame on their counſels. That is, properly ſpeaking, he would not have them attacked, or at moſt, would only ſuffer them, to be proteſtated for private offences which they might be guilty of, like all the reſt of the Subjects, but not for State-affairs, as Miniſters and Counſellers. The Commons not being more ſatisfied with this meſſage than the former, the Houſe was again turned into a Committee, and conſidered of ſome more heads to be inſerted in the Remonſtrance, particularly the King's deſign to bring into the Nation foreign forces. This complaint was grounded upon a diſcovery the Houſe had made of a Privy-Seal, expreſſed in theſe words (4).

CHARLES by the Grace of God, &c.

To the Treasurer, and under-Treasurer for our Exchequer for the time being, greeting: We do hereby will and command you, out of our treasury, remaining in the receipt of our ſaid Exchequer, forthwith to pay, or cauſe to be paid unto Philip Burlemack of London, Merchant, the ſum of thirty thouſand pounds, to be paid by him over by Bill of Exchange into the Low-Countries, and Germany, unto our truſty and well-beloved Sir William Balſour, Knight, and John Dolbier, Eſq; or either of them, for leaping and providing certain numbers of horſes, with arms for horſe and foot, to be brought over into this Kingdom for our ſervice, viz. &c.

At the ſame time the Commons ſent a meſſage to the Lords, to deſire their concurrence in an humble Petition to the King, that a clear and ſatisfactory answer be given by his Majesty in full Parliament to the Petition of Right; to which the Lords conſented. The King knew then, it was not poſſible for him to avoid giving ſuch an

(1) The King's Answer being read in the Houſe of Commons, and ſeeming too ſcanty, Sir John Elliot roſe up, and in a long Speech, ſet forth a full and juſt repreſentation of all Grievances; which done, Sir Edward Coke moved, That an humble Remonſtrance be preſented to his Majesty, touching the doing of this and means at ſafety of King and Kingdom. Whereupon they turned themſelves into a grand Committee, and the Committee for the Bill or Subſidies was directed to expedite the ſaid Remonſtrance. Mean while comes the Meſſage from the King by the Speaker, and after reading the Meſſage, the Houſe proceeded with a declaration againſt Manwaring, which was the ſame day delivered to the Lords, at a conference managed by Mr. Pym, betwixt the Committees of both Houſes. After Manwaring's ſentence, the King ſent another Meſſage of the ſame import by the Speaker. Raſbworth, Tom. I. p. 391, 605.

(2) It was not this Meſſage, but another, ſent June 5, wherein the King required the Commons, "not to enter into, or proceed with any new buſineſſes, which might ſpend greater time, or lay any ſcandal or ſperſion upon the State, Government, or Miniſters thereof." Ibid. p. 605.

1628. "made to prevent the increase of Popery within this Kingdom; and notwithstanding your Majesty's most gracious and satisfactory answer to the Petition of both Houses in that behalf presented to your Majesty at Oxford, we find there hath followed no good execution nor effect, but on the contrary, (at which your Majesty out of the quick sense of your own religious heart, cannot but be in the highest measure displeased) those of that Religion do find extraordinary favours and respect in Court from persons of great quality and power, whom they continually resort unto, and in particular to the Countess of Buckingham, who herself openly professing that Religion, is a known favorer and supporter of them that do the same; which we well hoped, upon your Majesty's answer to the aforesaid Petition at Oxford, should not have been permitted, nor that any of your Majesty's Subjects of that Religion justly to be suspected, should be entertained in the service of your Majesty, or your Royal Consort the Queen. Some likewise of that Religion have had honours, offices, and places of command and authority lately conferred upon them. But that which striketh the greatest terror into the hearts of your loyal Subjects concerning this, is, that letters of stay of legal proceedings against them have been procured from your Majesty, (by what indirect means we know not :) And Commissions under the Great Seal, granted and executed for composition to be made with Popish Recusants, with inhibitions, and restraint, both to the ecclesiastical and temporal Courts, and Officers to intermeddle with them; which is conceived to amount to no less than a Toleration, odious to God, full of dishonour, and extreme disprofit to your Majesty, of extreme scandal and grief to your good People, and of apparent danger to the present state of your Majesty, and of this Kingdom; their numbers, power, and insolvency, daily increasing in all parts of your Kingdom, and especially about London, and the Suburbs thereof, where exceeding many Families do make their abode publicly, frequent masks at Denmark House, and other places; and by their often meetings and conferences, have opportunities of combining their counsels and strength together, and to the hazard of your Majesty's safety, and the State, and most especially in these doubtful and calamitous times. And as our fear concerning change or subversion of Religion, is grounded upon the daily increase of Papists, the open and professed enemies thereof, for the reasons formerly mentioned; so are the hearts of your good Subjects no less perplexed, when with sorrow they behold a daily growth and spreading of the Faction of the Ariminians, that being, as your Majesty well knows, but a cunning way to bring in Popery, and the professors of those opinions, the common disturbers of the Protestant Churches, and incendiaries in those States, wherein they have gotten any head, being Protestants in shew, but Jesuits in opinion; which caused your Royal Father, with so much pious wisdom, and ardent zeal, to endeavour the suppressing of them, as well at home, as in the neighbour Countries. And your gracious Majesty, imitating his most worthy example, hath openly, and by your Proclamation declared your dislike of those persons, and of their opinions; who, notwithstanding, are much favoured and advanced, not wanting friends even of the Clergy, near to your Majesty; namely, Dr. Nile Bishop of Winchester, and Dr. Laud Bishop of Bath and Wells, who are justly suspected to be unsound in their opinions that way. And it being now generally held the way to preferment and promotion in the Church, many scholars do bend the course of their Studies to maintain those errors; their Books and opinions are suffered to be printed and published; and on the other side, the imprinting of such as are written against them, and in defence of the orthodox Church, are hindered and prohibited; and (which is a boldness almost incredible) this restraint of orthodox Books, is made under colour of your Majesty's formerly mentioned Proclamation, the intent and meaning whereof, we know was quite contrary. And further, to increase our fears concerning innovation of Religion, we find, that there hath been no small labouring to remove that which is the most powerful means to strengthen and encrease our own Religion, and to oppose both those, which is the diligent teaching and instruction of the people in the true knowledge and worship of Almighty God. And therefore means hath been sought out to deprive and discountenance pious, and painful, and orthodox Preachers; and how conformable soever, and peaceable in their disposition and carriage they be, yet the preferment of such is opposed, and instead of being encouraged, they are molested with vexatious courses and pursuits, and hardly permitted to lecture. And in those places where are no constant preaching Ministers, whereby many of your good people (whose souls, in this case, we beseech your Majesty to commiserate) are kept in ignorance, and are apt to be easily seduced to error and superstition. It doth not a little also increase our dangers and fears this way, to understand the miserable condition of your Kingdom of Ireland, where, without controul, the popish Religion is openly professed, and practised in every part thereof, popish jurisdiction being there generally exercised and avowed, monasteries, nunneries, and other superstitious houses newly erected, re-edified, and replenished with men and women of several orders, and in a plentiful manner maintained at Dublin, and most of the great towns, and divers other places of the Kingdom; which of what ill consequence it may prove, if not seasonably repressed, we leave to your Majesty's wisdom to judge: But most humbly beseech you, (as we assure ourselves you will) to lay the serious consideration thereof to your royal and pious heart, and that some speedy course may be taken for redress therein.

And if now to all these your Majesty will be pleased to add the consideration of the circumstances of time, wherein these courses, tending to the destruction of true Religion, within these your Kingdoms, have been taken here, even then when the same is with open force and violence prosecuted in other Countries, and all the reformed Churches in Christendom, either depressed, or miserably distressed: We do humbly appeal unto your Majesty's princely judgment, whether there be not just ground of fear, that there is some secret and strong co-operating here with the enemies of our Religion abroad, for the utter extirpation thereof? And whether, if those courses be not speedily redressed, and the profession of true Religion more encouraged, we can expect any other but misery and ruin speedily to fall upon us? Especially, if besides the visible and apparent dangers wherein we are compassed about, you would be pleased to remember the displeasure of Almighty God, always bent against the neglect of his holy Religion, the strokes of whose divine justice we have already felt, and do still feel with smart and sorrow in great measure.

And besides this fear of innovation in Religion, we do in like faithful discharge of our duties, most humbly declare to your Majesty, that the hearts of your people are full of fear of innovation and change of Government, and accordingly possessed with extreme grief and sorrow; yet in this point, by your Majesty's late answer to our Petition of Right touching our Liberties, much comforted, and raised again out of that sadness and discontent, which they generally had conceived throughout the whole Kingdom, for the undue courses which were the last year taken for raising of moneys by loans, than which (whatever your Majesty hath been informed to the contrary) there were never any moneys demanded nor paid with greater grief, and general dislike of all your faithful Subjects; though many, partly out of fear, partly out of other respects, (yet most unwillingly) were drawn to yield to what was required.

The billeting of soldiers did much augment both their fears and grief, wherein likewise they find much comfort upon your gracious answer to our Petition of Right, and to that we presented to your Majesty concerning this particular. Yet we most humbly beseech your Majesty, that we may inform you, that the still continuance and late re-inforcing of those soldiers, the conditions of their persons, (many of them not being natives of this Kingdom, nor of the same, but of an opposite Religion) the placing them upon the sea-coast, where making head amongst themselves, they may unite with the Popish party at home, if occasion serve, and join with an invading enemy to do extreme mischief; and that they are not yet dismissed, both still minister cause of jealousy in your loving Subjects; for that the soldiers cannot be continued without exceeding great danger of the peace and safety of your Kingdom.

The report of the strange and dangerous purpose of bringing in German Horse, and Riders, would have turned our doubts into despair, and our fears into a certainty of confusion, had not your Majesty's gracious message (for which we humbly give you thanks) comforted us by the assurance of your Royal word, that they neither are, nor were intended by your Majesty for any service in England, but that they were designed for some other foreign employment. Yet the sight of the Privy Seal, by which, it seemeth, they were to be levied; the great sum of money, which, upon examinations, we found to be paid for that purpose, gave us just cause of fears, that much about the same time there was a commission under the Great Seal granted unto the Lords, and others of the Privy-Council, to consider of other ways for raising of moneys, so particularly by impositions, gave us just cause to suspect, that whatsoever was your Majesty's gracious intention, yet there wanted not

1658. those, that under some colourable pretence, might secretly by this, as by other ways, contrive to change the frame both of Religion and government, and thereby undermine the safety of your Majesty and your Kingdoms.

These men could not be ignorant, that the bringing in of strangers for aid, hath been pernicious to most States, where they have been admitted, but to England fatal. We do bless God that hath given your Majesty a wife understanding heart to discern of those courses, and that such power produceth nothing but weakness and calamity. And we beseech your Majesty to pardon the vehemency of our expression, if in the loyal and zealous affections we bear to your Majesty and your service, we are bold to declare to your Majesty and the whole world, that we hold it far beneath the heart of any free Englishman to think, that this victorious nation should now stand in need of German soldiers to defend their now King and Kingdom.

But when we consider the course formerly mentioned, and these things tending to an apparent change of Government, the often breaches of Parliament, whereby your Majesty hath been deprived of the faithful counsel, and free aids of your People, by taking of Tonnage and Poundage, without grant thereof by Act of Parliament, ever since the beginning of your Majesty's reign to this present, the standing commission granted to the Duke of Buckingham to be General of an army in the land in the time of peace, the discharging of faithful and sufficient officers and ministers, some from judicial places, and others from the offices and authorities which they formerly held in the Commonwealth: we cannot but at the sight of such an apparent defolation as must necessarily follow these courses, out of the depth of sorrow, lift up our cries to heaven for help, and next, under God, apply our selves unto your sacred Majesty, who, if you could hear so many thousands speaking together, do jointly implore speedy help and reformation.

And if your Majesty would be pleased to take a further view of the present state of your Realm, we do humbly pray you to consider, whether the miserable disasters and ill success that hath accompanied all your late designs and actions, particularly those of Calis, and the Isle of Rhe, and the last expedition to Rochel, have not extremely wasted that stock of honour that was left unto this Kingdom, sometimes terrible to all other nations, and now declining to contempt beneath the meanest.

Together with our honours, we there lost those (and that not a few) who had they lived, we might have some better hope of recovering it again; our valiant and expert Colonels, Captains and Commanders, and many thousand common soldiers and mariners: though we have some cause to think, that your Majesty is not as yet rightly informed thereof; and that of six or seven thousand of your Subjects lost at the Isle of Rhe, your Majesty received information but of a few hundreds. And this dishonour and loss hath been purchased with the consumption of above a million of treasure.

Many of the Forts are exceeding weak and decayed, and want both men and munition. And here we cannot but with grief consider and complain of a strange improvidence, (we think your Majesty will rather call it treachery) that your store of Powder, which by order of your Privy-Council, dated the tenth of December 1626, should be constantly three hundred Last, besides a continual supply of twenty Last a month for ordinary expenses, and were now fit (as we conceive) to be double the proportion, is at this time in the Tower (the present warrants being served) but nine Lasts and forty-eight pounds in all; which we tremble to think of. And that, notwithstanding this extreme scarcity of Powder, great quantities have been permitted to be sold out of your Majesty's store to particular persons for private gain; whereof we have seen a certificate, six Last sold since the fourteenth of January last, and your Majesty's store being unfurnished of Powder, which by a contract made with Mr. Evelyn, by advice of your Lords in Parliament, ought to be supplied monthly with twenty Last, at the rate of three pounds ten shillings and ten-pence a barrel; your Majesty hath been forced to pay above seven pounds a barrel for Powder, to be brought in from beyond seas; for which purpose, twelve thousand four hundred pounds was impressed to Mr. Bortlemack the last year, and that Powder not so good as that by contract your Majesty should have by one third-part; all which are most fearful and dangerous abuses. But what the poverty, weakness, and misery of our Kingdom is now grown unto by decay of trade, and destruction, and loss of Ships and Mariners, within these three years, we are almost afraid to declare: And could we by any other means have been sure, that your Majesty should any other way have had a true information thereof, we should have been doubtful to have made our weakness and extremity of misfortune in this kind to appear: But the unfortunate and most pitiful complaints from all parts of the Kingdom near adjoining to the sea in this kind, would rend, as we think, the stoutest heart in the world with sorrow; and the sense we have of the miserable condition your Kingdom is in by reason thereof, especially, for that we see no possible means (being now shortly to end this session) how to help the same, adds such a weight of grief unto our sad thoughts, as we have not words to express it: But for your Majesty's more exact information therein, we beseech you be pleased to peruse the Calendar of particulars, which with the Remonstrance, we most humbly present unto your Majesty.

One reason, amongst many, of this decay of Trade, and loss of Ships and Mariners is, the not guarding of the narrow seas, the regality whereof your Majesty hath now in a manner wholly lost, being that wherein a principal part of the honour and safety of this Kingdom heretofore consisted; and now having absolutely neglected it, the town of Dunkirk doth so continually rob and spoil your Subjects, that we can assure your Majesty (if some present and effectual remedy be not forthwith provided) the whole trade of this Kingdom, the shipping, mariners, and all belonging thereto, will be utterly lost and consumed. The principal cause of which evils and dangers, we conceive to be the excessive power of the Duke of Buckingham, and the abuse of that power: And we humbly submit unto your Majesty's excellent wisdom, whether it be safe for yourself, or your Kingdoms, that so great power as rests in him by sea and land, should be in the hands of any one Subject whatsoever.

And as it is not safe, so sure we are, it cannot be for your service, it being impossible for one man to manage so many and weighty affairs of the Kingdom as he hath undertaken, besides the ordinary duties of those offices which he holds, some of which well performed, would require the time and industry of the ablest men both of counsel and action, that your whole Kingdom will afford, especially in these times of common danger. And our humble desire is further, that your most excellent Majesty will be pleased to take into your most princely consideration, whether, in respect the said Duke hath so abused his power, it be safe for your Majesty and your Kingdoms to continue him, either in his great offices, or in his place of nearness and counsel about your sacred person.

And this in all humility, aiming at nothing but the honour of Almighty God, and the maintenance of his true Religion, the safety and happiness of your most excellent Majesty, and the preservation and prosperity of this Church and Commonwealth; we have endeavoured with faithful hearts and intentions, and in discharge of the duty we owe to your Majesty and our Country, to give your Majesty a true representation of our present danger, and pressing calamities, which we humbly beseech your Majesty graciously to accept, and to take the same to heart, accounting the safety and prosperity of your People, your greatest happiness, and their love, your richest treasure. A rueful and lamentable spectacle we confess it must needs be, to behold those ruins in so fair an house, so many diseases, and almost every one of them deadly, in so strong and well-tempered a body as this Kingdom lately was. But yet we will not doubt, but that God hath reserved this honour for your Majesty, to restore the safety and happiness thereof, as a work worthy of excellent a Prince, for whose long life and true felicity we daily pray, and that your fame and never-dying glory may be continued to all succeeding generations.

This Remonstrance, delivered by the Speaker, (who much desired to be excused) made no great impression upon the King: though it did upon the People. All the facts therein alleged were known and indisputable truths. As to the Right, the People readily believed, the King and his Ministers meant to establish a despotick power, because all their proceedings plainly showed it. But they could not believe that the Parliament had purposely formed a project to rob the King of his Prerogatives. They were the more confirmed in this opinion, as after the dissolution of this very Parliament, the King, in the reasons he gave for the dissolution, complained not of the Remonstrance.

The same day the Remonstrance was presented to the King, the Commons sent the Subsidy-bill to the Lords for their concurrence. Soon after the King acquaints them by message, that he meant to end the session the 26th of June: whereupon the Commons began to prepare a particular 1628. Remonstrance of the undue taking of Tunnage and Poundage (1). This was an ancient impost upon merchants Goods exported and imported, which the Parliament usually granted to the Kings, to enable them to guard the seas and protect the trade. This impost had long been granted to every King, and it happened sometimes, that after the death of a King, his Successor had continued to levy it, till the Parliament had given it by an Act. As in the Reign of Charles I, the Court was much guided by precedents favorable to the Prerogative royal, and as they took advantage of such precedents, as if they had been so many laws, it happened that since King James's death, Charles had levied Tunnage and Poundage, without desiring an Act of Parliament for that purpose, under colour that some of his predecessors had practised it some time till an Act was passed. This is what the Commons found fault with, maintaining, the Right was a pure grant of the People, and consequently the King had not power to levy it without the consent of Parliament; and the more as the seas had never been well guarded, nor the trade less protected than in the first years of this Reign. To maintain therefore the People's Rights, and hinder the Crown from usurping by degrees the Impost of Tonnage and Poundage, as a right independent of the Parliament, the Commons prepared a Remonstrance to the King upon that subject.

Whilst the Remonstrance was drawing, the King acquainted the Lords, that the Commission for finding means to raise money, was but a warrant of advice, agreeable to the time and occasions; but that now having received a token of his people's love, by the Subsidy-bill ready to be passed, the commission was become useless, and therefore he had commanded it to be cancelled. As if he had said, in case the Parliament had not granted a supply, he should have found ways to raise money. As to his laying the commission was but a warrant of advice, it is strange that in speaking to men of sense, such wretched excuses should be used. The day following, the Commons were informed also, that the commission was cancelled. As the affair of Tunnage and Poundage made a great noise, it is necessary to insert the Commons Remonstrance on that subject.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

YOUR Majesty's most loyal and dutiful Subjects, the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, being in nothing more careful, than of the honour and prosperity of your Majesty, and the Kingdom, which they know do much depend upon that happy union and relation between your Majesty and your people, do with much sorrow apprehend, that by reason of the uncertainty of their continuance together, the unexpected interruptions which have been cast upon them, and the shortness of time in which your Majesty hath determined to end this session, they cannot bring to maturity and perfection, divers businesses of weight, which they have taken into their consideration and resolution, as most important for the common good: Amongst other things, they have taken into especial care the preparing of a bill, for the granting of your Majesty such a subsidy of Tonnage and Poundage, as might uphold your profit and revenue in as ample a manner as their just care and respect of trade (wherein not only the prosperity, but even the life of the Kingdom doth consist) would permit: But being a work which will require much time and preparation by conference with your Majesty's officers, and with the Merchants, not only of London, but of other remote parts, they find it not possible to be accomplished at this time: Wherefore considering it will be much more prejudicial to the right of the subject, if your Majesty should continue to receive the same without authority of law, after the determination of a session, than if there had been a recess by adjournment only, in which case, that intended grant would have related to the first day of the Parliament; and assuring themselves, that your Majesty is resolved to observe that your royal answer, which you have lately made to the Petition of Right of both Houses of Parliament: Yet doubting lest your Majesty may be misled concerning this particular case, as if you might continue to take those subsidies of Tunnage and Poundage, and other impositions upon Merchants, without breaking that answer, they are forced by that duty which they owe to your Majesty, and to those whom they represent, to declare, That there ought not any imposition to be laid upon the goods of Merchants, exported or imported, without common consent by Act of Parliament; which is the right and inheritance of your Subjects, founded not only upon the most ancient and original constitution of this Kingdom, but often confirmed and declared in divers Statute-laws.

"And for the better manifestation thereof, may it please your Majesty to understand, That although your royal predecessors, the Kings of this Realm, have often had such subsidies and impositions granted unto them upon divers occasions, especially for the guarding of the seas, and the safeguard of Merchants: Yet the Subjects have been ever careful to use such cautions and limitations in those grants, as might prevent any claim to be made, that such subsidies do proceed from duty, and not from the free-gift of the Subjects. And that they have heretofore used to limit a time in such grants, and for the most part but short, as for a year or two, and if it continued longer, they have sometimes directed a certain space of cessation or intermission, that so the right of the subject might be more evident. At other times it hath been granted upon occasion of war, for a certain number of years, with Proviso, That if the war were ended in the mean time, then the grant should cease: And of course it hath been sequestered into the hands of some Subjects, to be employed for the guarding of the seas. And it is acknowledged by the ordinary answers of your Majesty's Predecessors, in their assent to the bills of subsidies of Tunnage and Poundage, that it is of the nature of other subsidies, proceeding from the good will of the Subject: Very few of your predecessors had it for life, until the Reign of Henry VII, who was so far from conceiving he had any right thereunto, that although he granted commissions for collecting certain duties and customs due by law, yet he made no commissions for receiving the subsidy of Tunnage and Poundage, until the same was granted unto him in Parliament. Since his time all the Kings and Queens of this Realm have had the like grants for life, by the free love and good-will of the Subjects. And whensoever the people have been grieved, by laying any impositions, or other charges upon their goods and merchandises without authority of law (which hath been very seldom) yet upon complaint in Parliament, they have been forthwith relieved; saving in the time of your royal Father, who having, through ill counsel, raised the rates and charges upon merchandises to that height at which they now are, yet he was pleased so far forth to yield to the complaint of his people, as to offer, That if the value of those impositions which he had set might be made good unto him, he would bind himself and his Heirs by Act of Parliament, never to lay any other: Which offer, the Commons at that time, in regard of the great burden, did not think fit to yield unto. Nevertheless your loyal Commons in this Parliament, out of their especial zeal to your service, and especial regard of your pressing occasions, have taken into their consideration, so to frame a grant of subsidy of Tunnage or Poundage to your Majesty, that both you might have been the better enabled for the defence of your Realm, and your Subjects, by being secure from all undue charges, be the more encouraged cheerfully to proceed in their course of trade; by the increase whereof, your Majesty's profit, and likewise the strength of the Kingdom, would be very much augmented.

"But not being now able to accomplish this their desire, there is no course left unto them, without manifest breach of their duty, both to your Majesty and their Country, save only to make this humble declaration, That the receiving of Tunnage and Poundage, and other impositions, not granted by Parliament, is a breach of the fundamental liberties of this Kingdom, and contrary to your Majesty's royal answer to the said Petition of Right. And therefore they do most humbly beseech your Majesty to forbear any further receiving of the same; and not to take it in ill part from those of your Majesty's loving Subjects, who shall refuse to make payment of any such charges, without warrant of law demanded.

"And as by this forbearance, your most excellent Majesty shall manifest unto the world your royal justice in the observation of your laws: So they doubt not but hereafter, at the time appointed for their coming again, they shall have occasion to express their great desire to advance your Majesty's honour and profit."

The King being informed of the contents of this remonstrance, on the 26th of June sent for the Speaker, who returned some time after to the House, whilst the remonstrance was reading. He was no sooner come, but the King, who was now at the House of Lords, sent for the Commons, and thus spake to both Houses.

IT may seem strange that I came so suddenly to end this session; before I give my assent to the Bills, I will tell you the cause, though I must avow, that I owe the account of my actions to God alone. It is known

(1) The Commons fell immediately upon the Bill of Tunnage and Poundage, but finding they should not have time to accomplish the same, it was ordered by the Commons, that a Committee be appointed to draw up a Remonstrance, of the undue taking of Tunnage and Poundage with an Act of Parliament. Reg. Tom. 1. p. 625. A. p. 626.

"to every one, that a while ago the House of Commons gave me a Remonstrance, how acceptable every man may judge; and for the merit of it, I will not call that in question, for I am sure no wise man can justify it."

"Now since I am truly informed, that a second Remonstrance is preparing for me to take away the profit of my Tunnage and Poundage, one of the chief maintenances of my Crown, by alledging, I have given away my Right thereto by my answer to your Petition:

"This is so prejudicial unto me, that I am forced to end this session some few hours before I meant, being not willing to receive any more Remonstrances, to which I must give a harsh answer. And since I see, that even the House of Commons begins already to make false constructions of what I granted in your Petition, lest it be worse interpreted in the Country, I will now make a declaration concerning the true intent thereof.

"The profession of both Houses in the time of hammering this Petition, was no way to trench upon my prerogative, saying, they had neither intention or power to hurt it. Therefore it must needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient liberties of my Subjects. Yet to shew the clearness of my intentions, that I neither repent, nor mean to recede from any thing I have promised you, I do here declare my self, That those things which have been done, whereby many have had some cause to expect the liberties of the Subjects to be trenching upon, which indeed was the first and true ground of the Petition, shall not hereafter be drawn into example for your prejudice, and from time to time, in the word of a King, ye shall not have the like cause to complain. But as for Tunnage and Poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to ask, nor meant by me I am sure, to grant.

"To conclude, I command you all that are here to take notice of what I have spoken at this time, to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your Petition; but especially you, my Lords the Judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of Laws; for none of the Houses of Parliament, either joint or separate, (what new doctrine soever may be raised) have any power either to make or declare a Law without my consent."

Subsidy Bill to be passed, and the Parliament prorogued. Remark on the King's Speech.

After this Speech, the Subsidy-bill was passed, the Lords having already given their consent, and the Parliament was prorogued to the 20th of October.

The King's Speech to the Parliament before the prorogation, was so dark, that it was hard to conceive upon what grounds he complained of the Remonstrance the Commons had prepared. He seems to have considered Tunnage and Poundage as a Right annexed to his Prerogative Royal. Otherwise, there was no need to observe, that both Houses, whilst they were preparing the Petition of Right, had declared, they meant not to encroach upon his Prerogative. This argument, on supposition of that principle, would have been unanswerable, and the rest very superfluous. But as the King knew he could never prove this Right to belong to him independently of the Parliament, he proceeded to other arguments, the weakness whereof is evident. He said, the two Houses by their Petition of Right, did not intend to take from him Tunnage and Poundage, from whence he inferred, that since they had no such particular view, he could not with justice be desired to desist from it. But first, though the Petition of Right contained some particular articles, these articles did not exclude whatever was implied in the general article, founded upon the ancient Statutes: That no Tax, Tallage, Loan, Benevolence, or other charge ought to be levied by the King, without the consent of Parliament. Now Tunnage and Poundage being of this nature, it necessarily followed, that it was included in the general article, or else, it was to be proved to belong to the Crown, independently of the common consent of the People. In the second place, the two Houses had no intention to deprive him of Tunnage and Poundage in particular, because they designed to grant it by an Act. He could not therefore conclude from thence, that he had a Right to levy it without their consent. He alledged as another argument, that he never meant to grant them this article, making his answer to depend upon his intention. But his answer, Solt fait comme il est désiré, manifestly referred to the contents of the Petition, and not to the King's intention in granting it. His third argument was taken from Tunnage and Poundage being one of the best Revenues of the Crown, and his chief support. This was an excellent argument to demonstrate to the Parliament the necessity of granting him this Right, and to induce him to continue the Session till the Act was passed; but he could not thence infer, that he had power to levy it against the Parliament's will, especially as it was in his breast to have it in a legal way. Moreover, he continually inculcated, that his answer depended upon his intention, directly contrary to the clear and express terms of the answer itself, which could refer only to the Petition. Finally, in taking from the Houses the power of declaring what was, or what was not, Law, he ascribed it solely to the Judges who were under him; that is to say, as he could make or unmake the Judges as he pleased, he put himself properly in possession of this same power, independently of the two Houses. This intention appeared but too plainly afterwards.

This Session was worth to the King five Subsidies (1), a very considerable aid, with which the Parliament purchased the King's answer to the Petition of Right, that is, the confirmation of the Laws, which till then had passed for incontestable. On the other side, the King thought he had no less dearly bought the five Subsidies by his concession to tie up his hands, in giving his consent to the Petition of Right, contrary to his own principles, and the projects he had formed with respect to Government. But he afterwards showed, that in granting the Petition of Right, he had only amused the Parliament, since he never regulated his conduct by what was contained in the Petition. Presently after the prorogation of the Parliament, the King published several Proclamations. The first was to suppress Dr. Montuarius's Sermons, [entitled, Religion, and Allegiance.] But this suppression consisted only in an order to such as had any copies of these Sermons, to deliver them to the Secretary of State, or some other Magistrate (2). The sequel will show whether the Court was desirous this order should be punctually executed. But the King's appearing publicly not to approve of these Sermons, was sufficient to satisfy the people.

By another Proclamation, Richard Smith, titular Bishop of Chalcedon, was ordered to be apprehended, with all other Priests and Jesuits that had taken Orders by authority from the See of Rome, and [after conviction] to be committed to the Castle of Witch (3). Some Jesuits having been taken and sent to Newgate (4), the King ordered, that if they were found guilty, they should be carried to the same Castle of Witch in the life of Ely. These were all the proceedings of the Court against the Papists.

But on the other hand, the King took a course which gave a much worse opinion of his own, or his Minister's zeal for Religion. First, he appointed Commissioners to compound with Recusants. Secondly, Sir Richard Weston, a known Papist, was made Lord Treasurer, and afterwards Earl of Portland. Thirdly, Dr. Laud, who was considered as head of the Arminians, in the judgment of the House of Commons, was translated from Bath and Wells, to the Bishoprick of London. Fourthly, Dr. Montague, who had given so great offence by his Book, entitled, Appeal to Cæsar, was promoted to the See of Chichester (5).

The town of Rachel being at this time closely besieged by the King of France, the King had prepared a Fleet to relieve it, and the Duke of Buckingham, who was to have the command, was now at Portsmouth. But when he was going to embark, he was stabbed to the heart with a knife, and immediately died (6). The assassin was one John Felton, a Lieutenant, who owned, that after the Declaration of the Commons against the Duke, he had looked upon him as an enemy to his country, and been thereby induced to commit the deed. It appeared by his trial, that he had no complice, and was led to this wicked action by an excess of zeal. The King [being then at Sir Daniel Norton's near Portsmouth] seemed extremely concerned for the Duke's death, and to give him, even after

(1) The Clergy granted also five Subsidies. — The Acts made in this Session were, 1. An Act forbidding Carriers, Waggoners, and Drivers, traveling on Sunday; or Butchers killing or selling meat on that day. 2. To restrain the passing or landing any to be possibly bred beyond the Seas. 3. For the better suppressing of unlicensed Ale-house Keepers. 4. For establishing Norton's Hospital. 5. For reformation in blood of Sir Carew Raleigh.

(2) Rushworth says, they were wholly suppressed, and that it was Montague's Books that were ordered to be delivered to the Bishop of the Diocese, &c. Rushworth, T. I. p. 633, 635.

(3) They were first to be committed to the County Goals, but if after Conviction there should be cause to respice Execution, they were to be removed to Witch. Ibid. p. 633.

(4) There were a Neck of Jesuits discovered in Clerkenwell, and formerly apprehended, who were also after Conviction to be removed from Newgate to Witch. Ibid.

(5) Montuarius also (having with Montague procured a Royal Pardon of all errors) was, notwithstanding his being disabled by the House of Lords from all future preferments, immediately presented to the Rectory of Stamford Rivers, with a dispensation to hold St. Giles's in the Fields. Ibid.

(6) As the Duke was going out of his Chamber, Felton stepped to the door, and made as if he had held up the Duke in the Hangings. In the passage, the Duke turning to speak to Sir Thomas Fryar, and looking towards Sir Thomas was very short, Felton came behind the Duke, and reaching over Sir Thomas's shoulder, struck him to the heart. Clarendon, Tom. I. p. 24, 25. The Duke was buried at Windsor, Septemb. 28. His whole Estate was not quite 4000 l. a year; but he had 300,000 l. in Jewels; and owed 60,000 l. Huyton on H. Loffe, p. 67.

his death, continual marks of his affection, his creatures remained in the same favour and posts they had enjoyed in the life-time of their protector.

Mean while, as the relief of Rachel could not be delayed any longer, the King sent away the Fleet designed for that purpose (1). But Cardinal Richelieu had used so great diligence, that the Barricado he was making to hinder the approach of the English Ships, was finished, so that the Fleet was forced to return without effecting any thing, after having seen Rachel taken (2).

The meeting of the Parliament appointed to be the 20th of October, was by proclamation prorogued to the 10th of January. In this interval, certain cases happened which supplied the Parliament with a fresh occasion of complaint, and in the end caused their dissolution. Tho' the Remonstrance concerning Tunnage and Poundage was not presented to the King, it was however publick, and sufficient to shew the People what was the sense of the House of Commons. Upon this foundation three merchants among others, refused to pay this duty to the King.

Rollis, one of the three, merchant of London, and Member of the House of Commons, having refused it, as contrary to law, the Customers seized his Goods, and upon his alledging the authority of Parliament, one of the Officers insolently told him, If all the Parliament were in you, we could take your goods. Chambers and Vassal the other two merchants of London, the first of whom was Alderman, were condemned to pay Tunnage and Poundage by the Barons of the Exchequer, who ordered their Goods to be detained.

The Parliament meeting the 10th of January 1623, Rollis's affair was immediately laid before the House, and referred to a Committee. Whilst the Committee were in debate, the King sent a message to the House, willing them to desist till next day in the afternoon, at which time he would speak with them at Whitehall. The Lords having also received orders to be present, the King made the following Speech to both Houses.

"THE care I have to remove all obstacles that may hinder the good correspondency between me and this Parliament, is the cause I have called you together at this time, the particular occasion being a complaint made in the lower House. And for you, my Lords, I am glad to take this, and all other occasions, whereby you may clearly understand both my words, and actions, for as you are nearest in degree, so you are the fittest witnesses unto Kings.

"The complaint I speak of is, for slaying men's Goods that deny Tunnage and Poundage; this may have an easy and short conclusion, if my words and actions be rightly understood: For by passing the Bill, as my Ancestors have had it, my by-past actions will be included, and my future proceedings authorized, which certainly would not have been slack on, if men had not imagined that I had taken these duties as appertaining to my hereditary Prerogative, in which they are much deceived, for it ever was and still is my meaning, by the gift of my People to enjoy it, and my intention in my Speech at the ending of the last Session concerning this point, was not to challenge Tunnage and Poundage as of right, but de bene esse, shewing you the necessity, not the right by which I was to take it, until you had granted it to me, assuring my self, according to your general professions, you wanted time, not will to give it me.

"Wherefore now having opportunity, I expect that without loss of time you make good your professions, and so by passing a Bill, put an end to all the questions arising from this subject; especially since I have cleared the only scruple that can trouble you in this business: To conclude, let us not be jealous one of the other's actions; for if I had been easily moved at every occasion, the order you made on Wednesday last might have made me startle, there being some shew to suspect that you had given your selves the liberty to be the inquisitors after complaints (the words of your order being somewhat too largely penned) but looking into your actions, I find you only hear complainers, not seeking complaints: For I am certain you neither pretend, nor desire the liberty to be inquisitors of mens actions before particular complaint be made.

"This I have spoken to shew you how slow I am to believe harshly of your proceedings, likewise to assure you, that the Houses resolutions, not particular mens Speeches, shall make me judge well or ill, not doubting, but according to my example, you will be deaf to ill

"reports concerning me, till my words and actions speak for themselves, that so this Session beginning with confidence one towards another, it may end with a perfect good understanding between us: Which God grant."

Some days after the King sent a message to the Commons, that the Bill for Tunnage and Poundage might be speedily taken into consideration, and no time lost. But the Commons not thinking the King had power to prescribe the time to them, fell upon matters of Religion, particularly with regard to Arminianism: and finding that Laud, Montague, and Manwaring had been preferred since the last session, several Members made great complaints. Though the King pressed them again by message to proceed with the Bill for Tunnage and Poundage, they pretended that Religion ought to have the precedence of all other affairs. Wherefore they began to inquire how the execution of the laws against Papists came to cease, and whence it was that Papists were employed and countenanced, and new ceremonies continually introduced, especially at Durham, by Dr. Cosins, as Angels, Saints, Crucifixes, Altars, Candles on Candlemas-day, and lastly, from whence proceeded the increase of Arminianism.

This inquiry was interrupted by a fresh message from the King, requiring them to give the preference to the bill for Tunnage and Poundage. Nevertheless he declared, that he meant not to interrupt their debates upon matters of Religion, provided the House would not meddle with what did not belong to them. By that, he took away with one hand what he gave with the other, since he believed, the Commons had no right to meddle with Religion.

This message hindered them not from continuing their debates. The Proclamation forbidding all disputes for and against Arminianism was complained of particularly, wherein it was said, If there be any difference of opinion concerning the reasonable interpretation of the Thirty-nine Articles, the Bishops have power to order which way they please. But as some of the Bishops were suspected, it was concluded, that by the terms of the Proclamation, the Kingdom would be obliged to receive Popery or Arminianism, by following the determinations of the Bishops. These Suspicions fell chiefly upon Laud and Nile, who being the King's counsellors for matters of Religion, governed almost all the other Bishops. Upon this account, the House, to prevent the dangers they feared, thought fit to enter into this vow:

We the Commons in Parliament assembled, do claim, protest, and avow for truth, the sense of the Articles of Religion, which were established by Parliament in the thirteenth year of our late Queen Elizabeth, which by the publick Act of the Church of England, and by the general and current explications of the writers of our Church, have been delivered unto us. And we reject the sense of the Jesuits and Arminians, and all others, wherein they differ from us.

As the intention of the Commons was to perfwade people that Religion was in danger, they desired the concurrence of the Lords to petition the King for a Fast, which they obtained with some difficulty. The King plainly perceived the design of this Petition, and, though he did not think fit to reject it, answered, that the custom of fasting every Session was but lately begun; that he granted it however for this time, though he did not see the necessity of it; but for the future would not grant a Fast, except on extraordinary occasions. Adding, that as for the defence of the reformed Churches abroad, Fighting would do them more good than Fasting.

As the King had frequently pressed the Commons to proceed with the Bill for Tunnage and Poundage, and give it the precedence of matters of Religion, they thought themselves obliged to present a Declaration to the King to justify their Conduct.

This Declaration, which was a sort of apology, containing nothing material, I do not think it necessary to insert it at length. It suffices to say, the Commons excused themselves two ways, for not giving precedence to the Bill for Tunnage and Poundage. The first was, because matters of Religion having been first proposed, the constant order of the House required, they should have the preference. The second was, the weight and importance of the concerns of Religion. They concluded with thanking the King for his promises, to maintain Religion, thereby tacitly reproaching him for not performing them.

The King answered this Declaration, not particularly, but with some short notes. He told them, he thought it strange they should have an ill opinion of him with respect to Religion. He assured them, that he would never stop his ears to the complaints that should be brought to him upon that 1628-9. subject, provided that in form and matter the Commons did not transgress their limits. Concluding with these words: I must still be instant with you, that you proceed with Tunnage and Poundage with diligence; (not looking to be denied in so just a desire) that you must not think it strange, if I, finding you slack, give you such farther quickning as I shall find cause.

After this, the Commons continued their debates upon matters of Religion, and particularly on the Proclamation, to prohibit disputing for or against Arminianism. This was pretended to be a snare to suppress the Puritan-party, and give the Arminians more liberty, and that Laud and Montague had given the King this advice. It was also complained, that the enemies of Religion had procured a Royal pardon under the Great Seal for four Ecclesiasticks, the most suspected in England, namely, Montague, Cosins, Sibborth, and Manwaring; and that, in contempt of the Parliament, they were even promoted to Bishopricks, or other good Benefices (1). I confess I cannot conceive how it is possible to justify the King's condescension for those, who advised him to protect so openly, nay, to prefer men so odious to the Parliament, since he could not be ignorant how much he rendered himself suspected by such a conduct. At least it cannot be denied that he gave his enemies an advantage. But besides that it was the genius of the King and Court to look upon the Parliament, and especially the Commons, with extreme contempt, the King could refuse nothing to Dr. Laud, who was his prime Counsellor in Ecclesiastical affairs. To confirm the Commons in their suspicions of Laud, the Printers and Booksellers of London presented several petitions, complaining of the restraint of Books written against Popery and Arminianism, whilst a license was never refused to such as were composed in favour of Popish and Arminian doctrines. They even instanced in certain Books against Popery, which were denied to be licensed. They affirmed, this was done by the Bishop of London, or his Chaplains, to whom the examination of the Books was committed.

As Dr. Laud, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, made a very great figure in England during the first fifteen years of this reign, I do not think it improper to relate here part of what is said for and against him. Not that I pretend fully to make known his genius, his character, his religion: This to me seems impracticable, considering what opposite opinions there are concerning him, it being almost impossible to affirm any thing of him, good or bad, upon the testimony of some, but what is contradicted and rejected as false by others. This is the common effect of Parties. Hardly can any thing be added to the encomiums which those who profess what they call High-Church, that is, the rigid Episcopalians, bestow on this famous Bishop. The Lord Clarendon, in his History, expresses, on all occasions, a great esteem for Laud, and finds no other fault in him, but a little too much eagerness to accomplish his undertakings. All the rest of the same Party extol him to the skies. They see no imperfection in him; and every where praise his wisdom, his good sense, his learning, his piety, and above all, his zeal for the Church of England, for which he at last died a Martyr. The Presbyterians, on the contrary, without denying his sense and learning, affirm, he was a rank Arminian, and almost a Papist. They say, that under the colour of a great zeal for the Ceremonies of the Church, he carried them to the borders of Popery, and justly rendered himself suspected of designing by degrees to restore the Romish Religion in England. That to this end he made even the least trifles, such as the Reformers had not meddled with, because they thought them indifferent, to be considered as essential to Religion. They inferred from thence, that it was impossible for a man of his sense, to be attached to things of so little moment, had he not entertained some ill design against the reformed Religion. That he was a mortal enemy of the Presbyterians and Puritans, because from them he met with most opposition to the execution of his projects. For my part, I own, that in all that has been said against him, I have found no convincing proof of his intention to re-establish the Roman Catholic Religion in England, unless we confound, as many did in those days, Popery with High-Church, through a spirit of Party. But it is very certain, he mortally hated the Presbyterians, and would have utterly extirpated Puritanism, had it been in his power.

As for Arminianism, it is very probable, he was greatly inclined to it. See his Character given by his predecessor Archbishop Abbot, in the Narrative which he drew in his own vindication in the year 1627.

"This man is the only inward counsellor with Buck-ingham, sitting with him sometimes privately whole hours, and feeding his humour with malice and spite. His life in Oxford was to pick quarrels of the public Readers, and to advertise them to the then Bishop of Durham, that he might fill the ears of King James with discontents, against the honest men that took pains in their places, and settled the truth (which he called Puritanism) in their auditors. He made it his work to see what Books were in the press, and to look over Epistles Dedictory, and Prefaces to the Reader, to see what faults might be found. It was an observation what a sweet man this was like to be, that the first observable act that he did, was the marrying of the Earl of D. to the Lady R (2), when it was notorious to the world, that she had another husband, and the same a nobleman, who had divers children then living by her. King James did for many years take this so ill, that he would never hear of any great preference of him; inasmuch that the Bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Williams, who took upon him to be the first promoter of him, hath many times said, that when he made mention of Laud to the King, his Majesty was to aver from it, that he was contumacious oftentimes to say, that he would never desire to serve that master, which could not remit one fault unto his servant. Well, in the end he did conquer it, to get him to the Bishoprick of St. David's; which he had not long enjoyed, but he began to undermine his benefactor, as at this day it appeareth. The Countess of Buckingham told Lincoln, that St. David's was the man that undermined him with her Son: And verily, such is his aspiring nature, that he will underwork any man in the world, so that he may gain by it."

This character is not to Laud's advantage; but it must be observed, that the Archbishop ascribed his own disgrace to the secret counsels given by that Prelate to the Duke of Buckingham.

Whilst the Commons were in debate concerning Religion, the ware-house of Mr. Rolls Merchant and Member of Parliament, was locked up by a Pursuivant, and himself called forth and served with a Subpoena (3). This put the House in a flame, and occasioned the sending for the officers of the customs, to know upon what account they had seized the merchants effects, and carried them to the King's Store-house (4). They replied, it was for refusing to pay Tunnage and Poundage, and other duties. But because there was an information already preferred against the merchants in the Exchequer and Star-Chamber, the Commons resolved not to proceed with the Bill of Tunnage and Poundage, till the goods were restored to the owners, and ordered that the Barons of the Exchequer should be told, to make void their injunction concerning the detaining of the merchant's effects (5). The Barons returned answer, that they did not, by their injunctions, determine, or any way touch upon the right of Tunnage and Poundage; neither did they by their orders, bar the owners from suing for their goods in a lawful course; but whereas the merchants endeavoured to take their goods out of the King's possession by writs of Replevin, which was no lawful course in the King's case, nor agreeable to his Prerogative Royal, therefore the Court of Exchequer did stay those suits, and declare, that the owners, if they conceived themselves wronged, might take such remedy as the Law allows. This answer, which signified nothing, not being satisfactory to the Commons, a motion was made to consider, whether ever the Court of Exchequer held this course before, for staying of Replevins; and whether this had been done by Prerogative of the King in his Court of Exchequer.

This affair having been long debated in the House, the officers of the customs were sent for again, and answered, that they acted by virtue of a commission under the Great Seal. One of them said, He had seized the Goods for duties that were due in the time of King James, and that his Majesty had sent for him, and commanded him to make no other answer. Whereupon the House being turned into a

(2) Laud it seems had married Charles Blount Earl of Devonshire to the Lady Rich, Wife of the Earl of Warwick, who was then alive.

(3) The Author says, the Pursuivant sent for Mr. Rolls out, to order him not to touch what was locked up. But this, and some other little mistakes in this and the following Paragraphs, are corrected in the Translation, it not being so easy to do it by way of Note.

(4) It was moved, that the Person that served the Subpoena might be sent for and examined by what procurement it was taken forth. Sir Humphrey May, Privy-Counsellor, assured the House, that this neither proceeded from King nor Council, and therefore desired it might be searched to the bottom. And afterwards, the Attorney General wrote a Letter to Mr. Rolls, telling him, the serving a Subpoena upon him was a mistake. And yet Report was made to the House by the Committee for Tunnage and Poundage, that the Attorney General, notwithstanding his Letter, did give order for the Process against Mr. Rolls.

(5) Chambers, it seems, having sued out a Writ of Replevin, the proper remedy in Law to regain the possession of his Goods; the Barons of the Exchequer did order an Injunction under the Seals of the said Court, directed to the Sheriff of London, commanding them not to execute the said Writ, or any the like, and declaring the Goods were not replevable. Ibidem, p. 642.

1628-9. Grand-Committee, a motion was made and seconded, whether the officers of the custom should be proceeded against, by separating their interest from that of the King. After several Speeches pro and con, a report was made from the Grand-Committee, that they had at last resolved, that Mr. Rolls ought to have privilege of person and goods; which being voted, the Speaker was moved to put the question, but he refused to do it, saying, the King had commanded the contrary. Such a command could not but surprize the House: they adjourned to the 25th of February, and then were farther adjourned by his Majesty's order till the 2d of March. On that day the Commons being met, and requiring the Speaker to put the question, he said, I have a command from the King to adjourn the House till the 10th of March. And endeavouring to go out of the chair, he was held down by force [and the doors were locked] till Sir John Elliot had drawn the following Protestation, which was approved by the majority, though not without great tumult and confusion, and even some blows.

The Commons Protestation.

"1. Whosoever shall bring in innovation of Religion, or by favour or countenance seem to extend or introduce Popery or Arminianism, or other opinion disagreeing from the truth and orthodox Church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this Kingdom and Commonwealth.

"2. Whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking and levying of the subsidies of Tunnage and Poundage, not being granted by Parliament, or shall be an actor or instrument therein, shall be likewise reputed an innovator in the Government, and a capital enemy to the Kingdom and Commonwealth.

"3. If any Merchant or person whatsoever, shall voluntarily yield or pay the said subsidies of Tunnage and Poundage, not being granted by Parliament, he shall likewise be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England, and an enemy to the same."

As the King expected no money from this second session, he was very glad to have, as he thought, a plausible pretence to dissolve the Parliament. So, that very day a Proclamation was drawn up (1), to give notice of his design to dissolve the Parliament on the 10th of March, and that the Members might depart about their own affairs.

The next day, warrants were directed from the Council to Denzil Holles, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir John Elliot, Sir Peter Hayman, John Selden, William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroud, Benjamin Valentine, Esq; commanding their personal appearance on the morrow. Four of them, Holles, Elliot, Coriton, and Valentine, appeared: and refusing to answer out of Parliament, for what was said and done in the House, were committed close prisoners to the Tower. The Council ordered at the same time, the studies of Holles, Elliot, and Selden to be sealed up; and a Proclamation was published to apprehend them. It must be observed that the Parliament not being yet dissolved, these men were still actually Members of Parliament.

On the 10th of March the King coming to the Parliament-House, made the following Speech, addressing himself only to the Lords, there being but few Commons present, [the Speaker and House of Commons not having been called.]

My Lords,

"I Never came here upon so unpleasant an occasion, it being the dissolution of a Parliament; therefore men may have some cause to wonder, why I should not rather chuse to do this by commission, it being rather a general maxim of Kings, to leave harsh commands to their Ministers, themselves only executing pleasing things: yet considering that justice as well consists in reward and praise of virtue, as punishing of vice, I thought it necessary to come here to day, and to declare to you and all the world, that it was merely the undutiful and seditious carriage in the Lower-House that hath made the dissolution of this Parliament; and you, My Lords, are so far from being any causes of it, that I take as much comfort in your dutiful demeanour, as I am justly distasteful with their proceedings; yet to avoid their mistakings, let me tell you, that it is so far from me to adjudge all the House alike guilty, that I know that there are many there as dutiful Subjects as any in the world, it being but some few vipers among them that did cast this mist of undutifulness over most of their eyes: Yet, to say truth, there was a good number there, that could not be infected with this contagion; inasmuch that some did express their duties in speaking, which was the general fault of the House the last day. To conclude, as those vipers must look for their reward of punishment, so you, My Lords, must justly expect from me that favour and protection, that a good King oweth to his loving and faithful Nobility. And now, my Lord-Keeper, do what I have commanded you."

Then the Lord-Keeper said, My Lords, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons, [though the Commons were not called] the King's Majesty doth dissolve this Parliament.

The dissolution of the Parliament was caused by the insolence of the House of Commons, as the King had just told the Lords: and this insolence, this seditious carriage consisted only in keeping the Speaker in his chair by force, after he had notified that the House was adjourned by his Majesty's order, till a Protestation of three very short articles was set down in writing. This was the Commons offence. And here it must be remarked, that there was a great difference between the adjourning and the proroguing or dissolving of the Parliament. The King's power to prorogue and dissolve was never called in question; before the time of James I. I believe no King had ever thought of adjourning the Parliament. King James was the first that did it. The Commons complained of it as a breach of their privileges; but not finding the Lords inclined to dispute this power with the King, they were forced to give way, though they foresaw the ill consequences. These consequences showed themselves in the present Reign. Charles I. taking advantage of this only precedent established by the King his Father, was not satisfied with hindering the Parliament from adjourning themselves at Exeter, as hath been seen, but even adjourned the Houses twice at a time when the Commons were debating upon matters which were not agreeable to him, and also prevented the Speaker, by his sole authority, to put the question when required. It is easy to see the consequences of this power, to adjourn the Houses. The King could put a stop to all the debates of either House, by adjourning them whenever they took into consideration any matters displeasing to him. On the other hand, upon supposition that the King's right was unquestionable, the House of Commons had disobeyed his orders, and violated his prerogative; which might be attended with no less ill consequences. But the King, supposing his right as fully established, without giving himself any farther trouble to prove it, resolved to punish the House of Commons, not only by the dissolution of the Parliament, a punishment which concerned the whole Nation rather than their Representatives, but also in causing some of their most active and stirring Members, to be condemned as rebellious and seditious.

To that end, he commanded the Judges of the Realm to meet and give their opinions upon the questions he had to propose to them, in order to be guided by their determinations, lest he should be accused of proceeding too arbitrarily. The questions, with the Judges answers, were as follows:

1. Whether if any Subject hath received probable information of any Treason, or treacherous attempt, or intention against the King or State, that Subject ought not to make known to the King, or his Majesty's Commissioners, when thereunto he shall be required, what information he hath received, and the grounds thereof; to the end, the King being truly informed, may prevent the danger? And if the said Subject, in such case shall refuse to be examined, or to answer the questions which shall be demanded of him for farther inquiry and discovery of the truth, whether it be not a high contempt in him, punishable in the Star-Chamber, as an offence against the general justice and government of the Kingdom?

Sol. The resolution and answer of all the Justices was, "That it is an offence punishable as aforesaid, so that this do not concern himself, but another, nor draw him to danger of treason or contempt by his answer."

2. Whether it be a good answer or excuse, being thus interrogated, and refusing to answer, to say, That he was a Parliament man when he received this information, and that he spake thereof in the Parliament House; and therefore the Parliament being now ended, he refused to answer to any such Questions but in the Parliament House, and not in any other place?

Sol. The Judges did not venture to decide publicly this question. But they gave this answer by advice privately to the Attorney General, "That this excuse being in nature of a plea, and an error in judgment, was not punishable, until he were over-ruled in an orderly manner, to make another answer; and whether the party were brought in Ore tenus, or by information, for this plea he was not to be punished."

3. Whether a Parliament man, committing an offence against the King or Council, not in a Parliament way, might, after the Parliament ended, be punished or not?

Sol. All the Judges unanimously answered, "He might, if he be not punished for it in Parliament; for the Parliament shall not give privilege to any, contra morem Question concerning the imprisonment of the Members of the House of Commons.

Answer.

(1) The Author says, published; but it was not published till after the 10th of March, Rushworth, Tom. 2. p. 661.

1729.

"Parliamentary, to exceed the bounds and limits of his place and duty. And all agreed, That regularly he cannot be compelled out of Parliament to answer things done in Parliament, in a Parliamentary course; but it is otherwise where things are done exorbitantly, for those are not the acts of a Court."

4. Whether, if one Parliament man alone shall resolve, or two or three shall covertly conspire to raise false rumours and rumours against the Lords of the Council and Judges, not with intent to question them in a legal course, or in a Parliamentary way, but to blast them, and to bring them to hatred of the People, and the Government in contempt, he punishable in the Star-Chamber after the Parliament is ended?

Sol. The Judges resolve, "That the same was punishable out of Parliament, as an offence exorbitant committed in Parliament, beyond the office, and besides the duty of a Parliament man."

The artifice of these questions consisted, 1. In the King's proposing them in a general manner, as if they related not to any particular person. 2. In his ascribing to one, two, or three Members of the House, what was done by a great majority. 3. In supposing offences, outrages, treasons against himself or Council, and in deciding questions of Law before the facts were stated (1).

By virtue of these determinations, the Attorney General exhibited in the Star-Chamber an information against the imprisoned Members, wherein he greatly aggravated what had passed in the Lower House, when the Speaker was kept by force in the chair, but without the least mention of the occasion.

At the same time Alderman Chambers, one of those that refused to pay Tunnage and Poundage, was also prosecuted in the Star-Chamber, for saying, That the Merchants were more fired up and wrong in England, than in Turkey. He was condemned in an exorbitant fine [of 2000*l.*] by which [and some other oppressions] he was reduced to a very low condition.

I have already mentioned the artifice used by the Court, to remove from the Parliament such Gentlemen as they suspected, by making them Sheriffs of their respective Counties, which obliged them to swear to the due execution of their office. Walter Long Esq. of Wiltshire, being made Sheriff of the County a little before the calling of the last Parliament, was however elected [for Bath,] and he preferred this service to that which his office obliged him to. During the sitting of the Parliament, Long was left undisturbed, but after the dissolution, the Court entered an information against him in the Star-Chamber for breaking his oath, [by absenting himself from his County] and he was fined two thousand marks.

The other Members that were in several prisons, having petitioned the Judges to be released upon bail, by virtue of the Habeas Corpus, when the Judges were met, and ready to deliver their opinions, the prisoners were not brought to the Bar according to the rule of Court. Whereupon, Proclamation being made for the bringing them in, the Court was informed, that they were removed to the Tower by the King's own warrant. Then there came a Letter to the Judges from the King, signifying to the Court, that the prisoners were not suffered to appear before them, by reason of their insolent carriage towards him. That is, instead of applying themselves to the King for pardon, they had addressed themselves to the Judges to be released upon bail, according to Law. Not to insist too long upon this affair, I shall content my self with saying, that they were kept in prison from March till October, without being tried, or obtaining the benefit of the Habeas Corpus. In fine, the Court of King's Bench having agreed with one voice, That the Court, as this case is, shall have jurisdiction, though the offences were committed in Parliament, and that the imprisoned Members ought to plead, judgment was given against them upon a Nihil Dicit (2). They were to be imprisoned during the King's pleasure, and moreover, Elliot was fined two thousand pounds, Hollis a thousand marks, and Valentine five hundred pounds.

The King's conduct, as well in dissolving the Parliament, as in what was done afterwards, could not but breed discontent among the People. Murmurs were every where heard: Libels were dispersed about London against the King's Counsellors, and particularly against Bishop Laud (3), and the Lord Treasurer Wilton, who were accused of putting the King upon these violent proceedings. For this reason, the King, to prevent greater complaints, published a Declaration to notify to the People the causes of the dissolution of the last Parliament. Though this declaration be very long, I think it necessary to insert the whole in this place, lest I should be accused of having either passed over in silence, or too much abridged what may serve to justify the King. It must be observed that it was dated the 17th of March, the very day the Parliament was dissolved, though it was not published that day, but some time after.

The King's Declaration, to all his Subjects, notifying the Causes which moved him to dissolve the last Parliament

"Howsoever Princes are not bound to give account of their actions, but to God alone; yet for the satisfaction of the minds and affections of our loving Subjects, we have thought good to set down thus much by way of declaration, that we may appear to the world in the truth and sincerity of our actions, and not in those colours in which we know some turbulent and ill affected spirits (to masque and disguise their wicked intentions, dangerous to the State) would represent us to the publick view.

"We assembled our Parliament the 17th day of March, in the third year of our reign, for the safety of Religion, for securing our Kingdoms and Subjects at home, and our Friends and Allies abroad. And therefore at the first sitting down of it, we declared the miserable afflicted estate of those of the reformed Religion in Germany, France, and other parts of Christendom; the distressed extremities of our dearest uncle, the King of Denmark, chased out of a great part of his Dominions; the strength of that party which was united against us: That (besides the Pope and the House of Austria, and their ancient Confederates) the French King professed the rooting out of the Protestant Religion: That of the Princes and States on our party, some were over-run, others diverted, and some disabled to give assistance. For which, and other important motives, we propounded a speedy supply of treasure, answerable to the necessity of the cause.

"These things in the beginning were well resented by the House of Commons, and with so much alacrity and readiness, that they agreed to grant a liberal aid: but before it was brought to any perfection, they were diverted by a multitude of questions raised amongst them, touching their liberties and privileges, and by other long disputes, that the Bill did not pass in a long time; and by that delay, our affairs were put into a far worse case than at the first; our foreign actions then in hand, being thereby disgraced and ruined for want of timely help.

"In this, as we are not willing to derogate from the merit and good intentions of those wise and moderate men of that House, (to whose forwardness we attribute it, that it was propounded and resolved so soon) so we must needs say, that the delay of passing it when it was refused, occasioned by cauleless jealousies, stirred up by men of another temper, did much lessen both the reputation and reality of that Supply. And their spirit, infused into many of the commissioners and assessors in the Country, hath returned up the Subsidies in such a scanty proportion, as is infinitely short, not only of our great occasions, but of the precedents of former Subsidies, and of the intentions of all well-affected men in that House.

"In those large disputes, as we permitted many of our high Prerogatives to be debated, which in the best times of our predecessors had never been questioned, without punishment or sharp reproof; so we did endeavour to have shortened those debates, for winning of time, which would have much advantaged our great affairs, both at home and abroad. And therefore both by speeches and messages, we did often declare our gracious and clear resolution to maintain, not only the Parliament, but all our People, in their ancient and just liberties, without either violation or diminution, and in the end, for their full satisfaction and security did by an answer, framed in the form by themselves desired to their Parliamentary Petition, confirm their ancient and just liberties and rights, which we resolve with all constancy and justice to maintain.

"This Parliament howsoever, besides the settling our necessary Supply, and their own Liberties, they wasted much time in such proceedings, (blasting our government, as we are unwilling to remember) yet we suffered

(1) Judge Whitlock often highly complained against this way of sending to the Judges for their opinions beforehand, and said, Fear of Bishop Laud was the cause, he would handle a firm, in the Nation. Whitlock, p. 13.
(2) They resolved to ratify what Plex had denying the Jurisdiction of the Court in this case.
(3) Ex. L. de. against Bishop Laud was to this effect: Laud, look to thyself, be assured thy life is sought, thou art a traitor, a villain, a hypocrite, a false man, before thou be taken as of the world; and assure thyself, neither God nor the world will reward thee for a while. Ex. L. de. against the Lord Treasurer Wilton. R. I. p. 684. — They were agreed to move a resolution of the Commons.

1629. " them to sit, until themselves desired us to appoint a time for their recess, not naming either adjournment or prorogation.

" Whereupon by advice of our Council, we resolved to prorogue and make a session; and to that end prefixed a day, by which they might (as was meet in so long a sitting) finish some profitable and good Laws; and withal gave order for a gracious pardon to all our Subjects; which, according to the use of former Parliaments, passed the higher House, and was sent down to the Commons. All which being graciously intended by us, was ill-enterained by some disaffected persons of that House, who by their artifices, in a short time raised so much heat and distemper in the House, for no other visible cause, but because we had declared our resolution to prorogue, as our Council advised, and not to adjourn, as some of that House (after our resolution declared, and not before) did manifest themselves to affect; that seldom hath greater passion been seen in that House, upon the greatest occasions. And some glances in the House, but upon open rumours abroad were spread. That by the answer to the petition we had given away, not only our impositions upon Goods exported and imported, but the Tunnage and Poundage, (whereas in the debate and hammering of that Petition, there was no speech or mention in either House concerning those impositions, but concerning taxes and other charges within the land: much less was there any thought thereby to debar us of Tunnage and Poundage, which, both before and after the answer to that petition, the House of Commons in all their speeches and treaties, did profess they were willing to grant.) And at the same time many other misinterpretations were raised of that petition and answer, by men not well-distinguishing between well-ordered liberty and licentiousness; as if by our answer to that petition, we had let loose the reins of our Government. And in this distemper the House of Commons, laying aside the pardon (a thing never done in any former Parliament) and other business, fit to have been concluded in that session, some of them went about to frame and contrive a Remonstrance against our receiving of Tunnage and Poundage, which was so far proceeded in, the night before the prefixed time, for concluding the session, and so hastened by the contrivers thereof, that they meant to have put it to the vote of the House the next morning, before we should prorogue that session. And therefore, finding our gracious favours in the session, afforded to our people, so ill required, and such sinister strains made upon our answer to that petition, to the diminution of our profit, and (which was more) to the danger of our government: We resolved to prevent the finishing of that Remonstrance, and other dangerous intentions of some ill-affected persons, by ending the session the next morning, some few hours sooner than was expected; and by our own mouth to declare to both Houses the cause thereof: and for hindering the spreading of those sinister interpretations of that petition and answer, to give some necessary directions, for settling and quieting our government, until another meeting; which we performed accordingly the six and twentieth of June last.

" The Session thus ended, and the Parliament risen, that intended Remonstrance gave us occasion to look into the business of Tunnage and Poundage. And therefore, though our necessities pleaded strongly for us, yet we were not apt to strain that point too far, but resolved to guide our self by the practice of former ages, and examples of our most noble predecessors, thinking those Councils best warranted, which the wisdom of former ages, concurring with the present occasions, did approve; and therefore gave order for a diligent search of Records: Upon which it was found, that although in the Parliament holden in the first year of the reign of King Edward the fourth, the Subsidy of Tunnage and Poundage was not granted unto that King, but was first granted unto him by Parliament in the third year of his reign; yet the same was accounted and answered to that King, from the first day of his reign, all the first and second years of his reign, and until it was granted by Parliament. And that in the succeeding times of King Richard the third, King Henry the seventh, King Henry the eighth, King Edward the sixth, Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth, the Subsidy of Tunnage and Poundage was not only enjoyed by every of those Kings and Queens, from the death of each of them deceasing, until it was granted by Parliament unto the successor; but in all those times, being for the most part peaceable, and not burdened with like charges and necessities, as these modern times,) the Parliament did most readily and cheerfully, in the beginning of every of those reigns, grant the same, as a thing most necessary for the guarding of the seas, safety and defence of No. LVIII. Vol. II.

" the realm, and supportation of the Royal dignity. And in the time of our Royal Father of blessed memory, he enjoyed the same a full year, wanting very few days, before his Parliament began; and above a year before the Act of Parliament for the grant of it was passed. And yet when the Parliament was assembled, it was granted without difficulty. And in our own time, we quietly received the same three years and more, expecting with patience in several Parliaments the like grant thereof, as had been made to so many of our predecessors; the House of Commons still professing, that multitude of other businesses, and not want of willingness on their part, had caused the settling thereof to be so long deferred. And therefore finding so much reason and necessity for the receiving of the ordinary duties in the Custom-house, to concur with the practice of such a succession of Kings and Queens, famous for wisdom, justice and government, and nothing to the contrary, but that intended Remonstrance, hatched out of the passionate brains of a few particular persons; we thought it was so far from the wisdom and duty of a House of Parliament, as we could not think that any moderate and discreet man (upon composed thoughts, settling aside passion and distemper) could be against receiving of Tunnage and Poundage; especially since we do, and still must pursue those ends, and undergo that charge for which it was first granted to the Crown; it having been so long and constantly continued to our predecessors, as that in four several Acts of Parliament, for the granting thereof to King Edward the sixth, Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth, and our blessed Father, it is expressed terms mentioned, to have been had and enjoyed by the several Kings, named in those Acts, time out of mind, by authority of Parliament. And therefore upon these reasons we held it agreeable to our Kingly honour, and necessary for the safety and good of our Kingdom, to continue the receipt thereof, as so many of our predecessors had done. Wherefore when a few merchants (being at first but one or two) fomented, as it is well known, by those evil spirits that would have hatched that unprofitable Remonstrance, began to oppose the payment of our accustomed duties in the Custom-house, we gave order to the officers of our Customs to go on, notwithstanding that opposition, in the receiving of the usual duties, and caused those that refused to be warned to attend at the Council-board, that by the wisdom and authority of our Council, they might be reduced to obedience and duty; where some of them, without reverence or respect to the honour and dignity of that presence, behaved themselves with such boldness and insolency of speech, as was not to be endured by a far meaner assembly, much less to be countenanced by a House of Parliament, against the body of our Privy-Council.

" And as in this we did, what in reason and honour was fit for the present, so our thoughts were daily inventive upon the re-assembling of our Parliament, with full intention on our part, to take away all ill-understanding between us, and our people; whose loves, as we desire to continue and preserve, so we used our best endeavours to prepare and facilitate the way to it. And to this end, having taken a strict and exact survey of our Government, both in the Church and Commonwealth, and what things were most fit and necessary to be reformed: We found in the first place, that much exception had been taken at a Book, entitled, Appello Cæsarem, or, An Appeal to Cæsar; and published in the year 1625, by Richard Montague, then Batchelor of Divinity, and now Bishop of Chichester; and because it did open the way to those schisms and divisions, which have since ensued in the Church, we did for remedy and redress thereof, and for the satisfaction of the consciences of our good people, not only by our publick Proclamation, call in that Book, which ministered matter of offence; but to prevent the like danger for hereafter, re-printed the Articles of Religion, established in the time of Queen Elizabeth of famous memory; and by a declaration before those Articles, we did tie and restrain all opinions to the sense of those Articles, that nothing might be left for private fancies and innovations. For we call God to record, before whom we stand, that it is, and always hath been our heart's desire, to be found worthy of that title, which we account the most glorious in all our Crown, Defender of the Faith. Neither shall we ever give way to the authorising of any thing, whereby any innovation may steal or creep into the Church; but to preserve that unity of doctrine and discipline established in the time of Queen Elizabeth, whereby the Church of England hath stood and flourished ever since.

" And as we were careful to make up all breaches and rents in Religion at home, so did we by our Proclamations "against Priests and popish Recufants, fortify all ways and "approaches againſt that foreign enemy; which if it hath "not ſucceeded according to our intention, we muſt lay

"the fault where it is, in the ſubordinate officers and mi-
"niſters in the Country, by whoſe remiſſineſs, Jeſuits and "Priests eſcape without apprehenſion; and Recufants, "from theſe convictions and penalties which the Law and
"our Commandment would have inflicted on them. For
"we do profeſs, that as it is our duty, ſo it ſhall be our "care to command and direct well; but it is the part of "others to perform the miniſterial office. And when we "have done our office, we ſhall account ourſelves, and all
"charitable men will account us innocent, both to God and "Men. And thoſe that are negligent, we will eſteem as "culpable both to God and us; and therefore will expect "that hereafter they give us a better account.

"And as we have been careful for the ſettling of Reli"gion, and quieting the Church; ſo were we not unminiſ-
"terial of the preſervation of the juſt and ancient Liberties
"of our Subjects, which we ſecured to them by our gra"cious answer to the Petition in Parliament, having not
"ſince that time done any act whereby to infringe them.
"But our care is, and hereafter ſhall be, to keep them
"intire and inviolable, as we would do our own Right
"and Sovereignty, having for that purpoſe enrolled the "petition and answer in our Courts of Juſtice.

"Next to the care of Religion, and of our Subjects
"rights, we did our beſt for the provident and well-order"ing of that aid and ſupply, which was granted us the
"laſt Seſſion, whereof no part hath been waſtfully ſpent,
"nor put to any other uſe, than thoſe for which it was "deſired and granted; as upon payment of our Fleet and
"Army; wherein our care hath been ſuch, as we choſe
"rather to diſcontent our deareſt Friends and Allies, and
"our neareſt Servants, than to leave our Soldiers and Ma"riners unfatiſfied, whereby any vexation or diſquiet
"might ariſe to our people. We have alſo, with part "of thoſe moneys, begun to ſupply our Magazines, and "Stores of munition, and to put our Navy into a con-
"ſtant form and order. Our Fleet likewiſe is fitting,
"and almoſt in a readineſs, whereby the narrow Seas may "be guarded, Commerce maintained, and our Kingdom
"ſecured from all foreign attempts. Theſe acts of ours
"might have made this impreſſion in all good minds, that "we were careful to direct our counſels, and diſpoſe our "actions, as might moſt conduce to the maintenance of "Religion, honour of our Government, and ſafety of our "People. But with miſchievous men once ill-affected,
"ſeu bene, ſeu male juſta preſunt; and whatſoever once
"ſeemed amiſs, is ever remembered; but good endeavours
"are never regarded.

"Now all theſe things, that were the chief complaints
"the laſt Seſſion, being by our princely care ſo ſeriously
"reformed, the Parliament re-aſſembled the 20th of Ja"nuary laſt. We expected, according to the candour and "ſincerity of our own thoughts, that men would have "framed themſelves for the affecting of a right under"ſtanding between us and our people. But ſome few "malevolent perſons, like empericks and leud artiſts, did
"ſtrive to make new work, and to have ſome diſeaſe on "foot, to keep themſelves in requeſt, and to be employed "and entertained in the cure. And yet to manifeſt how "much offences have been diminiſhed, the Committees
"for Grievances, Committees for Courts of Juſtice, and "Committees for Trade, have, ſince the ſitting down of "the Parliament, received few complaints, and thoſe ſuch
"as they themſelves have not thought to be of that mo"ment or importance, with which our ears ſhould be ac"quainted.

"No ſooner therefore was the Parliament ſet down, but
"theſe ill-affected men began to prrow and diſperſe their jea-
"louſies, by caſting out ſome glances and doubtful ſpeeches,
"as if the Subject had not been ſo clearly and well dealt "with, touching their Liberties, and touching the Peti"tion answered the laſt Parliament. This being a plau-"ſible theme, thought on for an ill purpoſe, eaſily took "hold on the minds of many, that knew not the prac"tice. And thereupon the ſecond day of the Parliament,
"a Committee was appointed to ſearch, whether the peti"tion and our answer thereunto were enrolled in the Par"liament-roll, and in the Courts at Wyſminſter, and in "what manner the ſame was done. And a day alſo was "then appointed, on which, the Houſe being reſolved
"into a Committee, ſhould take into conſideration thoſe
"things, wherein the Liberty of the Subject had been in"vaded, againſt the Petition of Right. This, though it "produced no other effect of moment or importance, yet
"was ſufficient to raiſe a jealouſy againſt our proceedings,
"in ſuch as were not well acquainted with the ſincerity
"and cleareneſs of them. There followed another of no
"leſs ſkill; for altho' our proceeding before the Parliament, about matters of Religion, might have ſatiſfied

"any moderate men, of our zealous care thereof, (as "we are ſure it did the moſt) yet, as bad ſtomachs turn
"the beſt things into their own nature, for want of good
"digefion; ſo theſe diſtempered perſons have done the "like of our good intents, by a bad and ſiniſter inter"pretation: For, when they did obſerve, that many honeſt
"and religious minds in that Houſe did complain of theſe
"dangers that did threaten the Church; they likewiſe
"took the ſame word in their mouth, and their cry like-"wiſe was, Templum Domini, Templum Domini, when "the true care of the Church never came into their "hearts: And what the one did out of zeal unto Religion,
"the other took up as a plauſible theme, to deprave our "Government, as if we, our Clergy and Council, were "either ſenſeleſs or careleſs of Religion, and this wicked
"practice hath been, to make us ſeem to walk before our "people, as if we halted before God.

"Having, by theſe artifices, made a jealous impreſſion
"in the hearts of many; and a day being appointed to "treat of the grant of Tunnage and Poundage, at the "time prefixed, all expreſs great willingneſs to grant it.
"But a new ſtrain is found out, that it could not be done
"without great peril to the right of the Subject, unleſs
"we ſhould diſclaim any right therein, but by grant in "Parliament; and ſhould cauſe all thoſe goods to be re-
"ſtored, which, upon commandment from us, or our
"Council, were ſtayed by our officers until thoſe duties
"were paid, and conſequently ſhould put ourſelves out "of the poſſeſſion of the Tunnage and Poundage, before they "were granted; for elſe, it was pretended, the Subject
"ſtood not in fit caſe to grant it. A fancy and cavil
"raiſed of purpoſe to trouble the buſineſs; it being evident,
"that all the Kings before named did receive that duty,
"and were in actual poſſeſſion of it, before, and at the "very time when it was granted to them by Parliament.
"And altho' we, to remove all difficulties, did from "our own mouth, in theſe clear and open terms, that "might have ſatiſfied any moderate and well-diſpoſed
"minds, declare, that it was our meaning, by the gift of "our people, to enjoy it; and that we did not challenge
"it of right, but took it de bene eſſe, ſhewing thereby,
"not the right, but the neceſſity by which we were to "take it, (wherein we defended, for their ſatiſfaction,
"ſo far beneath ourſelves, as we are confident never any of "our predeceſſors did the like, or was the like ever re"quired or expected from them.) Yet for all this, the "Bill of Tunnage and Poundage was laid aſide, upon pre-
"ſentence, they muſt firſt clear the right of the Subject there-
"in; under colour whereof, they entertain the complaints,
"not only John Reller, a Member of their Houſe, but
"alſo of Richard Chambers, John Fokes, and Bartholo"mew Gilmar, againſt the officers of our Cuſtoms, for "detaining their goods, upon refusal to pay the ordinary "duty, accuſtomed to be paid for the ſame. And upon
"theſe complaints, they fend for the officers of the Cul-
"toms, enforcing them to attend day after day, by the "ſpace of a month together; they cauſe them to produce "their Letters Patents under our Great Seal, and the "warrants made by our Privy-Council, for levying of "theſe duties. They examine the officers upon what
"queſtions they pleaſe, thereby to entrap them for doing
"our ſervice and commandment. In theſe and other their "proceedings, becauſe we would not give the leaſt ſhew
"of interruption, we endured long with much patience,
"both theſe and ſundry other ſtrange and exorbitant in-
"croachments and uſurpations, ſuch as were never before
"attempted in that Houſe.

"We are not ignorant how much that Houſe hath of "late years endeavoured to extend their privileges, by ſet-
"ting up general Committees for Religion, for Courts of "Juſtice, for Trade, and the like; a courſe never had
"until of late: So as, where in former times the Knights
"and Burgeſſes were wont to communicate to the Houſe
"ſuch buſineſs as they brought from their Countries; now
"there are ſo many chairs erected, to make enquiry upon
"all ſorts of men, where complaints of all ſorts are en"tertained, to the uſurferable diſturbance and ſcandal of "Juſtice and Government, which having been tolerated
"a while by our Father and ourſelves, hath daily grown to "more and more height; inſomuch that young Lawyers
"fitting there, take upon them to decry the opinions of "the Judges; and ſome have not doubted to maintain,
"That the reſolutions of that Houſe muſt bind the Judges;
"a thing never heard of in ages paſt. But, in this laſt
"aſſembly of Parliament, they have taken on them much "more than ever before.

"They ſent meſſengers to examine our Attorney Ge"neral, (who is an officer of truſt and ſecrecy) touching
"the execution of ſome commands, out of our ſight, of which
"without our leave firſt obtained, he was not to give ac"count to any but ourſelves. This ſeems a capricious and
"reſolute

1629. "rectory message to the Lord-Treasurer, Chancellor, and Barons of the Exchequer, touching some judicial proceedings of theirs in our Court of Exchequer.

"They sent messengers to examine upon sundry questions, our two Chief-Justices, and three other of our Judges, touching their judicial proceedings at the goal-delivery at Newgate, of which they are not accountable to the House of Commons.

"And whereas suits were commenced in our Court of Star-Chamber, against Richard Chambers, John Foukes, Bartholomew Gilman, and Richard Philips, by our Attorney-General, for great misdemeanors; they resolved that they were to have privilege of Parliament against us for their persons, for no other cause, but because they had petitions depending in that House; and (which is more strange) they resolved that a signification should be made from that House by a letter, to issue under the hand of their Speaker, unto the Lord-Keeper of our Great-Seal, that no attachment should be granted out against the said Chambers, Foukes, Gilman, or Philips, during their said privilege of Parliament. Whereas it is far above the power of that House, to give directions to any of our Courts at Westminster, to stop attachments against any man, though never so strongly privileged; the breach of privilege being not in the Court that grants, but in the party or minister that puts in execution such attachments. And therefore, if any such letter had come to the Lord-Keeper, as it did not, he should have highly offended us if he had obeyed it. Nay, they went so far, as they spared not the honour of our Council-board, but examined their proceedings in the case of our Customers, interrogating what this or that man of our Council said, in direction of them in the business committed to their charge. And when one of the Members of that House, speaking of our Counsellors, said, we had wicked Council; and another said, That the Council and Judges fought to trample under feet the liberty of the Subject; and a third traduced our Court of Star-Chamber, for the sentence given against Savage, they passed without check or censure by the House. By which may appear how far the Members of that House have of late swollen beyond the rules of moderation, and the modesty of former times; and this under pretence of privilege and freedom of Speech, whereby they take liberty to declare against all authority of Council and Courts at their pleasure.

"They sent for our Sheriff of London, to examine him in a cause whereof they had no jurisdiction: their true and ancient jurisdiction extending only to their own Members, and to the conservation of their privileges, and not to the censure of foreign persons and causes, which have no relation to their privileges, the same being but a late innovation. And yet upon an enforced strain of a contempt for not answering to their satisfaction, they commit him to the Tower of London, using that outward pretext for a cause of committing him, the true and inward cause being, for that he had shewed himself dutiful to us and our commandments, in the matter concerning our customs.

"In these innovations (which we will never permit again) they pretended indeed our service; but their drift was, to break, by this means, thro' all respects and ligaments of Government, and to erect an universal over-swaying power to themselves, which belongs only to us, and not to them.

"Lastly, In their proceedings against our Customers; they went about to censure them as delinquents, and to punish them, for staying some goods of some factious Merchants, in our store-house, for not paying those duties which themselves had formerly paid, and which the Customers, without interruption, had received of all other Merchants, many years before, and to which they were authorized, both by our Great-Seal, and by several directions and commandments from us and our Privy-Council.

"To give some colour to their proceedings herein, they went about to create a new privilege, (which we will never admit) That a Parliament-man hath privilege for his goods against the King; the consequence whereof would be, That he may not be constrained to pay any duties to the King, during the time of privilege of Parliament. It is true, they would have this cause to have been between the Merchants, and our Farmers of our customs, and have severed them from our interest and commandment, thereby the rather to make them liable to the censure and punishment of that House. But on the other side, we holding it both unjust and dishonourable, to withdraw our self from our officers, in any thing they did by our commandment, or to disavow any thing that we had enjoined to be done; upon Monday the 23d of February, sent a message unto them by Secretary Coke, thanking him for the respect they 1629. "had shewed, in severing the interest of our Farmers from our own interest and commandment. Nevertheless, we were bound in honour to acknowledge a truth, that, what was done by them, was done by our express commandment and direction; and if for doing thereof our Farmers should suffer, it would highly concern us in honour. Which message was no sooner delivered unto them, but in a tumultuous and discontented manner they called, adjourn, adjourn; and thereupon, without any cause given on our part, in a very unusual manner, adjourned until the Wednesday following.

"On which day, by the uniform wisdom of our Privy-Council, we caused both Houses to be adjourned until the second day of March; hoping that in the mean time, a better and more right understanding might be begotten between us and the Members of that House, whereby the Parliament might come to an happy issue.

"But understanding by good advertisement, that their discontent did not in that time digest and pass away; we resolved to make a second adjournment until the tenth of March; which was done, as well to take time to our self, to think of some means to accommodate those difficulties, as to give them time to advise better; and accordingly, we gave commandment for a second adjournment in both Houses, and for cessation of all business till the day appointed; which was very dutifully obeyed in the Higher-House, no man contradicting or questioning it. But when the same commandment was delivered in the House of Commons by their Speaker, it was straightways contradicted, and although the Speaker declared unto them, it was an absolute right and power in us to adjourn, as well as to prorogue or dissolve; and declared and read unto them divers precedents of that House, to warrant the same; yet our commandment was most contemptuously disobeyed; and some rising up to speak, said, They had business to do before the House should be adjourned.

Here the King inserted a long account of what passed in the House, when the Speaker was kept by force in the chair, whilst the Remonstrance was drawing. This account is much aggravated, being taken word for word from the Attorney-General's information against Elliot. But it contains in substance no more than what hath been said before.

"Whilst the Duke of Buckingham lived, he was entitled to all the distempers and ill-events of former Parliaments; and therefore much endeavour was used to demolish him, as the only wall of separation between us and our people. But now he is dead, no alteration was found among those envenomed spirits, which troubled then the blessed harmony between us and our Subjects, and continue still to trouble it. For now, under the pretence of publick care of the Common-wealth, they suggest new and causeless fears, which in their own hearts they know to be false; and devise new engines of mischief, so to cast a blindness upon the good affections of our people, that they may not see the truth and largeness of our heart towards them. So that now it is manifest, the Duke was not alone the mark these men shot at, but was only as a near minister of ours, taken up, on the bye, and in their passage to their more secret designs; which were only to cast our affairs into a desperate condition, to abate the powers of our Crown, and to bring our Government into obloquy; that in the end all things may be overwhelmed with anarchy and confusion.

"We do not impute these disasters to the whole House of Commons, knowing that there were amongst them many religious, grave, and well-minded men; but the sincerer and better part of the House was overborn, by the practices and clamours of the other, who careless of their duties, and taking advantage of the times, and our necessities, have enforced us to break off this meeting; which had it been answered with like duty on their parts, as it was invited and begun with love on ours, might have proved happy and glorious, both to us and this whole Nation.

"We have thus declared the manifold causes we had to dissolve this Parliament, whereby all the world may see how much they have forgotten their former engagements at the entry into the war, themselves being persuaders to it; promising to make us feared by our enemies, and esteemed by our friends. And how they turned the necessities grown by that war, to enforce us to yield to conditions incompatible with Monarchy.

"And now that our people may discern that these provocations of evil men (whose punishments we reserve to a due time) have not changed our good intentions to our Subjects, we do here profess to maintain the true Religion and Doctrine established in the Church of England, without admitting or conniving at any back-sliding, either to Popery or Schism. We do also declare, That we will maintain the antient and just rights and liberties 1629. "liberties of our Subjects, with so much constancy and justice, that they shall have cause to acknowledge, That under our Government and gracious protection, they live in a more happy and free estate than any Subjects in the Christian world. Yet let no man hereby take the boldness to abuse that liberty, turning it to licentiousness, nor misinterpret the petition, by perverting it to a lawless liberty, wantonly or frowardly, under that or any other colour, to resist lawful and necessary authority. For as we will maintain our Subjects in their just liberties, so we do and will expect, that they yield as much submission and duty to our royal prerogatives, and as ready obedience to our authority and commandments, as hath been performed to the greatest of our predecessors.

"And for our ministers, we will not that they be terrified by those harsh proceedings, that have been strained against some of them. For as we will not command any thing unjust or dishonourable, but shall use our Authority and Prerogatives for the good of our people; so we will expect, that our ministers obey us, and they shall assure themselves we will protect them.

"As for our Merchants, we let them know, we shall always endeavour to cherish and enlarge the Trade of such as be dutiful, without burdening them beyond what is fitting: But the duty of five in the hundred, for guarding of the Seas, and defence of the Realm, to which we hold ourselves still obliged, (and which duty hath continued without interruption so many successions of ages) we hold no good or dutiful Subject will deny it, being so necessary for the good of the whole Kingdom. And if any factious Merchant will affront us, in a thing so reasonable, and wherein we require no more, nor in no other manner, than so many of our predecessors have done, and have been dutifully obeyed: Let them not deceive themselves, but be assured, that we shall find honorable and just means to support our estate, vindicate our Sovereignty, and preserve the authority which God hath put into our hands.

"And now having laid down the truth and clearness of our proceedings, all wise and discreet men may easily judge of those rumours, and jealous fears, that are maliciously and wickedly bruited abroad, and may discern by examination of their own hearts, whether (in respect of the free passage of the Gospel, indifferent and equal administration of justice, freedom from oppression, and the great peace and quietness which every man enjoyeth under his own vine and fig-tree) the happiness of this Nation can be paralleled by any of our neighbour-Countries; and if not, then to acknowledge their own blessedness, and for the same be thankful to God, the author of all goodness."

This Declaration, or rather Apology, produced not the effect, the King expected. It was very difficult for the King to persuade the People, that a dozen Members of Parliament had formed a project to subvert the Government, to introduce Anarchy, to usurp the Royal Authority, without any appearance of the least advantage to themselves or others. It would have been still more strange, that supposing the King so just a Prince, and so tender of his People, as he desired to be thought, these men should have had sufficient credit, to bring over the majority of the Commons to their sentiments. On the other hand, the King defended himself very weakly, in his Declaration, on the articles concerning Recusants, Tunnage and Poundage, and in general, on the causes of the dissolution of the Parliament. For in aggravating the Commons fault, in not instantly obeying the adjournment, he not only supposed his power incontestable, though it was not so, but also omitted the immediate cause of their non-compliance; namely, the Speaker's refusal, by his express command, to put the question, which was a manifest breach of the freedom of Parliament. Complaints therefore and murmurs continued more than ever, notwithstanding this apology. It was publicly said, the King intended utterly to destroy the privileges of the Parliament, and the liberties of the People; and what was done afterwards against the imprisoned Members, helped not to undeceive the Nation. It was added, that Trade was ruined, and Religion in danger, and that the Kingdom was going to be invaded, if these mischiefs were not redressed by a new Parliament. The King being informed of these rumours, published a Proclamation to this effect:

"THAT, notwithstanding his Majesty's late Declaration, for satisfying the minds and affections of his loving Subjects, some ill-disposed persons do spread false and pernicious rumours abroad, as if the scandalous

"and seditious proposition in the House of Commons, made by an outlawed man, desperate in mind and fortune, and tumultuously taken up by some few, after that, by his Majesty's royal authority, he had commanded their adjournment, had been the vote of the whole House, and that the same proposition, being then decreed by the wisest and best affected, and since disavowed, upon examination, by such as were suspected to have consented thereto, and affirmed, as well by them, as others who served in the House that day, to be a th...

"be so, by those impressions which this false rumour hath made in mens minds, whereby, out of carelesse fears, the Trade of the Kingdom is disturbed, and Merchants discouraged to continue their wonted traffick. His Majesty hath thought it expedient, not only to manifest the truth thereof, but to make known his royal pleasure; that those who raise or nourish false reports, shall be severely punished; and such as cheerfully go on with their Trade, have all good encouragement; not purposing to over-charge his Subjects by any new burthens, but to satisfy himself with those duties that were received by the King his Father of blessed memory, which his now Majesty neither can, nor will dispense withal; but shall esteem them unworthy of his protection who shall deny the same, his Majesty intending to employ it for the defence of his Kingdom, dominion of the Seas, and safeguard of the Merchants, especially by such shipping as are now making ready, and such further preparations for aid of his friends and allies, as need shall require. And whereas for several ill ends, the calling again of a Parliament is divulged, howsoever his Majesty hath shewed by his frequent meeting with his People, his love to the use of Parliaments; yet the late abuse having for the present driven his Majesty unwillingly out of that course, he shall account it presumption for any to prescribe any time to his Majesty for Parliaments; the calling, continuing, and dissolving of which, is always in the King's own power. And his Majesty shall be more inclinable to meet in Parliament again, when his People shall see more clearly into his intents and actions; when such as have bred this interruption shall receive their condign punishment, and those who are misled by them, and by such ill reports as are raised upon this occasion, shall come to a better understanding of his Majesty and themselves."

About this time appeared a Writing, entitled, A Proposition for his Majesty's service, to bridle the impertinency of Parliaments. Very probably, if this writing had been presented to the King, it would never have been published. Accordingly, it was afterwards declared in the Star-Chamber to be a seditious libel (1). It serves, however, to shew, that many people thought, the King was taking measures to throw off the yoke of Parliaments, since he evidently followed some of the maxims proposed in this Writing. There was even no likelihood of his intending to call another Parliament, till he had found means of having the Commons more at command, as he had plainly intimated in his last Proclamation.

Richard being taken, the King did not think proper to continue a war with France, which could bring him no advantage, nor serve him for pretence to ask money of the Parliament, since he was determined not to call one. As France had no quarrel with him, but concerning the Queen's domesticks, which was not a sufficient motive to continue the war, a peace was quickly concluded between the two Crowns, by the mediation of the Republick of Venice. It was signed the 14th of April, about a month after the dissolution of the Parliament. France so little cared for what had passed concerning the Queen's domesticks, that she was satisfied with inserting this article in the Treaty of Peace: The articles and contract of the marriage of the Queen of Great-Britain are to be confirmed faithfully. And as for the said Queen's household, if there be anything to be added or diminished, it shall be done by a mutual consent freely and willingly, as it may be judged fit and convenient for the service of the said Queen. This Peace was sworn in September following.

The King had now freed himself from the yoke of the Parliament, and intended not to resume it. But withal, he had deprived himself of the supplies of money, which the Parliaments were wont to grant to the Kings, not only on urgent and extraordinary occasions, but also as marks of affection and zeal, when the People were pleased with the Government. One may venture to say, no Prince in Europe equals in riches a King of England, who is beloved by his Subjects. Not only his ordinary revenues, if well

(1) The Project contained in this Writing, was framed in 1613, by Sir Robert Dudley, Son of the Earl of Leicester. However, the Earl, Sir Robert, and Sir Robert's son, Mr. Sidney, and Mr. St. John were committed for writing it, and questioned in the Star-Chamber. He finds, at all times, in the purses of his subjects, and by a free gift, whatever is necessary to support the honour of his State. There is no potentate in Europe that can, like him, be sure of never wanting money. But what must he do to gain the love of his People? Why, a thing the most practicable and easy, the most just, the most adapted to the welfare of his Kingdom, and to his own interest. In a word, he must observe the Laws to which himself and predecessors have consented, and which were deemed necessary for King and People. The pride therefore and insatiable avarice of Favorites and Ministers, are the only things that make him sometimes lose the advantages naturally flowing from the constitution of the Government. These men, impatient of any bounds to their unlawful ambition of governing with an absolute sway, seek all possible means to insinuate into their Master a desire to set himself above the Laws, and to become like other Monarchs. That is, they do all that lies in their power to change the King's true and solid happiness into real misery. For though a King of England should render himself absolute, he could never, by oppression and violence, obtain from his People what he may freely receive, by submitting to the Laws and Constitution of the Government. We have seen in the two late Reigns of William III. and Queen Anne, and we daily see in that of the Prince on the Throne, such undeniable proofs of what I advance, that I think it needless to say any thing more. I shall only observe, that the Kings of England, who were most famous and most esteemed, as Edward I, Edward III, Henry V, Henry VIII, and Elizabeth, constantly followed the same maxims, and thereby rendered their Reigns prosperous and happy. Whereas, James I, Charles I, Charles II, James II, who took a contrary course, became miserable, and performed nothing either for their own or the Nation's glory.

Causes of the King's misfortune.

Charles I, like the King his Father, was very fond of arbitrary power, and had no favorites or ministers, but what were of the same principles. His Privy-Council became by degrees an absolute Court, which thought itself above the Laws. The Star-Chamber was another Court, the most rigorous that ever was, the severity whereof fell chiefly upon those who pretended to dispute the Prerogative-royal. The High-Commission perfectly seconded the Council and Star-Chamber, and under colour of putting a stop to Schism, oppressed, as Puritans, those that refused to submit to a despotic power. In short, the Judges of the realm being all chosen by the Court, and devoted to the King, omitted no opportunity to support the Prerogative-royal, and raise it as high as the King desired. The Parliament only could cure these disorders, but the King was determined to call no more, the maxims of the Parliament being diametrically opposite to his. He thought the Parliament had much encroached upon the Prerogative-royal, in the foregoing Reigns, and the Parliament could not help dreading the consequences of the general maxims, which the King was endeavouring to introduce into the Government; and the rather, as they saw plainly, these consequences were not bare speculations, but were put in practice. This dread induced them to deny the King some things readily granted by former Parliaments to his predecessors, because they were free from any such fears. But as the Nation in general was more inclined to be ruled by the Parliament, than by the Court, these contrasts bred in the minds of the People a distaste to the Court, the fatal effects whereof the King afterwards experienced.

Causes of the King's misfortune.

By the dissolution of the late Parliament, and by his resolution never to call another, which was universally known, the King had not only deprived himself of the extraordinary Supplies he might have expected from the Commons, but had also done himself great prejudice with respect to his Treasury. The five Subsidies granted by the Parliament fell very short of what was expected. As every man's quota towards a Subsidy is settled by commissioners in each county, and by assistants belonging to the towns and villages, in proportion to his possessions, either poverty, or decay of trade, or some such excuse was pleaded to lessen the tax. On the other hand, the commissioners and assistants not being inclined to the Court, allowed very readily these excuses, and appeared much more apt to favour their countrymen than the King. This occasioned a great diminution of the usual value of the Subsidies. Moreover Tunnage and Poundage were not paid without force.

There was continual occasion to use violence, to seize the effects, and imprison the merchants, to oblige them to pay what the House of Commons had declared illegal. Besides, they practised a thousand artifices to defraud the King of a duty, which they thought was unjustly laid upon them. To cure these inconveniences, the Council was forced to give very strict orders, even to the empowering the officers of the Customs to enter into any ship, vessel, or house, and to search in any trunk or chest, and break any bulk whatsoever, in default of the payment of Customs. But besides, that this had never been practised before, another inconvenience arose. These officers, under colour of searching, used many oppressions and rogueries, which caused the People still the more to exclaim. In a word, the King had not half the profit from Tunnage and Poundage that he received before his quarrel with the Parliament, and the People were much more dissatisfied than ever. But to hinder their discontent from turning into rebellion, the Council gave strict orders to have the Militia, both Horse and Foot, compleated, armed, and instructed in the exercise of arms (1). It was thereby intended to intimidate the People, and keep them in awe, whilst on the other hand, they were amused with orders for the rigorous execution of the Laws against Recusants. But these orders must have been neglected, since the People's Complaints upon that Subject never ceased during the whole course of this Reign.

Mean while, as the King wanted money, and it was easy to foresee, that his ordinary revenues would not be sufficient to supply his expences, the Ministers found no better way to increase the King's revenue, than by granting Monopolies. That is, the King, by his Letters-Patents, formed Companies, to whom alone he gave the privilege of selling certain goods or wares, and who were to pay him for it such a yearly revenue. This was directly contrary to the rights of the People, and very destructive to trade: but in those days, the good of the Nation was what the Court had least in view. This abuse went so far, that in a manner all sort of commodities were monopolized, and the sale engrossed by some Company, even to old Rags. I shall not here specify these Monopolies, because, not having been all established at once, they will perhaps be mentioned hereafter (2).

Since the King had undertaken to make war upon France, the Spanish war was no more talked of than if there had been no such thing, though in all the speeches to the foregoing Parliaments, and in all the messages to the Commons, he had endeavoured to show how necessary this war was, for the welfare of all Europe, and especially of England. He had frequently insinuated, that England and Ireland were in so great danger of being invaded by the Spaniards, that it was not possible to be too speedy in applying a remedy to so urgent an evil. And yet, the Spaniards never made any attempt that might confirm the fears, the King would have inspired the Parliament with. The King of Spain, contented with not being attacked, undertook nothing against England, knowing he was in no danger from that quarter. However, after the conclusion of the Peace between France and England, he thought proper to end the war with the English, to which he met with no obstacle, Charles not being in condition to continue it. So a peace between the two Crowns, after some negotiations, was concluded in November 1630.

Conclusion of the Peace
November 5.

Presbyterianism had lately gained ground in England, notwithstanding the strong opposition of the Bishops, and particularly of Laud Bishop of London, sworn enemy to the Puritans. This Prelate seldom missed any opportunity to show his hatred to them, and such opportunities very frequently offered. Besides that he was the King's most intimate counsellor, especially for ecclesiastical matters, he had almost the sole direction of the High-Commission, after the Archbishop of Canterbury was excluded on account of Bithorp's sermon. He so managed therefore, to prevent the growth of Presbyterianism, that the King sent certain instructions to the Archbishops, with a command to impart them to the Bishops of their Provinces, in order to their being observed. The chief end of these instructions was to hinder any Presbyterian minister from creeping into the Church of England, and to discover the careless observers of the Rites prescribed by the Canons. Laud himself was the author of these instructions which were agreeable to some considerations [for the better settling of the Church-government] presented by him to the King some time before. As the Presbyterians were not ignorant from whence the evil sprung, they entertained an implacable

That the painting was so far from being fine, that when it was done, it did not cost above forty shillings. Then he set forth the gross blunders of the painter, and proved by Acts of Parliament made in the Reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth, that all pictures shall be removed out of the Churches. Finally, he denied that he was ill-affected to the Government of the Church under Bishops, or had acted in contempt of the King, or ever received a letter from the Bishop of Salisbury upon this subject. Whereupon the Bishop of London said, that he did not pretend to justify the errors of the painter, but only to observe to the Court, that God being called in Scripture, the Antient of Days, might be the occasion of the painter's representing God the Father like an old man (1). But that Sherfield was much more to blame than the painter for daring to make alterations without licence. In short, Sherfield was fined five hundred Pounds, contrary to the opinion of some of his Judges, who would have mounted his fine to a thousand, and condemned to make a public acknowledgement of his fault, before such persons as the Bishop should please to name (2). I thought my self obliged to relate this instance, in order to show what methods were taken to ruin Presbyterianism. It is easy to perceive, that such severities could not but produce very ill effects amongst the people, and alienate them from, instead of reconciling them to, the Church of England.

The King gains Sir Thomas Wentworth.

In the account, I have given of the third Parliament held in this Reign, I had sometimes occasion to speak of Sir Thomas Wentworth, Knight of the Shire for the County of York. This Gentleman several times in the House of Commons, gave proofs of his zeal for the maintenance of the liberties of the people, and the privileges of the Parliament. By that he became formidable to the Court, though he took care not to run into any excess with regard to the King and his Minister. On the contrary, he always softened his opinions with some honorable and respectful expressions, but however seldom failed to oppose the pretensions of the Court. As he was one of the greatest geniuses then in England, the King soon perceived that his parts and capacity might be very serviceable to him, if he could gain him to his interest. He endeavoured it therefore, after, or perhaps before, the dissolution of the Parliament, and succeeded so well, that Wentworth became one of the most zealous promoters of the royal authority, or rather of the despotick power the King had a mind to establish (3). Upon this account, the King thought him the fittest person to be intrusted with the Presidentship of the Council in the North. As this is one of the greatest grievances complained of by the English against Charles I., and one of the most noted occasions wherein that Prince discovered his design to set up an unlimited power, it will be necessary briefly to show what this Council in the North was, and the use the King would have made of it to subject his people to a despotick power.

He is made President of the Council of York.

M. p. 162.

Upon the suppression of the lesser Monasteries in the 27th year of the Reign of Henry VIII. there were, for two or three years together, several insurrections in the North. Mean while, as Henry VIII. did not intend to stop there, but meant also to suppress all the rest of the Monasteries, he thought proper to take some care to prevent the like insurrections in those parts. To that end, he established at York a Court of Justice, under the specious pretence of easing his poor Subjects, who had not wherewithal to prosecute their suits in the Courts of Westminster. But his real intent was, that this Court should have an eye upon the proceedings of the northern Lords and Gentlemen, who were suspected, in order to punish them immediately, in case it was perceived they were endeavouring to raise any fresh insurrections. A commission therefore was granted to the Bishop of Landaff, the first President, and others, by virtue whereof was established this new Council in the North, otherwise called the Court of York. The jurisdiction of this Court extended over Yorkshire, Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, the Bishoprick of Durham, the County of the Cities of York, Kingston upon Hull, and Newcastle upon Tyne. The King's commission was no other than a commission of Oyer and Terminer, with an additional clause, whereby the Council was empowered to hear all causes, real and personal, when one or both of the parties, by reason of their poverty, could not prosecute their rights, according to the laws of the land. This clause, though illegal, produced no ill effect, nor any complaint, whether the new Court exercised that part of the commission at all, or only so sparingly, that the poor found ease and benefit by it.

In the first year of the Reign of King James I., a commission was granted to the Lord Sheffield President of the Court of York, which varied not from the former, only it had reference to instructions which the King was to send him. It is not known whether these instructions were sent; but it is evident, that in making the power of the Court to depend on the King's instructions, the intent was, that its decisions should not be made so much according to the laws, as according to his Majesty's private orders. And indeed, King James in the seventh year of his Reign granted a new commission to the same Lord Sheffield, omitting these two clauses, which were in the first, That they should inquire per sacramentum bonorum et legalium hominum, and hear and determine, secundum leges Angliæ. Thus the power of the Court was limited only by the particular instructions, which were the first that appear to have been sent thither.

From that time, whenever the commission was renewed, which was upon every change of President or Counsellor, the King sent new instructions, tending to render the Court of York independent, not only of the Courts of Westminster, which are the Courts of the whole Kingdom, but even of all sorts of laws. Charles I. renewed this commission in favour of the Lord Wentworth, with a more ample power than any of his predecessors had been invested with. In 1632. a clause was added, whereby among other things, authority was committed to him to hear and determine all offences and misdemeanours, suits, debates, controversies and demands, causes, things and matters whatsoever contained in the instructions annexed to the commission. But what were these instructions (4)? In the Parliament of 1640. Mr. Edward Hyde, then Member of the House of Commons, and afterwards Earl of Clarendon, being sent by the House to the Lords concerning the Court of York, said in his Speech to them, that in the instructions of 1632 and 1637, containing fifty eight Articles, there was scarce one that was not against or beside the Law. From whence he took occasion to ask, If he had the good northern People done, that they only must be disfranchised of all their Privileges, and be governed according to the discretion of the Court of York? Nay, though this Court might proceed according to its discretion, special provision was made in the King's instructions, that no fine, no punishment should be less than by law appointed (5). This Court was abolished afterwards by the same Parliament of 1640.

The King having governed three or four years without a Parliament, was very much at ease. His will, by degrees, began to pass for law; there was no House of Commons to complain publicly, and he saw none about him but such as were always ready to flatter him, and cherish his principles concerning Government. On the other hand, he was freed from the incumbrance and expense of a war, which had created him great trouble, and rendered him too dependent on the Parliament. In short, though he was not ignorant that in general the people were discontented, he did not fee any appearance of a rebellion, the great men of the Kingdom and the neighbouring Princes being so disposed, as to give no encouragement to those who should attempt to disturb the State. His affairs being in this situation, he believed he could not take a properer time to go into Scotland, where three important affairs required his presence. First, he had a mind to be crowned. 2. He intended to hold a Parliament for procuring of money. 3. He designed to take some measures there for the execution of a project long since formed, to reduce the Kirk of Scotland to a perfect conformity with the Church

Likewise to hear and determine, according to the course of Proceedings in the Court of Chancery, all manner of Complaints, as well concerning Lands, Tenements, and Hereditaments, &c. and to try Proceedings in the Courts of Common Law by Injunction, or otherwise, as is used in the Courts of Chancery. of England, and entirely ruin Presbyterianism. To this end it was, that he took with him Laud, Bishop of London, and at his arrival in Scotland, made him Privy-Counsellor of that Kingdom. He departed therefore from London the 13th of May 1633, and being come to Edinburgh, was crowned with the usual solemnities. After that he held a Parliament, which gave him the largest Subsidy that had ever been granted to any King of Scotland before him (1). The third point concerning Religion, requires some explication. But as I intend to speak more fully of it hereafter, I shall only say here what is absolutely necessary to shew the King's design.

The Reformation was established in Scotland in the reign of Queen Mary, mother of James I, upon the plan of the Churches of Geneva and Switzerland. The Hierarchy was entirely suppressed, and the government of the Church committed to Presbyters, and national Synods, called in Scotland, General-Assemblies. But however, the Bishops were still continued, though divested of all ecclesiastical Jurisdiction. They retained only their revenues, lands, houses, seat in Parliament, and all the temporal advantages in general, that were annexed to the Episcopal dignity. From the beginning of the Reformation, that is, from the year 1561, to the end of the sixteenth Century, the state of the Bishops underwent several revolutions, of which I shall say nothing here, because I design to speak of them elsewhere. It suffices to say at present, that James I, becoming King of England, found means to cause the Parliament of Scotland to restore Episcopacy to its former lustre, and give the Bishops their ancient jurisdiction over the Church. This was the first step to lead the Kirk of Scotland to the desired point, that is, to a perfect conformity with the Church of England. But the tedious treaty of the Prince his Son's marriage with the Spanish Infanta, and the affairs of Bohemia and the Palatinate, hindered him from fully executing his project. Charles I, had this work no less at heart than the King his Father. But as in the beginning of his reign he was engaged in a war with Spain, and afterwards with France, and moreover his disputes with his Parliaments affording him little leisure to think of other matters, he could not seriously set about this affair, till after the others were ended. In the Parliament at Edinburgh in the year 1633, among other Acts that were presented to be passed, there were two, namely, the third and fourth, the one entitled, An Act anent [or concerning] his Majesty's royal Prerogative and apparel of Kirkmen: The other, An Act of ratification of the Acts touching Religion. These were the only Acts that met with any opposition, on account of the consequences which some feared the King would hereafter draw from them. The first of these Acts was properly but a confirmation of a like Act passed in the Reign of King James VI, empowering his Majesty to order the Vestments of the Clergy as he pleased. Now as from that time, the design of altering the discipline of the Kirk of Scotland, had shewed itself more and more, some of the Members of this Parliament suspected the King would make use of this Act to introduce the Surplice. And indeed, being asked whether he intended it, he made no answer; but taking a list of the whole Members out of his pocket, said, Gentlemen, I have all your names here, and I'll know who will do me service, and who will not, this day. However about thirteen Noblemen, and as many Barons and Burghesses declared, that they agreed to the Act for his Majesty's Prerogative, but dissenting from that part of it, as to the apparel of Kirkmen.

The other Act which I mentioned, was expressed in the following manner: "Our Sovereign Lord, with the advice and consent of the Estates, ratifies and approves all and whatsoever Acts and Statutes made before, anent the liberty and freedom of the true Kirk of God, and Religion presently professed within this realm, and ordains the same to stand in their full force and effect, as if they were specially mentioned and set down herein."

I have already said, that in the Reign of James VI, and especially after his accession to England, he made several innovations in the Kirk of Scotland, particularly with respect to the Episcopal Jurisdiction which had been restored. The whole artifice of this Act consisted therefore in these words, the Religion at present professed: for thereby were confirmed all the innovations in the discipline of the Kirk of Scotland, to which the opposers of the Act would not agree. They were very willing to ratify the Acts made in favour of Religion, as established by an Act passed in the 6th year of James VI, when the Bishops had no power or jurisdiction; but would not admit these words, at present professed. During these contents, the King said with some emotion, I will have no distinction, but command you to say, I or No.

Whereupon the dissenting Lords and Gentlemen said, No. However the two Acts passed by a majority of votes. Some affirmed afterwards that fraud was used in gathering the votes. However that be, the King's eagerness to have these two Acts passed, convinced the people of Scotland that the project of making greater innovations in the Kirk still subsisted, and that the two Acts were a sort of preparative to accomplish it. On the other hand, the opposition the King met with, shewed him, it was not yet time to act openly, and that it was necessary to take other measures to facilitate the success of his designs (2).

If it was endeavoured in Scotland to ruin Presbyterianism by indirect ways, it was thought proper to proceed in England with less caution. Accordingly, all possible efforts were used to destroy it utterly, by persecuting the Puritans, for whom there was not the least condescension. The Court and the Bishops laid it down for a rule, not to depart, on their account, from one title of what was practised in the Church of England, for fear they should grow too powerful, and the indulgence shewn them prove detrimental to the Church. But there was a stronger reason, namely, the implacable hatred conceived of them by the King, his Ministers, and above all, by the Bishops of London and Winchester, which made them earnestly seek all occasions to oppress them. And these occasions were easy to be found. They had only to press the observation of the Canons without dispensing with one article, in order to cause the Presbyterians to commit offences, which exposed them to the rigour of the Ecclesiastical and Civil Laws. But as the Bishops could not be every where, and wanted people to inform them of what passed, [Walter Curle] Bishop of Winchester bethought himself, in his primary Visitation, to oblige by oath the Church-wardens, and sworn-men, to turn informers, that none might escape their inquiry. The Oath was as follows:

You shall swear, that you and every of you, without all feigning, affection, favour, hatred, hope of reward and gain, or fear of displeasure or malice of any person, shall present all and in full of every such person and persons, of or within your Parish, who hath committed any offence, fault or crime, or omitted any part of duty, which be enjoined to perform: wherein you shall deal Annals, uprightness, and according to truth; neither of malice presenting any contrary to truth, nor of corrupt affection sparing to present any, and to conceal the truth; having in this action God before your eyes, with an earnest zeal to maintain truth, and suppress vice. So help you God, and the contents of this Book.

With this oath were delivered certain instructions, according to which they were to proceed.

1. As to the articles concerning the Church, they are "to enquire, whether they have the book of Constitutions, or Canon ecclesiastical, and a parchment Register-book, book of Common-Prayer, and book of Homilies, &c?" And whether the Communion-table be placed in such convenient sort within the said chancel or church, as that the minister may be best heard in his prayer and administration?

2. As to the articles concerning the Clergy, whether doth the minister read the Constitutions set forth by his Majesty once every year?

3. Whether the Minister or Preacher used to pray for the King's Majesty with his whole title, as King of Great-Britain? And doth he in like manner pray for the Archbishops, and Bishops? And doth he observe all the orders, rites and ceremonies prescribed in the Common Prayer, and administering the Sacrament? And whether doth the minister receive the Sacrament, kneeling at the same, and admitteth to none but such as do kneel, as by the 12th Canon is directed?

4. Whether hath the Minister admitted to the Communion any notorious offenders or schismatics? Contrary to the 26th and 27th Constitution. And whether strangers of any other parish do come often and commonly to your Church, from their own Parishes? Contrary to the 28th Canon. And whether doth the Minister use to sign the children with the sign of the Cross, when they are baptized? And whether is your Minister a licensed Minister? If yea, then by whom? And whether doth the Minister wear the Surplice whilst he is saying the publick Prayers, and administering the Sacraments? Whether doth the Minister catechise and instruct the Youth of ignorant persons of your parish in the ten Commandments, &c? And whether he doth solemnize marriage, the banns not being three several sundays and holidays first published in time of divine Service? 1633. to be considered as innovations tending to Popery. What Laud had done in consecrating St. Catherine-Creed Church, and in administering the Sacrament, was of this kind. When some complained of these things, the Bishops that countenanced them, alleged a Statute, which impowered Queen Elizabeth and her Successors, in case of any abuses and indecencies in the divine Service, to prescribe such ceremonies as they should judge proper for the glory of God, and the decency of his worship. Now as the King never failed to approve of what was enjoined by the Bishops, many suspected, that the King's authority was made use of to support these seemingly inconsiderable innovations, with design to take advantage of the same authority to justify alterations of much greater consequence.

9. Lastly, the Church's little regard to tender consciences, and her obstinacy in refusing to relax in any the most insignificant point, as for instance, the Surplice, gave occasion to believe, these things would not be so zealously adhered to, were there not some more hidden designs.

These were the grounds, as far as I have been able to observe, on which was founded the people's belief of a settled design to introduce Popery. However, these are only presumptions, from whence, as I said, it cannot be justly inferred, that this opinion was well-grounded. But on the other hand, it must be confessed, that the principal Bishops, who were not ignorant of the consequences drawn from their conduct, were extremely careless in clearing themselves, or in taking measures to remove, or at least, to weaken these suspicions. They regarded the Presbyterians with the utmost contempt, as a set of stubborn, obstinate, people, who ought to be humbled, instead of being indulged. But it was not with respect to Religion only that the ruin of the Puritans was thought necessary. They were also considered as persons, who by the principles of their Religion, were inclined to oppose all authority in the State, as well as in the Church, and consequently they could not be kept too low. This bred between the two parties, an implacable enmity, which is not yet extinguished. The Presbyterians, who were under oppression at the time I am speaking of, had their turn afterwards, and oppressed, nay utterly destroyed, the Church of England. In the violent motions caused by this enmity, the Bishops suffered first. Laud lost his head on the scaffold. The Monarchy was overthrown, and in the fall the King himself came to a tragical end. The Church of England disappeared for some time, and was, as it were, buried in the ruins of the State. And it was not without a wonderful providence that the Monarchy and Church were at last restored to their former splendour.

The King, as I said, intended to introduce the rites of the Church of England, into the Kirk of Scotland. This project was formed by the King his Father, who had even ordered that Divine Service should be celebrated in his Royal Chapel at Edinburgh, in the same manner as in his Chapel at Whitehall. But whether this order was neglected, or the Scots would not frequent the Chapel, Charles thought proper not only to renew it, but to add several things to hinder the Chapel from being deserted for the future. On the 8th of October, he sent the following Articles to the Bishop of Dunblane, Dean of his Chapel at Edinburgh.

"OUR express will and pleasure is, that the Dean of our Chapel, that now is, and his Successors, shall be assistant to the Right Reverend Father in God, the Archbishop of St. Andrews, at the Coronation, so often as it shall happen.

"2. That the book of the form of our Coronation lately used, be put in a little box, and laid into a standard, and committed to the care of the Dean of the Chapel successively.

The Coronation of King Charles I., it must be observed, had been performed according to the rites of the Church of England.

"3. That there be Prayers twice a day, with the Choir, as well in our absence, as otherwise, according to the English Liturgy, till some course be taken for making one, that may fit the custom and constitution of that Church.

"4. That the Dean of the Chapel look carefully, that all that receive the blessed Sacrament there, receive it kneeling; and that there be a Communion held in that our Chapel, the first Sunday of every month.

"5. That the Dean of our Chapel, that now is, and so successively, come duly thither to Prayers upon Sundays, and such Holy-days as that Church observes, in his Whites, and preach fo, whenever he preacheth there. And that he be not absent from thence, but upon necessary occasion of his Diocese, or otherwise, according to the course of his preferment.

"6. That these orders shall be our warrant to the Dean of our Chapel. That the Lords of our Privy-Council, the Lords of the Sessions, the Advocate, Clerks, writers to the Signet, and members of our College of Justice, be commanded to receive the holy Communion once every year at least, in that our Chapel Royal, and kneeling for example-sake to the Kingdom. And we likewise command the Dean aforesaid, to make report yearly to us, how we are obeyed therein, and by whom; as also if any man shall refuse, in what manner he doth so, and why.

"7. That the copies which are consecrated to our use, be delivered to the Dean, to be kept upon inventory by him, and in a standard provided for that purpose; and to be used at the celebration of the Sacrament in our Chapel Royal (1)."

Besides these Articles, the King writ a Letter to the Dean, ordering him to certify to the Lords of the Privy-Council, if any of those appointed to communicate in his Chapel Royal, did not perform these Articles, to the end, such order might be taken, as his Majesty had appointed by his former Letters.

Hence 'tis visible, that not only the whole Council of Scotland, but also those who were in publick employments, and Court-places, were prepared to conform to the Church of England, otherwise they would not have been employed, or continued in their posts. It was with them the King intended to begin, that, as he said himself, they might serve for example to the rest. We shall see presently what happened when the King would have obliged the whole Scotch nation to the same condescension.

Whilst the King was seeking means to engage the Scots to conform to the Church of England, pains were taken on the contrary to alienate from her, the Presbyterians in England, by affecting such usages and customs as were most apt to offend them. At that time the heads of the Church of England, instead of undeceiving those who preposterously imagined she was leaning to Popery, seem to have taken all possible care to confirm their suspicions, by industriously conforming to the Church of Rome, in matters of little moment, and without any necessity, as if it was done on purpose to brave them. In October 1633, the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, as Ordinaries of St. Gregory's Church, which stood near the Cathedral, removed the Communion-Table from the middle of the Chancel, to the upper-end, placing it there Altar-wise. For which they alleged two reasons. The first, that in the King's Chapel, and all Cathedrals, the Communion-Tables were placed in that manner, and therefore it was fit other Churches should conform to the same custom. The second, that when the Tables stood in the middle of the Chancel, several scandalous indecencies were committed, People leaning thereon in Sermon-time, or putting their hats on it. This last reason, added to the great care that was taken about kneeling at the Sacrament, caused many to believe, that the endeavouring to inspire such an extraordinary respect for the Communion-Table, and the giving it always the name of Altar, was not without design. And therefore some of the Parishioners of St. Gregory's complained of this removal, by appeal to the Court of the Arches (2). But the Council having notice of it, prevented the Sentence, by ordering the Dean of the Arches, to confirm by his authority, what had been done in St. Gregory's Church. A few days after, the King being present in Council, caused this affair to be debated, and approving the act of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, gave commandment, that if those Parishioners did proceed in their appeal, the Dean of the Arches, (who was then attending at the hearing of the cause) should call them, and confirm the removal. This Sentence given by the King's Sovereign Authority, without staying for the judgment of the Court, to whose cognizance this matter properly belonged, was a fountain of oppressions to many Ministers and Congregations, who were not willing to comply with it. There was scarce a Church in England, except the Cathedrals, and the King's Chapel, where the Communion-Table was placed Altar-wise, at the upper-end of the Chancel. But after the King had confirmed the removal in St. Gregory's Church, the like disputes arose in numberless places, and the High-Commission had frequent occasions to punish the Ministers, who were suspected of too little zeal for the Church of England. As since the Reformation, the Altars were changed into Communion-Tables, and placed in the middle of the Chancel, to avoid superstition, many imagined, the Tables were again turned into Altars, with intent to revive a superstitious worship.

(1) King Charles I., before his return from Scotland, erected Edinburgh into a Bishoprick. Clarendon, Tom. I. p. 67.
(2) The Court of the Arch and mediastine Consistory belonging to the Archbishop of Canterbury, for debating several Causes. It was held in the Church of St. Mary le Bow, from whence it has its name. Its jurisdiction is ordinary, and reaches through the whole Province of Canterbury. The Judge is called Dean, from his having jurisdiction over the Deanery, consisting of thirteen Churches in London, exempted from the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London.

1634. England being then in profound peace, and almost wholly unconcerned in what passed abroad, I can speak here only of domestick affairs. 'Tis true, that each taken singly, may seem of little consequence, but all together may serve to shew the character of the King, the genius of the Court, the conduct of the Magistrates, and in general, the causes of that terrible Revolution, of which the Lord Clarendon has given the History.

In February 1634, came to a solemn hearing in the Star-Chamber, a cause which made a great noise, and which shewed the extreme severity of that Court against such as were suspected not to be submissive enough to the Government. The case was this. Mr. William Prynn [Barreter of Lincoln's Inn] had compiled and printed a large volume in quarto, of above a thousand pages, entitled, Hystrio-Mastix. The Author's main design was to shew, that Stage-plays, Balls, Masques, were unlawful and antichristian. But in treating his subject, he had interspersed sundry reflections, applicable to the King, the Queen, and the Church, who approved or tolerated these abuses. It was pretended, his aim in general was to shew, there was a design to reduce Religion to a kind of Paganism, in order to make way for Popery. This outrage was represented by the King's Council in the blackest colours they could possibly give it. At last, after a solemn hearing of three days, the Book was condemned to be burnt by the common hangman, a thing till then unusual in England. As for the Author, Sentence passed upon him, that he should be expelled Lincoln's Inn, disabled to practise, degraded of his degree in the University [of Oxford], set on the pillory, have his ears cut off, imprisoned during life, and find five thousand pounds. The Publisher, [Michael Sponker] who was also the printer of the Book, was fined five hundred pounds, and [Mr. Buckner] the Chaplain who licensed it, fifty pounds.

This sentence seemed too severe to disinterested persons. It mortified the Presbyterians especially, most of whom were of the same principles with Prynn. They could not help perceiving, in the severity exercised upon this author, a malicious design to disgrace their Sect, and oppress them on all occasions. The truth is, the Presbyterian party, though very numerous, as plainly appeared afterwards, laboured then under oppression. They had against them, the King, the Ministers, the Council, the Star-Chamber, the High-Commission, the principal heads of the Church of England, the Arminians, the Papists, the Lord-Lieutenants of the Counties, the Judges of the Realm, and all the Magistrates in general. Notwithstanding all this, they daily gained ground. This would seem incredible, if it was not considered, that the Court themselves were the chief cause of their increase. The Court looked upon as Puritans, all who did not shew submission enough to the King, or would not allow sufficient extent to the Prerogative royal, and by oppressing them as such, or by refusing them all kinds of employments, engaged them unavoidably to turn to the Presbyterians. As the King's pretensions, with regard to Government, were not approved by the majority of the Nation, it happened by degrees, that almost all England became Presbyterian, according to the sense given by the Court to that term. For besides, it is certain, there were in the Presbyterian party, multitudes who were very well-affected to the Church of England, but could not allow of the King's principles concerning Government. So, this party, though continually oppressed, grew daily more numerous, waiting with impatience for a Parliament, where they were almost sure of finding protectors. But at the time I am speaking of there was no appearance of the King's intention to call a Parliament. As nothing forced him to it, he took care not to expose himself to the ill-humours of a House of Commons, and run the risk of seeing revived the complaints which had obliged him to dissolve the three foregoing Parliaments.

It is very true, that in governing without a Parliament, the King debarred himself of the extraordinary Supplies which the Sovereigns usually received from thence: but he did not believe, that the only way to have extraordinary Supplies was to apply to the House of Commons. He had expressly told the Parliament, by the Lord-Keeper, and frequently intimated himself, that he could find money without the assistance of Parliaments. And yet, the Petition of Right having intervened since that time, and the King having bound himself, by his answer, not to raise any tax without the consent of both Houses, he seemed to be deprived, by that answer, of all methods which he thought he might lawfully use before the Petition was presented. But expedients to evade the most solemn promises are seldom wanting to men in power. On these occasions, there are ministers and counsellors who insinuate to their masters, the promises made by Sovereigns bind them no farther than they think proper. William Noy, Attorney-general, who was one of these bold counsellors, had, the last year, furnished the King with a way to raise an extraordinary Supply without the concurrence of the Parliament: namely, by the imposition of a tax upon the People, under colour of maintaining a certain number of Ships to guard the seas (1). But this bold counsellor died before he had seen the effects of his advice (2), after having however engaged his Master in an affair which made him for ever lose his People's confidence, and was one of the principal causes of his ruin.

The death of the Attorney-General hindered not the King from putting his advice in practice. To that purpose he directed to the Mayors and Head-Officers of the maritime Towns, Writs to much the same effect, with the following directed to the Mayor of London (3).

Carolus Rex, &c.

"TO the Mayor, Commonalty and Citizens of our City of London, and to the Sheriff, of the same City, and good men in the said City, and in the liberties and Members of the same, greeting. Because we are given to understand, That certain thieves, pirates, and robbers of the sea, as well Turks, enemies of the Christian name, as others, being gathered together, wickedly taking by force, and spoiling the ships, and goods, and merchandizes, not only of our Subjects, but also of the Subjects of our friends in the Sea, which have been accustomed antiently to be defended by the English nation; and the same, at their pleasure, have carried away, delivering the men in the same into miserable captivity: And inasmuch as we see them daily preparing all manner of slooping, farther to molest our merchants, and to grieve the Kingdom, unless remedy be not sooner applied, and their evil-doours be not more manly met withal; also the dangers considered, which on every side, in these times of war, do hang over our heads, that it behoveth us, and our Subjects, to strengthen the defence of the sea and Kingdom with all expedition; so speed that we can; we willing, by the help of God, chiefly to provide for the defence of the Kingdom, safe-guard of the Sea, security of our Subjects, safe-conduct of Ships and Merchandizes to our Kingdom of England coming, and from the same Kingdom to foreign parts passing; inasmuch as we and our progenitors, Kings of England, have been always heretofore masters of the aforesaid Sea, and it would be very irksome unto us, if that Princely honour in our times should be lost, or in any thing diminished. And although that charge of defence, which concerneth all men, ought to be supported by all, as by the laws and customs of the Kingdom of England hath been accustomed to be done: Notwithstanding, we considering that you, constituted in the sea-coasts, to whom by sea as well great dangers are imminent, and who by the same do get more plentiful gains for the defence of the sea, and conservation of our princely honour in that behalf, according to the duty of your Allegiance against such attempts, are chiefly bound to fet to your helping hand; we command firmly, enjoining you the aforesaid Mayor, Commonalty and Citizens, and Sheriffs of the said city, and the good men in the same city, and in the liberties and members of the same, in the faith and allegiance wherein ye are bound unto us, and as ye do love us, and our honour, and under the forfeiture of all which ye can forfeit to us, that ye cause to be prepared and brought to the port of Portsmouth, before the first day of March now next ensuing, one Ship of War of the burthen of nine hundred tons, with three hundred and fifty men at the least, as well expert masters, as very able and skilful mariners: one other Ship of war of the burthen of eight hundred tons, with two hundred and sixty men at the least, as well skilful masters, as very able and expert mariners: four other Ships of war, every of them of the burthen of five hundred tons, and every of them with two hundred men at the least, as well expert masters, as very able and skilful mariners: And one other Ship of war, of the burthen of three hundred tons, with a hundred and fifty men, as well expert masters, as very able and skilful mariners: And also every of the said ships with ordnance, as well greater as lesser, gun-powder, and spears, and weapons, and other necessary arms sufficient for war, and with double tackling, and with victuals, until the said first of March, competent for so many men; and from that

Witness my self, at Westminster the 20th day of October, in the tenth year of our Reign.

The Lord Mayor of London having received this writ, assembled the Common-Council, who agreed to present the following petition to the King.

To the King's most excellent Majesty.

The Humble Petition of your faithful Subjects, the Major, and Commonality, and Citizens of your City of London, most humbly shewing,

"THAT where your Majesty by writ, bearing date 20 Octobris last, commanded your Petitioners at their charge, to provide seven ships of war, furnished with men, victual, and all warlike provisions, to be at Portsmouth by the first of March next, and to continue from thence by the space of twenty six weeks in your Majesty's service, upon the defence of the seas and other causes in the said writ contained: Your petitioners do, in all submissive humbleness, and with acknowledgement of your sacred Majesty's many favours unto your said City, inform your Majesty, that they conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants, and Acts of Parliament (which they are ready humbly to shew forth) they are exempt, and are to be freed from that charge, &c."

But the pretensions of the City of London were not capable of causing the King to desist from his resolution. We shall see on the contrary, that in time this tax, which was at first peculiar to the maritime towns, was imposed upon the whole Kingdom (1).

After Laud's promotion to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, his zeal for the Church of England and against the Presbyterians, seemed to be much increased. He kept by the King's order a private correspondence with the Bishops of Scotland, concerning the Liturgy and Canons designed to be introduced into the Kirk, and of which I shall speak more fully presently. It suffices to say here, that it was he that was charged with the conduct and execution of this project. But he did not confine his labours to the conversion of the Scots, nor even of the English Presbyterians. The Dutch, the Italians, the French, who had taken refuge in England, since the Reign of Edward VI, had obtained sundry privileges from the former Kings, and particularly the liberty of celebrating divine service after their manner, that is, the Presbyterian, and formed several congregations, both in London and other parts of the Kingdom. But Laud could not bear they should enjoy this privilege any longer. And therefore sent them these two injunctions, having first secured the King's approbation;

"1. That all the natives of the Dutch and Wallon Congregations, in his Grace's Diocese, should repair to their several Parish-Churches of those several Parishes where they inhabited, to hear Divine Service and Sermons, and perform all duties and payments required in that behalf.

"2. That the Ministers, and all other of the Dutch and Wallon congregations, which were not natives and born Subjects to the King's Majesty, or any other Strangers that should come over to them, while they remained Strangers, might have and use their own discipline, as formerly they have done; yet it was thought fit, that the English Liturgy should be translated into French and Dutch, for the better settling of their children to the English Government."

Besides that, by these injunctions, he imposed upon these foreign Churches a Liturgy which they did not approve, he reduced these Congregations almost to nothing, since he excluded all that were born in the Kingdom, that is, all the descendants of such as had fled hither in the Reign of Edward VI, and consequently there could be but very few left of those born out of the Kingdom.

Upon this, the Dutch [and Wallon] Churches at Norwich presented a Petition to the Bishop of that Diocese, remonstrating, that the Archbishop's injunctions were contrary, not only to several orders of the Council heretofore given in favour of their Congregations, but also to the privileges granted them when they first settled in England, and continued to them during the Reigns of Edward VI, Queen Elizabeth, and James I, and confirmed also by his present Majesty's royal word. The Bishop of Norwich not returning a favorable answer to their Petition, they applied to the Archbishop himself, who answered them by letter, That his Majesty was resolved, his instructions should hold, and that obedience should be yielded to them by all the natives, after the first descent; Concluding his letter with these words: And thus I have given you answer fairly in all your particulars, and do expect all obedience and conformity to my instructions, which if you shall perform, the State will have occasion to see how ready you are to practise the obedience which you teach: And for my part, I doubt not but your selves, or your posterity at least, shall have cause to thank both the State and the Church for this care taken of you; but if you refuse, (as you have no cause to do, and I hope you will not) I shall then proceed against the natives, according to the laws and Canons ecclesiastical (2).

Thus the Archbishop alledged, in vindication of the breach of the privileges granted to these Congregations, and confirmed by four Kings, of whom his present Majesty was one, the King's sole will, or rather his own. It was evident, that the King's good pleasure on which he laid so much stress, was rather an approbation of what the Archbishop had undertaken, than a warrant to undertake it. The Presbyterians having no other way to be revenged of the Archbishop, published several libels against him, taking notice of all the innovations he had brought into the Church, pretending they were so many steps towards Popery. They forgot not to upbraid him with the pictures he had placed in the windows of his chapel at Lambeth, particularly that of God the Father in the form of a little old man. They observed several other things, of which the Archbishop was afterwards accused by the House of Commons. But this is not the proper place to speak of this impeachment, or of the Archbishop's defence.

The King being always in want, his Ministers were continually employed in devising means to raise money, against such as refused to pay. In the beginning of the Year 1635, the Attorney-General presented an information in the Star-Chamber against several hundreds of persons, Lords, Knights, Gentlemen, Ladies, and others, for disobeying his Majesty's proclamation, by which they were commanded not to reside in London. I do not find the sentence given upon this information, but, very probably, considering the Star-Chamber's zeal to support the King's authority, the parties accused were punished by fine.

(2) About one hundred and forty Years ago of their People went into Holland, where they were kindly received, and taught from Exile, and plying of their Trades of Families. They taught the Dutch the way of managing the woollen Manufacture, which has been since had consequence to England.

1635. The tax to provide and maintain a certain number of Ships to guard the seas, was imposed in 1634, for the year 1635, only upon the maritime towns. But in 1635, the King sent his Writs for Ship-money all over the Kingdom for the year 1636 (1). The reason or rather pretence of this general tax was, that the Kingdom was in great danger, on account of the league lately concluded between France and the Low-Countries. Though it did not appear how this league, which was not against England, could put the Kingdom in danger, the King however inferred, that the two most powerful States in naval forces being united, it was absolutely necessary that England should have a strong fleet to preserve the dominion of the sea, otherwise she might be insulted, and her trade disturbed. This tax being imposed by virtue of the Prerogative royal, several private persons refused to pay the sums they were rated at. Nay some there were who sued the Magistrates and other officers appointed to levy the money, asserting, that the Subject could be taxed only by act of Parliament. This opposition was the reason, that in the year 1636 Ship-money amounted to not above two hundred thousand pounds, though the King had expected a much larger sum. Mean while, the King considering, that by means of this tax he should have a settled revenue, besides that it would be a precedent to make use of his Prerogative on other occasions, resolved to support his project at any rate. But to guard it against all objections of being illegal, and contrary to his answer to the Petition of Right, he had a mind to show he was authorized on this occasion to exert his Prerogative. To that end he sent to the Judges of the realm, and required their opinion concerning his right to levy this tax. As the Judges wholly depended upon the Court, they very readily decided in favour of the King, and gave him their opinion in writing (2). But the King thought not proper to publish their determination, being satisfied with keeping it private till there should be occasion to use it. This will hereafter appear. But I must first speak of some other things which passed in this interval.

This Year 1635 the King renewed a former commission to confirm their defective Titles, to such as held lands of the Crown. He pretended it was an act of grace, and that his only aim was to secure the possession of Lands to those who held them by disputable titles. But notwithstanding this, the commission was looked upon as a manifest oppression. For, under colour of examining defective Titles, all the proprietors were obliged to produce their titles, to which, how valid soever they might be, the commissioners made objections. So, to avoid a law-suit with the King, wherein they were sure to be cast, considering the disposition of the Judges, the proprietors were forced to compound, and give money to secure their lands, which were otherwise in danger of being re-united to the Crown.

Shortly after, the King published a proclamation, commanding all persons, except soldiers, mariners, merchants, and their factors, not to depart the Kingdom without his licence. Several Kings of England had ordered the same thing on some particular occasions, but it was doubted whether such a prohibition was necessary when the proclamation was published.

The abuses of the Informers, that is, persons who watched people's actions, in order to accuse them, in case they infringed the Laws, were grown so excessive, that the King was forced, if not to abolish them entirely, at least, to qualify them by certain directions which he ordered to be observed.

The office of Lord-Treasurer, which had been executed by commissioners, since the death of the Earl of Portland, was conferred on Dr. William Juxton Bishop of London, who discharged it worthily. No Churchman had enjoyed this post since Henry VIII's time (3).

The same year was presented to the King [by the Earl of Arundel] an old man called Parr, who was a hundred and fifty-two years of age, and in perfect health. He was born the last year of the Reign of Edward IV.

The Elector Palatine and Prince Rupert, [or Robert] his brother arrived in England about this time, and were lodged in the King [their uncle's] Palace (4).

The Presbyterians were still molested upon every occasion, or whenever they gave their enemies an advantage, through an excess of zeal which was not always well regulated. Samuel Ward a Minister in Ipswich, boldly preached against the King's Book of Sports, and also said, That the Church of England was ready to ring changes in Religion. For which he was suspended by the High-Commission, and afterwards committed to prison for refusing to make a public recantation. The Church-wardens of Backington in Somersetshire refusing to place the Communion-Table otherwise than it had been for sixty years, were excommunicated by the Bishop of Bath and Wells. They appealed to the Archies, but their appeal was rejected. Then they petitioned the King, but with no better success. So the Church-wardens stood excommunicated a whole year, and were afterwards thrown into the Common-Goal, from whence at length they were released by the Bishop, upon their public submission and Penance. It would be too tedious to relate all the Actions which were entered in the High-Commission upon the two Articles I have been speaking of. It suffices to observe, that the number was very great, and the High-Commission always punished very severely such as dared to twerme from what was prescribed by the Church.

On the other hand, the Archbishop of Canterbury, ever zealous for the Church of England, considered as Puritans all who neglected the least rite or ceremony of that Church. This Prelate being informed of some remissness in that respect in the two Universities, could not suffer such an abuse. There were at Cambridge three Chapels where Divine Service was daily celebrated, though they had never been consecrated. This neglect, which to him seemed so blameable, exciting his zeal, he resolved to visit the Universities as Metropolitan. He met with some opposition, the Universities maintaining that he had not the right of visiting as Archbishop, though they did not deny he might visit by the King's commission, if his Majesty was pleased to appoint him. But not being satisfied with a borrowed power, he brought the case before the King, who decided it in his favour, after having himself supported the Archbishop's reasons with arguments, and answered the objections of the Universities. The Archbishop being so well supported, could not fail of obtaining the victory (5).

The King being determined, as I said, to continue the tax for the maintenance of the Ships designed to guard the seas, and having the last year given orders for levying it this Year 1636, was obliged to seek a pretence for a fleet. This tax, called by the English, Ship-money, and which for thenceforth I shall term so for the future, was grounded upon the necessity of guarding the seas. But none could perceive the danger, which, according to the King, England was exposed to by the alliance between France, and Holland. To this pretence therefore was to be added that of preserving the Dominion of the narrow Seas. To this end he publishes a proclamation, declaring, "Whereas 'King James did, in the seventh year of his reign, set forth a proclamation touching fishing; whereby all persons of what nation or quality soever (being not his natural-born Subjects) were refrained from fishing upon any of the coasts and seas of Great Britain, Ireland, and the rest of the Isles adjacent, until they had orderly obtained licences in that behalf. Since which time, neither the King his Father, nor himself have made any considerable execution of the said Proclamation, but have expected a voluntary conformity thereto. But now finding by experience, that all the inconveniences which occasioned that Proclamation, are rather increased than abated; and his Majesty well knowing how far he is obliged in Honour to maintain the Rights of his Crown, has thought it necessary to renew the aforesaid restraint of Fishing, and to declare, that his resolution is to keep such a competent strength of shipping upon his seas, as may be sufficient both to hinder farther encroachments upon his Regalities, and assist and protect those his good Friends and allies, who shall henceforth with license endeavour to take benefit of fishing upon his coasts."

These friends were the Hollanders, who came every year and fished for Herrings on the Coast of Scotland. It

This quarrel produced the two famous Treaties, entitled Mare Liberum, and Mare Clausum, the former penned by Grotius, the latter by Selden. But the King regarded not arguments drawn from History, or ancient treaties between the two Nations; he made use of a more effectual method, namely, a fleet under the command of Algernon Earl of Northumberland. This fleet attacking the dispersed fishermen, who little expected it, and sinking some, compelled the rest to retire into the English Harbours as the safest retreat, and in short, to give the King thirty thousand Florins, for permission to continue their fishing that summer (1).

Soon after, the King raised thirty thousand pounds by a Commission, to enquire concerning depopulations and conversions of arable Lands to pasture, since the 10th year of Queen Elizabeth (2). There were many offenders of this kind, and so heavy a fine was imposed in the Star-Chamber on Sir Anthony Reper, that the rest, to avoid the same treatment, speedily compounded with the King.

But Ship-Money was the most important thing, and as such regarded by the Court. The King neither would nor could depart from it, for three principal reasons. First, because he should be deprived of a very considerable aid, which he meant to render fixt and customary. Secondly, in desisting from this tax, after levying it two years successively, he would have given cause to believe he had no power to impose it, and consequently had acted contrary to Law. Thirdly, having resolved never more to call a Parliament, it highly concerned him to establish his prerogative in such a manner, that none should dare to contest it. So the City of London having petitioned the Board, that the twenty Ships they were rated at, might be reduced to ten, received a very sharp answer to this effect:

"That the tax of Ship-Money was necessary for the preservation of the State; and the charge was not immoderate: That his Majesty would admit of no excuse, but expected a ready compliance: That the precedents alleged in favour of the City, ought to induce them to obey, rather than to contradict and direct the King."

Notwithstanding all this, there were some that obstinately refused to pay their share of this tax, imagining, no Court of Justice would be so bold as to compel them. As these examples were of dangerous consequence, the King thought proper to publish the opinions of the Judges. To that end, the Lord-Keeper having assembled all the Judges in the Star-Chamber, told them, the King was very well pleased with their endeavours in their several Circuits, to persuade his Subjects to pay Ship-Money; but however, his Majesty hearing that some refused to pay this tax, had thought fit to have recourse to their advice for his direction in this case, and had commanded him to publish their opinions for the satisfaction of his Subjects. Then he caused the King's Letter to the Judges on this subject to be read as follows:

"TRUSTY and well-beloved, we greet you well. Taking into our princely consideration, that the honour and safety of this our realm of England, (the preservation whereof is only entrusted in our care) was, as is now more nearly concerned than in former times, as well by divers counsels and attempts, to take from us the dominion of the Sea, of which we are the sole Lords, and rightful owners, the loss whereof would be of great danger and peril to this Kingdom, and other our dominions; We, for the avoiding of these and the like dangers, well weighing with our selves, that where the good and safety of the Kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole Kingdom in danger, there the charge and defence ought to be borne by all the Realm in general; did, for prevention of so publick a mischief, resolve with our selves to have a royal navy provided, that might be of force and power, with Almighty God's blessing and assistance, to protect and defend this our realm, and our Subjects therein, from all such perils and dangers; and for that purpose we issued forth Writs under our Great Seal of England, directed to all our Sheriffs of all our several Counties of England and Wales, commanding thereby all our said Subjects in every City, Town, and Village, to provide such a number of Ships well furnished, as might serve for this our royal purpose, and which might be done with the greatest equality that could be, in performance whereof, though generally throughout all the Counties of this our Realm, we have found in our

"Subjects great chearfulness and alacrity, which we graciously interpret, as a testimony as well of their dutiful affections to us and our service, as of the respect they have to the publick, which well becometh every good Subject. Nevertheless, finding that some few, haply out of ignorance what the laws and customs of this our Realm are, or out of a desire to be eased, and freed in their particulars, (how general soever the charge ought to be) have not yet paid and contributed the several rates and assessments that were set upon them, and foreseeing in our princely wisdom, that from hence divers suits and actions are not unlikely to be commenced and prosecuted in our several Courts at Westminster: We, desirous to avoid such inconvenience, and out of our princely love and affection to all our People, being willing to prevent such errors as any of our loving Subjects may happen to run into, have thought fit, in a case of this nature, to advise with you our Judges, who we doubt not are all well studied and informed in the right of our Sovereignty; and because the trials of our several Courts, by the formality of pleading, will require a long protraction, we have thought expedient by this our Letter, directed to you all, to require your Judgment in this case, as it is set down in the inclosed paper, which will not only gain time, but also be of more authority to over-rule any prejudicate opinions of others in the point." Given under our Signet, at our Court at Whitehall, the second day of February, in the twelfth year of our Reign, 1636.

The King's Letter being read, the Lord-Keeper commanded the case inclosed to be read, being as follows.

Carolus Rex,

WHEN the good and safety of the Kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole Kingdom in danger, whether may not the King, by Writ under the Great Seal of England, command all the Subjects of our Kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furnish such a number of Ships, with men, victuals, and munition, and for such time as we shall think fit for the defence and safe-guard of the Kingdom from such danger and peril, and by Law compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal and refractoriness? And whether, in such a case, is not the King the sole Judge both of the danger, and when, and how the same is to be prevented and avoided?

The Judges Answer.

May it please your most excellent Majesty,

WE have, according to your Majesty's command, every man by himself, and all of us together, taken into serious consideration, the case and question signed by your Majesty, and inclosed in your royal letter; and we are of opinion, that when the good and safety of the Kingdom in general is concerned, and the Kingdom in danger, your Majesty may, by Writ under the Great Seal of England, command all your Subjects of this your Kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furnish such a number of Ships, with men, victuals, and munition, and for such time as your Majesty shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of this Kingdom from such danger and peril: And that by Law your Majesty may compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness: And we are also of opinion, that in such case your Majesty is the sole judge, both of the danger, and when, and how the same is to be prevented and avoided" (3).

That moreover, his Majesty enjoined the Judges to declare the same in their circuits throughout the Kingdom, that no man might plead ignorance. That however, it was not his Majesty's purpose to stop the actions or suits which have been, or should be brought concerning this matter, but only to prevent such as should bring their action, from being surprized." He concluded with saying, "If any contrary opinion should yet remain among men, it must proceed from those that are Sons of the Law, or from some not towards the Law. Of the

Remark on this matter
 It is easy to perceive, that the artifice of the question proposed to the Judges, lay in the supposition of some imminent danger to the Kingdom, for instance, a sudden and unexpected invasion, which most certainly was not the case then. And yet, upon the bare possibility of such an extraordinary case, the King established a principle, which gave him power to impose not only Ship-Money, but any other tax he should please for the future. The prevarication of the Judges consisted in that, feigning not to see the artifice of the question, they admitted, without examination, the King's supposition, and decided the present case, upon the foundation of an extraordinary and unforeseen emergency, which was not impossible. Two of the Judges however, namely, Hutton and Crooke, were not of the same opinion: but they were persuaded to sign, like the rest, by the consideration, that it was the opinion of the Body. Let it be further observed, that the order to enter the Judges determination in the Courts of Justice, and to publish it through all parts of the Kingdom, was very extraordinary, since thereby the King pretended to make it a sort of Law, by which the Courts were to proceed in judging the suits, which might afterwards be brought upon this affair. This had never been practised, but with regard to Acts of Parliament.

Raffinewich, II. p. 364.
 After these precautions, the King thought himself sufficiently authorized to order such to be prosecuted, as refused to pay Ship-Money. He imagined, none would be so hardy and obdurate as to maintain a refusal before Judges, that had already declared their opinion, and could not give a contrary judgment, without making themselves ridiculous. Nevertheless, there was a Gentleman, who being persuaded, notwithstanding the Judges determination, that Ship-Money was illegal, and contrary to the Petition of Right, resolved to stand the flock, and refuse to pay the tax. Mr. Hampden of Buckinghamshire was the man, who being rated at twenty (1) Shillings, chose rather to be condemned than pay voluntary. This case was argued in the Exchequer Chamber, before all the Judges of England, who were sent for to render the judgment more solemn and authentic. Though the point was only to decide, whether Mr. Hampden should pay twenty Shillings or not, it was, however, the most important case that had ever been argued in any Court of Justice. The thing in question was, to determine, whether the King had power to tax the Subject, without the concurrence of the Parliament, and whether the people were obliged to pay taxes imposed in that manner. Accordingly Mr. Hampden's and the King's Counsel displayed on this occasion, all that wit, learning, knowledge of the Laws, solidity of reasoning, subtlety, chicanery, are able to produce. There were some who pleaded four days together. I do not suppose it is expected, I should insert here all the arguments alleged on both sides, in this famous case. I shall content my self therefore with briefly giving a general Idea of the thing.

Summary of the Argument on both Sides.
 The King's Counsel maintained, That the King was the head of the State, and obliged to protect it when in danger: That this danger might be such as required an immediate remedy. From whence they inferred, that what was alleged in favour of the Laws was not to the purpose, since cases might happen where it was impracticable to observe them: consequently their execution was restrained by necessity, and in these cases of necessity, the King had an absolute power to impose taxes for the defence of the Realm, for which they urged sundry precedents in former Reigns. They added, as the People were not called to the King's Council to give their opinion, whether there was a necessity or not, to impose taxes for the defence of the Kingdom, it followed, that the King, by the advice of his Council, was the sole judge: That his Majesty having deemed it necessary in the present case, he might lawfully impose Ship Money, and his Subjects could not refuse to pay it, without incurring the guilt of disobedience.

The Counsel for Mr. Hampden owned the King was head of the State, and that it was incumbent on him to defend it, but withal maintained, that the law had provided the means to put the Kingdom in a state of safety, by investing the person of his Majesty with several privileges which were intended for that purpose. For instance, the right of being assisted by the possessors of the fees of the Crown, of arming the Cinque ports, fines, confiscations, Tunnage and Poundage, and other customs of which he was actually in possession, and which he had himself declared to be designed for the defence of the seas. Lastly, supposing and allowing all these means to be exhausted, the King had another infallible way, which was to call a Parliament, and demand a supply for all extraordinary occa-

But the King's Counsel chiefly insisted upon the possibility of such sudden and unforeseen cases as would not afford time to call a Parliament. This was their main argument, and the sole foundation of the advantages they pretended to draw from the precedents of former Reigns. Though the principles they would have established tended to put it in the King's power to impose taxes whenever he pleased, they durst not however assert it in plain terms, but limited his power to cases of necessity, of which however they would have the King to be the sole judge, which came to the same thing.

To this Mr. Hampden's counsel replied: 1. These cases were very rare, and granting the King had a power in such cases to impose extraordinary taxes, this necessity ought to be very evident. 2. The King, upon such a supposition, having exacted loans from his Subjects, the Parliament had declared them void, and the King in his answer to the Petition of Right, acknowledged he had no power to demand them. 3. At this present time, there was no reason to fear any sudden invasion, since his Majesty was in peace with all his neighbours. 4. The King himself did not think the danger to be imminent, since the writs sent to the Counties to fit out ships being dated the 7th of August, these ships were not to be at Portsmouth till the first of March following, and consequently the King himself was of opinion, that there was seven months time to prevent the danger, in which space a Parliament might easily be called.

I shall insist no longer upon this subject which would lead me too far, if I should relate the objections, answers, and replies of both sides. It suffices to make this general remark, that the Counsel for Mr. Hampden pleaded express laws, Magna Charta, the subsequent Statutes, and the Petition of Right. The King's Counsel insisted chiefly upon precedents and instances taken from some of the former Reigns, and upon the impossibility in certain cases, of strictly observing the laws. From whence they inferred, that the laws were not so general, but that they were limited by extraordinary cases, and the King being bound to defend the State, ought to be the sole judge of such cases. I don't find they endeavoured to prove that the Kingdom was actually in one of these extraordinary cases, or in imminent danger.

After the cause had been argued many days, from the beginning of November till Christmas, and in the following terms, till May and June, judgment was given against Mr. Hampden, and he was condemned to pay the sum he was taxed at. From thenceforth no one would have recourse to the Law, since it would have been in vain after so solemn a Judgment (2).

Whilst endeavours were using in England to carry the Prerogative-Royal higher than ever, the King resolved to execute at last the project he had formed with regard to Scotland, namely, to reduce the Kirk to a perfect Conformity with the Church of England. This project was formed by King James, at his accession to the Crown of England. Nay, he had found means before he left Scotland to restore Episcopacy, as will presently appear. From that time, the Bishops were always protected and countenanced by James I, and Charles I, who gained the Parliaments to their interest, and moreover exerted their Prerogative in favour of the Prelates; for with them the execution of their design was to begin. As the troubles this affair occasioned in Scotland, were the principal cause of the misfortunes and ruin of Charles I, I think it indispensably necessary to trace them to their origin, and the rather, as they had great influence upon the affairs of England. Besides, though many foreign Authors have spoken of the differences between Charles I, and his Subjects of Scotland, I don't know any that has undertaken to explain this matter clearly, or spoken of it impartially.

The Reformation was received in Scotland by public authority, in the reign of Queen Mary 1560, just before the death of Francis II, and whilst the Queen his widow was yet in France. The first that embraced the reformed Religion in Scotland under the former embracers, were much persecuted, even to the time I have been speaking of, and was not only argued by the King's, and Mr. Hampden's Counsel, but afterwards by the Judges at the Bench, and all of them, (except Ilbert &c.) gave their judgment for the King. Justice Crooke (say Whitlock) of his own Knowledge was resolved to deliver his opinion in the King's seat, that ere he prepared his Arguments: But a few days before, upon discourse with some of his Relations, and much serious thought of the matter, and being heated by his Lady, who told her Husband upon this occasion, that she hoped he would do nothing against his Conscience, for fear of any ill consequences to his Family; and that she would be contented to suffer Want, or any Misfortune with him, rather than be an occasion for him to do any such thing. Upon these, I say, and the like Encouragements, but chiefly upon his better thoughts, he suddenly altered his mind, and was against the King. His Grace &c.

(1) Rafin by mistake says ten.

yet, their number did not fail daily to increase. The Bishops thought themselves bound in conscience to persecute the Reformed. They were at once their adversaries and judges, and consequently it was almost impossible, but this conduct should draw on them the enmity of the sufferers. Accordingly, the decree of the States to admit the Reformation, was no sooner made, than the Bishops lost all their credit and authority. 'Tis certain, the plan on which the Government of the new Church was at first settled, was not favorable to Episcopacy, but it was resolved to conform to the Discipline of the Churches of Switzerland. The Reformed had too great an aversion for the Bishops, to remain under their yoke, especially as there were but very few Prelates that agreed to the late change in Religion. All that was done in their favour was, that the Council ordered, such as would embrace the Reformation should enjoy their revenues, on condition they would maintain Ministers. This plainly shows, that though their revenues were left them, there was no intention to continue the Government of the Church in their hands. It was not the same in England, where the Reformation was received in the reign of Edward VI. Far from being prejudiced against the Bishops, the English, on the contrary, could not but own it was by means of the principal Prelates that the Reformation was established. There was therefore no motive either of hatred or policy to incline the English to throw off Episcopal Government, though they should be supposed to consider it as a thing indifferent. But in Scotland, passions, policy and reason it self required a deliverance from the yoke of the Bishops, who, for the most part, opposed the Reformation to the utmost of their power. So Presbyteries, National Synods, or General Assemblies, were established, to whose care the settling of the Discipline was committed.

These general Assemblies at first had, or, perhaps, usurped, a very great authority. 'Twas even necessary their power should be great, to enable them to defend the Reformation against the perpetual attacks of its enemies. Queen Mary, who arrived soon after in Scotland, was a zealous Catholic, and many of the principal Lords were in the same sentiments. So, the Popish-Party was still very strong, and in condition to obstruct the progress of the Reformation. On the other hand, the general Assembly, which then consisted wholly of Ministers, vigorously supported the new Religion, notwithstanding the efforts of the Catholic-party. Mean while, though they ardently laboured to abolish Episcopacy by public authority, they could not obtain of the Parliament an express Act for that purpose. At last, in 1566, the general Assembly solemnly approved of the Discipline of the Church of Switzerland, and of a parity among the Ministers. This was sufficient to overthrow at once the spiritual Power of the Bishops, but not to deprive them of their temporal privileges. So, from the year 1561, to the deposing of Queen Mary in 1567, the state of the Bishops was very uncertain. They enjoyed their revenues, sat in Parliaments, but their spiritual Jurisdiction was acknowledged by few, though they strove to preserve it. The general Assembly had declared for the Presbyterian Government, but the Parliament had not yet made any decision. Mean while the Bishops were in a very melancholly situation, since the People, who had a great veneration for the general Assembly, could not, after they had been condemned there, acknowledge them for Pastors. So, though their spiritual Authority was not expressly abrogated by the Parliament, it was, as I may say, reduced to nothing, since they could not exercise it, the general Assembly directing all the affairs of the Church. This has occasioned warm disputes concerning Episcopacy, some affirming, it was entirely abolished in Scotland, and others, that it was always continued. One cannot but wonder at a dispute about a fact of this nature, and it is no less surprizing that the Parliament of Scotland should delay above thirty years to settle the Government of the Church by their authority. Wherefore it is absolutely necessary to explain the reasons. Otherwise it would be difficult to understand the causes of the troubles of Scotland, of which we must necessarily speak. But before I descend to particulars, it will be requisite to observe, that we must carefully distinguish the Benefice from the Office of a Bishop.

By the Benefice, I mean the revenues, lands, honours, privileges, in a word, all the Temporalities annexed to the quality of Bishop. By the Office, I understand the Spiritual jurisdiction and functions of the Bishops. If this distinction is not continually remembered, it will be impossible to understand the disputes concerning this matter.

It is certain that from the year 1560, when the Reformation was established in Scotland, to the year 1609, the Church of that Kingdom was governed by Presbyteries, Diocesan and Provincial Synods, General Assemblies, and that even Superintendants were appointed, who continued till the year 1575. It is no less certain, that the general Assemblies condemned and rejected Episcopal Government above thirty years, and, during that time, constantly demanded and earnestly solicited the abolition of Episcopacy, with respect both to Temporals and Spirituals. Nevertheless, from the beginning of the Reformation till 1594, no express Act of Parliament could be obtained, whether for or against Episcopacy, or to approve or reject the Presbyterian Government, if we except the interval between the years 1571 and 1575, of which I shall speak hereafter (1).

Had the general assemblies confined their demands to the abolishing of episcopacy as to the spiritual functions, very likely, they would have easily obtained it. But after the abolition of the episcopal office as far as in them lay, they were not contented with desiring that their Acts might be confirmed by the Parliament, but demanded also that the name of Bishop might be abolished, and the Bishops deprived of all sorts of temporal honours and privileges, as the right of sitting in Parliament and the like. But the Court always opposed it strenuously, because the Bishopsricks and Abbies being filled by the King, he could almost depend upon as many votes in Parliament as there were Bishops and Abbots. For the same reason, the Court, by secret practices, hindered the Parliament from passing any Act to establish Presbtery, and to abrogate the spiritual jurisdiction of Bishops, because it was perceived that this would tend to deprive them of their temporal honours. Not but that, in the actual practice of the Church, Episcopacy was really abolished, and Presbtery established; but however, as long as there was no express Act to abolish Episcopacy, the Bishops and Abbots could not be prevented from voting in Parliament, which was a great advantage to the Court. So the name and title of Bishops and Abbots still subsisted. They held the lands annexed to their benefices, and enjoyed the same temporal privileges with their predecessors, though the office was ceased. This is so true with respect to the Abbots, as to admit of no dispute. The Abbies were in the possession of Laymen, who sat in Parliament by the name and title of Abbots. As to the Bishops, the thing is not so clear, because the title of Bishop was conferred on Churchmen. Had the Court bestowed the Bishopsricks upon Laymen, it would have given the general Assembly too great an advantage, who desired nothing more than a plausible pretence to press the abolition of the temporalities of the Prelates. This demonstrates that a man may justly say, there were, and there were not at the same time Bishops in Scotland. There were Bishops, if it is considered that there were persons so called, who held the lands and revenues of the Sees, and who, as such, had a seat in Parliament. There were none, with respect to the spiritual functions, which were really abolished by the decrees of the general Assembly, and by actual practice, though the Parliament had not expressly repealed them. Upon the confusion of the spiritual and temporal States of the Bishops, all the objections and answers in this dispute wholly turn. Some prove very plainly that Episcopacy subsisted in Scotland, provided they confine the meaning of that word to temporals; but their proofs are very defective with regard to Spirituals. Others evidently show, that Episcopacy was abolished as to the spiritual functions, by virtue of the Acts of the general Assembly. But they cannot prove, it was abolished with respect to the temporal privileges, since the Parliament had not yet made any decision. As neither can produce any express Act of Parliament, at least till such a time, they alledge some from whence they endeavour to draw inferences to their advantage. But this requires a further explication. For the better understand-

(1) For the better understanding of the Sequel of the Scotch affairs, it will not be amiss to give a brief account of the present Government of the Kirk of Scotland. In Scotland are eight hundred and ninety Parishes, each of which is divided in proportion to its extent, into particular districts, and every district has its own ruling Elder, (that is, Men of the principal quality and interests in the Parish) and Deacons, (that is, one who has a competency, and is of a good character for manners and understanding.) A Consistory of Ministers, Elders, and Deacons, is called a Kirk-Session, the lowest Ecclesiastical Judiciary, which meets once a week, to consider the affairs of the Parish. The Minister is always Moderator, but without a negative. Appeals lie from hence to their own Presbyteries, which are the next higher Jurisdictiones. Scotland is divided into Sixty-nine Presbyteries, each consisting of, from twelve to twenty-four parishes. The Ministers of these Parishes, with one ruling Elder, chosen half yearly out of every Kirk Session, compose a Presbtery. They meet in the Town, and choose their Moderator, who must be a Minister, half yearly, he is only Prælocutor. From hence Appeals lie to Provincial Synods, which are composed of several adjacent Presbyteries, two, three, four, to eight. There are fifteen in all. The Members are the Ministers, and a ruling Elder out of every Parish. These Synods meet twice a year, at the principal Town of its bounds. They choose a Moderator, who is their Prælocutor. The Acts of the Synod are subject to the review of the General Assembly, the denser resort of the Kirk of Scotland. It consists of Commissioners from Presbyteries, Royal Burghs, and Universities. A Presbtery of twelve Ministers, sends two Ministers, and one ruling Elder. Of between twelve and eighteen, it sends three, and one ruling Elder. Of between eighteen and twenty-four, sends four, and two ruling Elders. Of twenty-four, sends five, and two ruling Elders. Every Royal Burgh sends one Elder, and Edinburgh two. Every University sends one Commissioner, usually a Minister. The Assembly meets once a year.

1636. ing this matter we must necessarily distinguish the various circumstances of Scotland, from the beginning of the Reformation; namely, in the Reign of Mary; in that of James VI. during his minority; under the same Prince after assuming the Government, according to the several Ministers or Favorites, by whose advice he was directed; and lastly, under the same Prince after his accession to England. The state of the Bishops depended all this time on the interests of those who were in the administration.

The Reign of Mary lasted till the year 1567. This Queen was a zealous Catholic, and yet, so long as the Earl of Murray her natural brother had any credit with her, the Reformation was not attacked. But towards the end of her Reign under Bothwell's administration, the general Assembly lost ground. However, in 1566, they made the aforementioned decree, to approve of the discipline of the Churches of Switzerland, and of a parity among the Ministers, which entirely destroyed Episcopacy. But the Queen regardless of this decree, openly restored the Archbishoprick of St. Andrew's, notwithstanding the opposition of the Assembly.

The interval from the deposing of Queen Mary in 1567 to 1573, was a time of troubles and discord, under the administration of several Regents, whose authority was not firmly established: so that it was very difficult for the Parliament effectually to settle the discipline of the Church. All that can be said is, that they rejected not what was established by the general Assembly, though they gave not their actual consent to it. On the other hand, in 1572 and 1573 the Regents, for some private views, caused some Acts to be passed in favour of Episcopacy, but which were afterwards repealed. These Acts were as follows:

Nelson, T. I. p. 141. By the first, which is the 4th of the Parliament holden in 1572, it is declared, The Archbishops and Bishops have the authority, and are ordained, to convene and deprive all inferior persons being Ministers, who shall not subscribe the Articles of Religion, and give their oath for acknowledging and recognising of our Sovereign Lord and his authority, and bring a testimonial in writing thereupon, within a month after their admission.

By the 48th Act of the same Parliament, it is declared, That Archbishops and Bishops have authority at their visitations to design Ministers' glebes.

By the 54th of the said Parliament, Archbishops and Bishops were authorized to nominate and appoint at their visitations, persons in every Parochin for making and setting of the taxation, for upbuilding and repairing of Kirks and Kirk-yards, and to convene, try, and censure all persons that shall be found to have applied to their own use the Stones, Timber, or any thing else pertaining to Kirks demolished.

By the 55th of the Parliament in 1573, Archbishops and Bishops were authorized to admonish persons married, in case of desertion, to adhere, and in case of disobedience, to direct charges to the Minister of the Parochin to proceed to the sentence of Excommunication.

There appears in these four Acts some signs of the Episcopal jurisdiction, or at least, that the Parliament did not look upon episcopacy as entirely abolished. But on the other hand, if the Bishops actually exercised their functions at that time, where was the necessity of the Parliament's authorizing them to act in most of the things specified in these Statutes? But there is here a stronger objection still against the Bishops. And that is, they who have thus cited these Acts, have curtailed them, and passed over in silence the Superintendants who were joined with the Bishops, from whence it is inferred, that the Bishops were empowered only as commissioners of the Parliament.

I proceed now to the time of King James's majority, or at least, of his assuming the Government, though he was not really of age. The Earl of Morton having lost his head in 1581, the Duke of Lenox and Earl of Arran ruled the young King as they pleased. They were expelled afterwards by the Ruthens, but the King recalled the Earl of Arran, who became more powerful than ever. It is certain, this Favorite's design was to dilige the King his master from the interest of England, and to countenance the Duke of Guise's project to invade Elizabeth by Scotland. It was the Favorite's business therefore to curb the too great power of the general Assembly, who strongly opposed the execution of this project. The best way to succeed, was, not only to protect the Bishops, but also to give them authority over the Ministers, that these might be more humble. To that end, he procured the four following Acts in the Parliament of 1584.

Nelson, T. I. p. 142. The 130th ran: That none of his Majesty's Lieges and Subjects presume or take upon hand to impugn the dignity and authority of the three Estates of this Kingdom, whereby the honour and authority of the King's Majesty's supreme Court of Parliament, past all memory of man, hath been continued, or to seek or procure the innovation or diminution of the power and authority of the same three Estates, or any of them in time coming, under the pain of Treason.

By the 131st, All judgments and jurisdictions, as well in spiritual as temporal causes, in practice and custom, during the twenty-four years by-past, not approved by the King and three Estates in Parliament, are discharged; and it is defended, That none of his Highness's Subjects of whatsoever quality, estate or function they be of, spiritual or temporal, presume, or take upon hand to convocate, convene, or assemble themselves together for holding of Councils, Conventions, or Assemblies, to treat, consult, or determine in any matter of Estate, civil or ecclesiastical, (except in the ordinary judgments,) without his Majesty's special commandment, or express licence had and obtained to that effect.

By the 132d, Bishops are authorized to try and judge Ministers guilty of crimes meriting deprivation.

The 133d ordains, That Ministers exercising any office, beside their calling, be tried and adjudged culpable by their Ordinaries.

It is manifest, that the intent of these four Acts was to abolish the general Assemblies with the Presbytery, and restore the Episcopal Government. But it must be observed,

1. These Acts were made during the tyranny of the Earl of Arran, who had formed the project of admitting into Scotland a popish army, and it is no credit to the Bishops, that he should think them proper to countenance that design. 2. The general Assembly solemnly protested against these Acts, maintaining, it was not in the power of the King and Parliament to settle or alter the Government of the Church, without the Church's consent; that it could not be justly pretended, that four Bishops, who were present in this Parliament, and whose spiritual power was long since abolished, and four Laymen, under the name of Abbots, were lawful Representatives of the whole Church, or that their consent to these Acts should be considered as the content of the national Church. 3. These four Acts were repealed by the Parliament of 1592.

I must proceed now to another juncture, when King James, freed from the Earl of Arran's tyranny, having relinquished the chimerical projects suggested by that favorite, was better acquainted with his true interests. I mean the year 1587. Though, at the beginning of this year, Elizabeth had beheaded Mary, King's James's mother, he was soon comforted by the hopes of possessing one day the Crown of England, which he was afraid of losing, in case he continued to form projects against Religion, as he had done during the Earl of Arran's minority. This same year, therefore he gave the royal assent to the Act of Annexation, whereby were annexed to the Crown, all Lordships and Baronies pertaining to whatsoever Archbishops, or Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Nuns and Monks; reserving always to Archbishops, &c. and others possessors of great benefices of the estate of Prelates, and which before had or hath vote in Parliament, the principal castles and fortresses. Nelson, T. I. p. 162.

It may be inferred from this Act, that the depriving the Bishops of their Lands, was depriving them withal of the right of sitting in Parliament, since that right was founded entirely upon the possession of the Baronies. Nay, it seems that the title of Bishop begun now to be conferred on Laymen, which gave them only the possession of the chief Castle belonging to the See. At least we find, that shortly after, the Bishoprick of Cathurgis becoming vacant, by the death of Robert Earl of March, the King's Uncle, the general Assembly prayed his Majesty to give that See to a Clergyman.

At last, in 1592, the Parliament repealed and annulled 12. p. 163. not only the fore-mentioned Acts of 1583, but also such as were contrary to the Discipline established, approving, ratifying, and confirming the Assemblies, Presbyteries and Synods, with the discipline and jurisdiction of the Kirk, as most just and godly, notwithstanding whatsoever Statutes, Acts, Canons, civil or municipal Laws made in the contrary. Further, they abrogated all Acts, granting commission to Bishops, and other Judges constitute in ecclesiastical Causes; and ordained presentation to Benefices, to be directed to Presbyteries, with power to give Collation thereupon.

This Act was confirmed in 1593, and the power of Presbyteries solemnly acknowledged by the Parliament in 1594, Act 129.

Was not this sufficient to abolish Episcopacy entirely? 15. 4. By the Act of 1587, the Bishops were dispossessed of their Lands; and by that of 1592, they lost all manner of jurisdiction. For how could the power of the Presbyteries and general Assemblies, be consistent with the Episcopal jurisdiction? And yet, there were persons who still bore the name of Bishop, by reason of their holding Castles formerly belonging to the Sees: for it does not appear, upon what other account they could be called Bishops: Nay, very likely, several of these sorts of Sees were in Layhands; at least, the Abbies and Priors were certainly so.

But things remained not long upon the same foot. Whether the general Assemblies usurped too much authority, after they were freed from the Bishops, or for some other reasons, the King formed new projects, and resolved to re-1636. store the Bishops. At that time, as at many other junctures, the Court had so great an influence over the Parliament, that almost whatever was desired, was enacted.

The King therefore so ordered it, in 1597, that the privilege of a voice in Parliament was granted to the whole Kirk; and under that name to Bishops and Abbots, even as in times of Papistry. As to the office and spiritual Government of Bishops, the Parliament remitted them to the King and the Assembly, intending not to derogate from the provincial and general Assemblies, and other whatsoever Presbyteries and Sessions, nor from the Discipline established in the Kirk.

The Act shows, the Bishops had lost their right of seat in Parliament, since there was occasion to give it them again. By virtue of this Act, they resumed their places in Parliament, and even Sir Robert Spotswood a Layman took his seat there, as Abbot of New-Abbey. The King desired nothing more at that time, than to introduce the Bishops and Abbots again into the Parliament. But he did not stop there, as will be seen presently.

Mean while, as the general Assembly still continued to oppose strenuously the promotion of Churchmen to posts of authority in the State, and as the People seemed more inclined to follow the determinations of the general Assembly, than those of the Parliament, it was to be feared, this dissension would at last raise disturbances in the Kingdom. To prevent this inconvenience, the King caused the general Assembly, held at Montrose, in the year 1600, to be pressed so earnestly to consent to what the Parliament of 1597 had granted to the Bishops, that they were obliged either to comply, or break entirely with him. They approved this Act therefore, but upon certain conditions, the substance whereof was, that the Bishops should act in Parliament only as Commissioners or Deputies of the Kirk, and should be subject to the general Assembly. The conditions laid upon them were these:

They shall obtain a commission from the general Assembly, to act in their name in Parliament; and shall swear to observe the following articles.

They shall move nothing, without having an express order from the Kirk, on pain of being deprived of their office.

They shall not consent, nor not by their silence, to any thing against the liberties of the Kirk, under the same penalty.

They shall be accountable to each general Assembly, for their behaviour in the discharge of their commission, since the last Assembly; be obliged to demand the approbation, and submit to the determination and censure of the Assembly without any appeal, on pain of being pronounced infamous and excommunicated.

They shall be satisfied with that portion of their Benefices, the King shall please to allot them for their subsistence, that they may not be a burden to the Ministers that are already, or shall be hereafter settled in their Benefices.

They shall not suffer their Benefices to go to decay, or dispose of any thing belonging thereto, without the consent of the King and the general Assembly, and shall allow that inhibitions be directed to them for that purpose.

They shall exercise the functions of Pastors in their own Congregations, and be subject to the censure of their own Presbyteries and the general Assembly, like the rest of the Ministers that are not commissioned.

In the administration of Discipline, and in every thing relating to the Government of the Kirk, they shall usurp no power or jurisdiction beyond what is adjudged to other Ministers, on pain of forfeiting their office.

In Presbyteries and general and provincial Assemblies, they shall demean themselves in the same manner as other Ministers, and shall be liable to their censure.

None of those that sit in Parliament shall be members of the general Assemblies, unless they be expressly deputed by their Presbyteries.

It is plain from these conditions, inserted in the Act of Parliament made to confirm that of 1597, what was the intention of the Montrose Assembly, in agreeing out of compliance to the King, that the Bishops should sit in Parliament. The Bishops embraced what was for their advantage, namely, the Assembly's consent to the privilege that was granted them: but never performed any of the conditions. The Court was then favorable to them, but it was still more so, after the King's accession to the Crown of England.

As soon as James I. became King of England, he formed, as I said, the project of establishing in the Kirk of Scotland, the Discipline and Hierarchy of the Church of England. To accomplish this design, it was necessary to restore the Bishops to all the rights they had enjoyed before the Reformation, and accordingly he resolved to begin with this restoration. His power in the Parliament was very great, during the last years of his being in Scotland; but it was nothing in comparison of what it was after his accesion to the throne of England. It suffices to say, that this influence was in proportion to the means he had of dispensing to his Scotch Subjects favours, which he had not been able to grant them in their Country. We have seen, in the History of his reign, how he showered his bounties upon them, which the English could not forbear to complain of. It is not therefore very strange, that the Members of the Parliament of Scotland should be at his devotion. He made use of his credit in the year 1606, and obtained the following Act of Parliament:

"The ancient and fundamental policy, consisting in the maintenance of the three Estates of Parliament, being of late greatly impaired, and almost subverted, especially by the indirect abolishing of the Estate of Bishops by the Act of Annexation: albeit it was never meant by his Majesty, nor by his Estates; that the said Estate of Bishops, being a necessary Estate of the Parliament, should any way be suppressed; yet by dismembering and abstracting from them of their Livings, being brought in contempt and poverty, the said Estate of Bishops is hereby restored, and reintegrated to their ancient and accustomed honour, dignities, prerogatives, privileges, lands, teindres, rents, as the same was in the reformed Kirk, most amply and free, at any time before the Act of Annexation; rescinding and annulling all Acts of Parliament made in prejudice of the said Bishops in the premises, or any of them, with all that hath followed, or may follow thereupon, to the effect they may peaceably enjoy the honours, dignities, privileges and prerogatives competent to them or their Estate since the Reformation of Religion."

Thus far however it concerned only the Temporalities, there not being in the Act a single word from whence it might be inferred that the Parliament restored the Bishops to their Spiritual functions, or ancient jurisdiction. The general Assembly pretended indeed, that the King and Parliament could make no alterations in the Spirituals, without the Kirk's consent: but they had no power to hinder the King and Parliament from giving the Lands of the Crown to whom they pleased, and from admitting into the Parliament such as they thought proper. But the King did not intend to stop there.

In 1609 the King, under colour of confirming the Act of 1606, obtained of the Parliament another Act, which in confirming the other, added a clause, whereby the Bishops were restored to all their former Authority, Privileges and Jurisdictions. By virtue of this last Act it was that the Bishops took possession of the Government of the Kirk, notwithstanding the conditions of the Montrose Assembly, which they little regarded, and supposed to be annulled by this Act. But the general Assembly protested in form against this Act, affirming the Parliament had not power without the Kirk's consent, to restore a Spiritual office that had been abolished. They protested also against the promotion of Churchmen to civil Posts, as pernicious to Religion. Their protestation was rejected: but however it was printed and dispersed throughout the Kingdom.

The general Assembly's opposition had a great effect upon the people, who loved not the Bishops, and for fifty years had been used to the Presbyterian Government. They complained, the Parliament had been gained to impose upon them Episcopal Government, which was odious to the whole nation, not only without consulting the Kirk, but even against her will. This opposition convinced the King, that notwithstanding the authority of the Parliament, he should find it very difficult to reduce the people of Scotland to obedience, so long as the general Assembly opposed the restoration of the Bishops. He resolved therefore to cause a general Assembly to be held at Glasgow in 1610, where he took care to gain a majority of votes, and of which the Bishops were the chief Directors. The Assembly thus disposed, agreed that the Bishops should resume all their Spiritual functions, with the Government of the Church. After that, in 1612, the King called a Parliament, who, upon the consent of the Glasgow Assembly, passed an Act, whereby the Bishops were restored to all their Spiritual rights.

The adversaries of the Bishops, astonished at this proceeding, were forced to be silent, the torrent being too strong, to be opposed. Besides, the general Assemblies being grown less necessary, since the Bishops had the Government of the Church, the King very seldom gave them leave to meet, and when he did, it was after he had taken all necessary precautions to be assured that the Bishops would be the directors and managers. In 1617, he moreover obtained of the Parliament an Act, whereby it was ordained, that the Bishop should be elected by the Chapters, and consecrated with the accustomed rites, that is with those introduced of late years. As during the troubles in Scotland on account of Religion, the people, as will presently appear, loudly complained of the restoration of the Bishops, the consent of the Glasgow Assembly in 1610 1637. was continually objected to them. For this reason the first general Assembly that King Charles was obliged to grant in 1638, found no better method to evade this objection, than to declare the Glasgow Assembly void from the beginning.

Such was the state of Episcopacy in Scotland, from the beginning of the Reformation to the reign of Charles I. who, at his accession to the throne, found it fully established, though contrary to the bent of the Nation in general, as it plainly appeared afterwards. James I. as I observed, had formed the design of putting the Kirk of Scotland upon the same foot with the Church of England. He had made great progress therein, and Charles I. purified the same design with still more ardor than his Father. But as hitherto I have related only what concerns the Bishops, it is necessary, before we speak of the troubles of that Kingdom, which first commenced in 1637, to mention the measures successively taken by the two Kings to accomplish their Design.

After James I. had entirely reformed Episcopacy in Scotland, he resolved to finish his work by degrees. To that purpose, he began with the five articles mentioned in the History of his Reign, which he caused to be approved by the general Assembly of Perth, by means as illegal perhaps as violent (†). The Bishops governed the Presbyteries, by making themselves Moderators, so that it was not possible to chafe any for Commissioners to the Assembly general, but such as they thought proper. However this be, the five articles being approved, the King, who by long experience was well acquainted with the genius and character of the Scots, thought it necessary, before all things, to curb the petulance and boldness of the Ministers, for fear they should raise disturbances in the Kingdom. The People had for them a great veneration, which was even increased after the reformation of the Bishops, because these last were more careful to maintain their grandeur and power, than gain the love of their Flocks. To compass his ends, the King set up in Scotland a High-Commission, like that in England, but which, till then, was unheard-of in Scotland. As the Scots had never given their King the title of supreme head of the Church, as was done in England, there had been no occasion to establish a High-Commission in Scotland, to exercise the Supremacy in the King's name. But James I. who was very apt to stretch his Prerogative, readily believed, he had no less right to exercise the Supremacy in Scotland than in England, though till now he had never thought of any such thing. Be this as it will, by means of this new Court, which was at first very severe, and excommunicated and deprived the Ministers for the least offence, he kept them so in awe, that not a man dared to stir. This, with the favours bestowed upon such as showed a readiness to countenance his designs, made him almost secure of success in his undertaking, which daily advanced. Nothing was wanting to complete it, but the causing the English Liturgy and Canons to be received in Scotland, after which, there would be no difference between the Churches of the two Kingdoms. This was as easy to be accomplished, as what had been done already. So the King having convened a general Assembly at Aberdeen, it was represented to them, that divine service was performed in the Kirk of Scotland after an indecent manner, every Minister having liberty to compose public prayers, and use what expressions they pleased, which was liable to great inconveniences: That it would therefore be proper to compile a Liturgy to be used in every Church in Scotland, to the end the people might everywhere pray with one heart and one mouth. It must be observed, that it was not moved to receive the English Liturgy, but only to compose one proper for the Kirk of Scotland. Whereupon several members of the Assembly believed, they might without danger agree, that a Common-Prayer-Book should be used, and the rather, as the reformed Churches of Geneva, Switzerland, France and Germany, had their several Liturgies, though very different from that of the English. This motion being approved, the Assembly appointed Commissioners to compile the new Liturgy, and it may well be imagined, this nomination was agreeable to the King's desire. These Commissioners, most of whom were Bishops, after spending a considerable time in framing this Liturgy, only copied that which was neither been agitated nor received either by general Assembly or Parliament; they therefore desired that they might have the happiness of enjoying their Religion, as it had been reformed in that land, and authorized by his Majesty.

In the second the petitioners complained, "That whereas they were attending a gracious answer to their former supplications against the Service-Book, they were surprized and charged by publick proclamation, to depart out of the Town within twenty four hours thereafter under pain of rebellion; by which their fears of a more severe and strict course of proceeding were augmented. Wherefore they were constrained to remonstrate, that in the book of Common-Prayer, drawn up and set forth by the Archbishops and Bishops, were fown the seeds of divers superstitions, idolatry, and false doctrine, contrary to the Religion established in the Realm by divers Acts of Parliament. That in the Book of Canons, &c. it was ordained, That whosoever shall affirm, that the form of worship inserted in the book of Common-Prayer, and administration of the Sacraments, doth contain any thing repugnant to the Scriptures, or are corrupt, superstitious, or unlawful in the service and worship of God, shall be excommunicated, and not be restored, but by the Bishop of the place or Archbishop of the Province. That besides it is ordained, that where in any of the Canons there is no penalty expressly set down, the punishment shall be arbitrary, as the Bishop shall think fittest. All which Canons were never teen or allowed in any general Assembly, but were imposed contrary to order of law appointed in the Realm for establishing constitutions ecclesiastical. Lastly, that the Bishops had not only begun to urge the acceptance of those things, by injunctions given in provincial Assemblies, but also by open Proclamation and charge of Horning (1). Wherefore the Petitioners craved, that this matter might be put to the trial, and the Prelates be taken order with according to the Laws of the Realm, and not suffered to sit any more as Judges until the cause were tried and decided according to Justice."

The King thought not fit to answer these Petitions, being on the contrary determined to punish severely the authors of the late tumults. However he commanded the Privy-Council to publish a Proclamation on this occasion, supposing, though without any foundation, it would be capable of satisfying the people. After mention in the Proclamation of the Lords Petition, &c. it was said, "His Majesty in a just resentment of that foul indignity, [the late insurrections at Edinburgh] hath been moved to declare the signification of his Majesty's gracious intentions, in giving to his Subjects such satisfactory answers to their petitions, as in equity might be expected from so just and religious a Prince: But yet his Majesty being unwilling that his loyal and faithful Subjects should be possessed with groundless and unnecessary doubts and fears, his Majesty is pleased out of his goodness to declare, That as he abhorreth all superstition of Popery, so he will be most careful, that nothing be allowed within his Majesty's Dominions, but that which shall tend to the advancement of true Religion, as it is at present professed within his most ancient Kingdom of Scotland; and that nothing is or was intended to be done therein, against the laudable Laws of this his Majesty's native Kingdom."

It must be observed, that according to the King, the true Religion was that of the Church of England. That by the Religion at present possessed, he meant, only that which contained the Hierarchy and Episcopacy; and by the Laws of the Kingdom, he understood those that were enacted after the King his Father's accession to the Crown of England, and of which I have spoken above. It is at least certain the Male-contents gave this sense to his general expressions, from whence they inferred, he was very far from desisting from what he had undertaken, and still farther from pardoning the late disorders at Edinburgh. Wherefore, they resolved, to take measures, not only to secure themselves from the King's repentment, but also to cause all the innovations complained of to be abolished (2).

Some time after, the Council having removed the Session to Sterling, the King sent them another Proclamation, with orders to have it publickly read in the principal Towns of the Kingdom. The Proclamation was to this effect:

"WE find our Royal authority much injured [by some late petitions and declarations given in to our Council against the Book of Common-Prayer, and Canons of the Church,] both in the matter and in the carriage thereof; whereby we conceive these of our Nobility, Gentry, and others, who kept and assisted these meetings, for contriving and forming the said Petitions, to deserve and be liable to our high censure, both in their persons and fortunes; yet because we believe, that what they have done herein is out of a preposterous zeal, we are graciously pleased to dispense therewith, and with what may be their fault or error therein, to all such as, upon signification or declaration of our pleasure, shall retire themselves as becometh good and dutiful Subjects: To which purpose our will and pleasure is, that you discharge all such convocations and meetings in time coming, under the pain of Treason. And also that you command, charge, and inhibit all our Lieges and Subjects, that none of them presume, nor take in hand, to resort nor repair to our burgh of Sterling, nor to no other burgh where our Council and Session sits, till first they declare their cause of coming to our Council, and procure their warrant to that effect. And as concerning any petitions that shall hereafter be given us, upon this or any other subject, we are likewise pleased to declare, we will not shut our ears therefrom, so that neither the form nor matter be prejudicial to our Regal authority."

This proclamation was not capable of satisfying the male-contents. First, there was not a word concerning the subject of their Petition, and by that they could perceive, the King had no design to suppress the Liturgy and Canons. Secondly, the King represented as a great condescension, the Pardon he was pleased to grant for their fault in presenting a Petition without his leave. This showed them, that, according to the King's intention, obedience was their only course for the future. Thirdly, the King clearly intimated to them, he would receive no more Petitions, since he declared, he would reject such as should by the matter or form be prejudicial to his authority. Was not this saying, he would reject all? In short, they saw plainly, the King, in forbidding all meetings, fought only to disunite and hinder them from concerting measures to obtain their desires. I own, I don't see how the King could flatter himself that such a proclamation should produce the effect he expected, and the rather, as there were not in Scotland forces sufficient to support his authority. The male-contents were not so stupid as to be ignorant of the King's design. So, on the morrow, the Earls of Hume and Lindsey, accompanied with a great croud of Nobles and People, came and publickly read in Sterling a protestation against the proclamation, the presence and authority of the Council not being capable of hindering it. The same protestation was publickly read at Liubow and Edinburgh, immediately after the proclamation had been published there.

In this protestation the malecontents said, "They had presented a Supplication on the 23d of September, and another upon the 18th of October; as also a Remonfrance December the 19th, against the Service-Book, and the Canons, as well as against the Archbishops and the Bishops, as their Parties, having the same day presented a Declinator against them, to prevent their being Judges in their own cause. But the Council having refused to admit of this Declinator, they found themselves obliged to make the following protestation.

"1. That they might have immediate recourse to the “ 5. That if any inconveniences should fall out there-

“ 6. That their requests tended to no other end, but to “ the preservation of the true reformed Religion, and the “ laws and liberties of his Majesty's Kingdom.”

Hitherto the King and the Council of Scotland had flattered themselves that the male contents might be curbed by acts of authority. But this protestation plainly showed they were too powerful to be compelled to obedience, by orders of the Council, or by Proclamations. They were perverted, the King fought only to surprize them, and intended not to desist from his undertaking. On the other hand, they had conceived an extreme aversion to the Bishops, looking upon them as the authors of the Evils, the Church laboured under. The more they saw the King was against their assembling themselves to consult in common about their affairs, the more they perceived the necessity of their union, without which they would be infallibly oppressed one after another. So, before they could know the effect of their protestation upon the King, as they expected no good from the Court, they erected at Edinburgh, which was at their devotion, several Tables (as they called them) to manage their affairs. There were four principal ones: The first of the Lords; the second of the Gentry; the third of the Burroughs; and the fourth of the Ministers. [And the Gentry had many subordinate Tables, according to their several Shires.] These Tables consulted of what they thought fit to be proposed at the General Table, consisting of Commissioners chosen from the other four Tables. Never was Sovereign more punctually obeyed than this General Table, by all who disapproved the innovations introduced into the Church for thirty or forty years past, that is, by almost the whole Kingdom.

The first thing that proceeded from these Tables, was the famous Covenant, or general Band taken by the Scots, for maintenance of their Religion from all innovations. For the better understanding what this Covenant was, it must be observed, that in 1580, whilst the Duke of Lennox and Earl of Arran, the King's favorites, were suspected of ill designs against the Protestant Religion, the general Assembly thought it necessary to draw up a Confession of Faith, and caused it to be subscribed by all the Subjects, and by the King himself, to whom they presented a very humble Petition on that occasion. As James could not reject this request, without confirming the People's suspicions, which might have been of dangerous consequence, subscribed the Confession of Faith himself, and ordered it to be subscribed by persons of all ranks. This was done in the years 1580 and 1581, and the subscriptions were renewed in 1590, with an additional clause, whereby the subscribers engaged to maintain the true Religion and the King's Person.

It was this Confession of Faith of 1580 that was revived this present year 1638, by order of the General Table, and offered to all sorts of persons to sign. Hitherto, there was nothing that could give the King just cause of complaint, at least, as to the matter, since it was the same Confession that the King his Father, and the whole Kingdom had signed in 1580 and 1581. It is true, as to the form, he could justly complain, that his approbation had not been demanded. But the Tables were not satisfied with the bare Confession of Faith, they added also an obligation, whereby the subscribers bound themselves by oath, to maintain Religion as it was in 1580, and to reject all the innovations introduced since into the Church. This was directly contrary to the King's designs. Part of the Oath which, being annexed to the Confession of Faith, was called the Covenant, that is, contract, agreement, or league among the subscribers, was as follows:

“ Finally, being convinced in our minds, and confessing with our mouths, that the present and succeeding generations in this land are bound to keep the forefaid national oath and subscription inviolable. We Noblemen, Barons, Gentlemen, Burgesses, Ministers and Commons under subscribing, considering divers times

“ before and especially at this time, the danger of the true Reformed Religion, of the King's honour, and of the publick peace of the Kingdom, by the manifold innovations and evils generally contained, and particularly mentioned in our late supplications, complaints, and protestations, do hereby profess, and before God, his angels, and the world, solemnly declare, that with our whole hearts we agree and resolve all the days of our life constantly to adhere unto, and to defend the forefaid true Religion, and forbearing the practice of all novations, already introduced in the matters of the worship of God, or approbation of the corruptions of the publick government of the Kirk, or civil places and power of Kirkmen, till they be tried and allowed in free Assemblies, and in Parliaments, to labour by all means lawful to recover the purity and liberty of the Gospel, as it was established and professed before the forefaid novations: And because after due examination we plainly perceive, and undoubtedly believe, that the innovations and evils contained in our supplications, complaints and protestations, have no warrant of the word of God, are contrary to the articles of the forefaid confessions, to the intention and meaning of the blessed Reformers of Religion in this land, to the above-written Acts of Parliament, and do sensibly tend to the re-establishing of the Popish Religion and tyranny, and to the subversion and ruin of the true Reformed Religion, and of our liberties, laws and estates; we also declare, that the aforesaid confessions are to be interpreted, and ought to be understood of the forefaid novations and evils, no less than if every one of them had been expressed in the forefaid confessions; and that we are obliged to detest and abhor them, amongst other particular heads of Papistry abjured therein: And therefore from the knowledge and conscience of our duty to God, to our King and Country, without any worldly respect or inducement, so far as human infirmity will suffer, wishing a further measure of the grace of God for this effect, we promise and swear by the great name of the Lord our God, to continue in the profession and obedience of the forefaid Religion; that we shall defend the same, and resist all these contrary errors and corruptions, according to our vocation, and to the utmost of that power that God hath put into our hands all the days of our life. And in like manner, with the same heart we declare before God and men, that we have no intention or desire to attempt any thing that may turn to the dishonour of God, or the diminution of the King's greatness and authority; but on the contrary, we promise and swear, that we shall to the utmost of our power, with our means and lives, stand to the defence of our dread Sovereign the King's Majesty, his person and authority in the defence and preservation of the forefaid true Religion, Liberties and Laws of the Kingdom; as also to the mutual defence and assistance, every one of us of another, in the same cause of maintaining the true Religion, and his Majesty's authority, with our best counsels, our bodies, means, and whole power, against all sorts of persons whatsoever, &c.”

This Covenant, like an alarm-bell, brought all the Scots together that were dissatisfied with the Government, that is, almost the whole nation. It was subscribed by the great men and the people, except the Privy-Counsellors, the Judges, the Bishops, and such Ministers as were dignitaries in the Church. These were, a little before it, vested with all the authority both in Church and State, the King verily believing, that to have those for him, who were in the publick places and offices, was sufficient to awe the people. But when the breach was once made, by the publication of the Covenant, the number, not the quality of adherents, was to be considered, and then the Royalists were not above one in a thousand; so that the King, Council, Judges, and Bishops, were on a sudden without authority and power. To urge the Laws was in vain: the Covenant was the sole Law, the people would follow with respect to Religion, as being bound by a solemn oath. Thus, the King's authority being no longer regarded, and his promises mistrusted by the People, as tending, in their opinion, only to deceive them, it is not strange, that the King's after-endeavours to extinguish the flame should prove fruitless. I have dwelt the longer upon the rise of the Scotch troubles, because it seemed to me absolutely necessary to the understanding of what passed afterwards in England. For the same reason, I am also obliged to speak of the effects produced by the Covenant in Scotland: but I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible.

Though the standard of Rebellion was, as it were, erected in Scotland, and the King did not well see how he should free himself from these difficulties, he could not yet desist from his project. He still hoped the gathering storm might, by some artifice, be dispelled. So prepossessed was he in favour of the royal authority, that, though he saw 1638. it little regarded, he imagined, his declarations and proclamations, worded, for the most part, in ambiguous terms, would be sufficient to reduce the Scots to their duty. But he did not consider, that before the breach, the People were in a manner obliged to shut their eyes, and seem not to see what they saw: but that, when the breach was once made, the Male-contents were too wise to be taken in his snares, and too bold or insolent to refrain from publishing the artifices that were intended to amuse them. The King deceived himself also in another thing. As the Scots perpetually pleaded their Laws, he thought to silence them, by alledging on his side, the Laws enacted within forty years, not considering that these same Laws were the principal cause of their complaints, and what they desired to be annulled. So, in producing these Acts of Parliament, whereby the innovations had been approved, he only confirmed their belief, that he designed to support them, and consequently, it was necessary to use some violent means to make him desist. The King had for him the Laws in force, since they were never repealed; and the People believed, they might rightfully cause to be abolished those Laws, imposed on them by corruption, artifice, and violence, complaining, that these new Laws were enacted in violation of the old. Thus, both sides complained of the breach of the Laws.

The Male-contents
Rejoice,

p. 650, &c.

The Male-contents said, "James and Charles had established Episcopal Government in the Kirk, contrary to her content, who ought to have been consulted in such an affair, which concerned Religion alone, and could be decided only by the general Assembly. But instead of following the settled rules of the Kirk, the Bishops were first introduced into the Parliament, and then, by means of the Bishops, whatever was desired, was enacted, though the King and Parliament had no right to appoint new offices, and new jurisdictions in the Kirk, without the consent of the Kirk herself, represented by the general Assembly, and not by five or six Bishops, with as many Lay-abbots, who were allowed a seat in Parliament. To accomplish this design, several other artifices were used, as bribing the Glasgow Assembly, abolishing general Assemblies, erecting a High-Commission, inconsistent with the liberties of the Kingdom. In a word, the King had exercised, and still did exercise a power repugnant to the privileges of the Subjects, in imposing upon them a Liturgy and Canons, detested by almost the whole nation, without asking the consent of Kirk or Parliament. By this management, no less violent than artful, the Government of the Kirk was entirely altered, not only without the People's advice, but against their will, as plainly appeared by the great number of subscribers to the Covenant, and the few that refused to sign it. They thought themselves therefore authorized, by virtue of their privileges, to demand the restoration of Religion in its purity, such as it was in 1580, and the abolition of all innovations. If the King complained that this Covenant was made without his participation and consent, he ought to blame none but himself, since he had reduced them to this necessity, by refusing to hearken to their most humble Petitions. This Covenant seemed contrary to Law, only because it was supposed, the People's privileges were not invaded, though the contrary was evident. Scotland was a Monarchy, consisting of a happy mixture of the King's prerogatives and the People's privileges. This union was so absolutely necessary, that it was not possible to separate these two things, without destroying the constitution of the Government. It was very true, if the People would enjoy their privileges, they were to pay all due obedience to the King: but it was no less true, that the King could require this obedience, only as he protected the People in their liberties. If they should be so senseless, as to pay a punctual obedience to Laws advantageous to the Crown, whilst the King made no scruple to subvert the Constitution, by assuming an absolute power, they should only supply him continually with arms, to reduce them to perfect slavery. In short, the design of their Covenant was not, as it was industriously intimated, to rob the King of his just rights, but to hinder him from stretching his Prerogative beyond the limits of the Law."

The King's
Rejoice,
Annals,
p. 651, &c.
Nelson,
T. I. p. 176.
&c.

The King alledged on his side, "The Scots, under the false pretence that their privileges were violated, were running into open rebellion, by refusing to pay the King due obedience. In signing a League directly contrary to the rights of the Crown, they usurped a power which was so far from being legal, that it was even repugnant to the Laws. Their complaints in general about the breach of their privileges were groundless, since there was but one article in question concerning Religion, that is, not the Doctrine, but only the Discipline of the Church. Episcopacy had been immemorably established in the Church of Scotland. It had indeed been under a sort of eclipse since the Reformation, at a time when the 1638. regulation of the Discipline was more considered, than the reformation of the Doctrine. Presbyterian Government had been established in the Church of Scotland by the authority of general Assemblies only, who were not Sovereigns, and whose decrees were of no force, till approved and confirmed by Parliament. From 1561 to 1592, the Parliament never approved of it, and if the Parliament, held that year, had their reasons to confirm it, the following Parliaments had stronger to abolish it, and restore Episcopal Government. Herein nothing was done contrary to law or custom, since no man could be ignorant that the Parliament, which represents the whole nation, has power to annul and repeal all former Acts. The Male-contents could not question this maxim, without grossly contradicting themselves, since their Presbyterian Government could be founded only on the Act of Parliament made in 1592, whereby were repealed all the ancient Laws in favour of Episcopacy. How then was it possible to show, that the Parliament of 1592 had power to abolish Episcopacy, and that of 1612 no right to abolish Presbyterian Government? As to the general Assemblies, to which was ascribed an absolute power in matters of Religion, this power was either natural or acquired. If natural, whence was it, that before the Reformation, such Assemblies, consisting of Presbyters only without Bishops, were never heard of? If it was an acquired power, they must have received it from the Nation, that is, from the King and Parliament. Consequently they were subject to the Parliament, and their Acts could be valid but as confirmed by the Parliament. If they had received the unlimited power ascribed to them, where was the Act that granted it, and why was it not produced? Nay, though such an Act should be produced, that would not be sufficient, unless it was shown withal to be irrevocable; otherwise it would still be evident, they depended upon the Parliament, and consequently their Acts had not the force they pretended to give them, unless approved by the Parliament, and the approbation unrepealed. These general Assemblies were first instituted at the Reformation, for the direction of affairs, and the ease of the King and Parliament, in the examination of what was to be changed or altered with respect to Religion. But it was too true, they had usurped by degrees an authority very prejudicial to the Crown, and improper for Subjects. As to the Liturgy, mentioned by the Male-contents in so contemptuous a manner, as if it was intended to be introduced on purpose to lead the People gradually to Popery, he had but one thing to plead in its favour, namely, that it was composed by Bishops, who suffered martyrdom for the Protestant Religion, and therefore it was very impertinent to say, such persons had a mind to restore Popery, when they were manifestly using their utmost endeavours to purge the public worship of every thing tending that way. If the King his Father and himself had desired to introduce the Liturgy into the Church of Scotland, it was because they believed it conducive to the edification of the Faithful, and to the banishing of the indecency with which divine Service was performed in that Church, where every Minister made what prayers he pleased, and often, without any premeditation, which was liable to great inconveniences. Herein he had nothing in view but the good and benefit of his Subjects of Scotland, and it was injuring him in the highest degree, to impute to him a design of introducing Popery, which on the contrary he abhorred." As to the book of Canons, he defended himself, in the manner before-mentioned, and therefore it is needless to repeat it.

After seeing the reasons of both parties, it will not be difficult to conceive the motives of their conduct, without my being obliged hereafter to display them. I shall only add, that the Male-contents having resolved to improve the weakness of the King's party, and the advantage given them by their Covenant, to abolish the innovations complained of, used not so much the most just and legal means, as those they believed most proper for their ends. On the other hand, the King constantly adhered to the Acts of Parliament, by which these pretended innovations were established, feigning not to see, in that respect, the least cause of complaint against himself, or the King his Father.

Things being come to the point above-mentioned, by the King the almost universal subscription of the Covenant, the King resolved to send the Marquis of Hamilton into Scotland, to represent his person under the title of his High-Commissioner. He imagined this Scotch Lord, being invested with so eminent a character, would by his credit and industry reduce the people to obedience, without giving them any real satisfaction, being still very unwilling to desert from his project. The Tables having notice of this, doubted not but the King's aim was to abuse and surprise them, and therefore they used all possible means to divert the in-1638. pending danger. I shall not descend to particulars, but content my self with saying, that the High-Commissioner was received by the male-contents with great coldness and little respect, and that they prepared, on the contrary, to withstand him vigorously, in case he offered to assert his authority.

Mean while, the King having sent to Scotland a ship laden with arms (1) for Edinburgh Castle, the Tables resolved to seize them, fearing, the King intended to surprize them, whilst he should amuse them with negotiations. This Resolution could not be executed, because the King's party, having notice, instantly unladed the vessel, and carried the arms to Dalkeith, where the Council then was. For this reason the Tables set a guard near the gate of the Castle, to prevent these arms from being carried in. At the same time, the male-contents received two ships freighted with arms for their service. The King would hardly digest this affront. But the male-contents did not think it prudent to be exposed to a surprize, on pretence that the rupture between the King and them was not yet intire.

The High-Commissioner being come to Edinburgh, offered these three propositions to the consideration of the Male-contents.

1. That they should expect to hear in the King's name for accommodating their grievances?

2. What might be expected from them for returning to their former obedience?

3. That they should renounce and deliver up their late Covenant.

To which they answered,

1. That they insisted upon a general Assembly, and a Parliament.

2. That they could not return to his Majesty's obedience, since they had never departed from it.

3. That they would sooner renounce their Baptism than the Covenant (2).

The Marquis had brought with him a Declaration, which however he was to make use of but in case of necessity, because the King was unwilling to promise the least concession to the Scots, unless forced. But the Marquis soon perceived it was not possible to bring the male-contents to obedience, without amusing them at least with the hopes that the King would have some regard to their grievances. He therefore thought proper to publish the Declaration, though it evidently appeared by the very expressions, that the King would not properly be obliged to any thing. What follows is the most material part of the Declaration, and shows wherein consisted the King's concession:

And for further clearing of scruples, we do hereby assure all men. That we will neither now, nor hereafter, press the practice of the Service-Book, or the forefaid Canons, nor any thing of that nature, but in such a fair and legal way, as shall satisfy all our loving Subjects, that we neither intend innovations in Religion or laws; and to this effect have given order to discharge all Acts of Council there ancient. And for the High-Commissioner, we shall to rectify it, with the help and advice of our Privy-Council, that it shall never impugn the Laws, nor be a just grievance to our loyal Subjects; and what is further fitting to be agitated in general Assemblies and Parliament, for the good and peace of the Kirk, and peaceable government of the same, in establishing of the Religion at present possessed, shall likewise be taken into our royal consideration, in a free Assembly and Parliament, which shall be indicted and called with our best convenience."

The King must have been ill-informed of the disposition of the Scots, to imagine that a Declaration with so many restrictions and ambiguous expressions should be capable of contenting them. This Declaration was no sooner proclaimed at the market-cross of Edinburgh, but the Tables caused an answer in form of a Protestation to be publicly read in the same place, the substance whereof was:

1. That no Proclamation or Declaration could settle their fears, nor secure them from the re-entry of any evil or innovation.

2. That they positively insisted upon a general Assembly and a Parliament, which the King did not promise to call.

3. That the Proclamation did not mention their complaints and grievances, but under the name of disorders, faults, and misdemeanours, &c.

4. That the King took it for granted he had abundantly and sufficiently satisfied their fears, by his two former Proclamations, and by his present Declaration.

5. That this Proclamation supposed them guilty of an unlawful combination, or rebellion.

6. That it did not disallow nor discharge any of the innovations complained of, but left liberty to any Prelate or person to practise the same.

7. That it plainly evidenced his Majesty's intentions of pressing the practice of those innovations in a legal way, that is, according to those Laws which were the subject of their complaints.

8. That his Majesty did not promise to abolish, but only to rectify the High-Commission, with the advice of his Privy-Council, implying the King's power, with consent of his Council, to establish any judicatory within his Kingdom, without consent of the three Estates convened in Parliament.

The High-Commissioner being better informed of the affairs of Scotland, by what he had seen with his own eyes, thought it necessary to go himself and acquaint the King. He made therefore a journey to Court, and returned shortly after, with a power to call a general Assembly, and a Parliament. But as for the Assembly, he would know beforehand what persons it should be composed of, and what was to be debated. The Tables rejected this limitation, as tending to render the Assembly useless. They likewise told him, if the King refused to convene a general Assembly, they believed they were sufficiently authorized to call one themselves.

Probably, the King's High-Commissioner had orders to grant a general Assembly, if it could not be avoided, but however to use his utmost endeavours, either that the Tables should desist from their demand, or at least, if he granted an Assembly, to clog the favour with conditions that should prevent the King's designs receiving any prejudice. It was doubtless in obedience to this order, that he presented to the Tables eleven (3) Articles, as so many conditions on which he was willing to call an Assembly. As he had very likely good spies, he knew pretty well what the Tables intended to do in order to reap great advantages by a general Assembly, and these eleven conditions solely tended to render their measures ineffectual. The Tables being composed of the most able persons in Scotland, easily discovered the High-Commissioner's aim. They replied therefore to these eleven Articles, so as to show him it would be very difficult to surprize them. Nevertheless he was not discouraged, and under colour of complying with the male-contents, reduced the eleven conditions to these two, which however contained the substance of the eleven, and tended to the same end.

1. That no Laymen should have voices in chusing the Ministers to be sent from the several Presbyteries to the general Assembly, nor any but the Ministers of the same Presbytery.

2. That the Assembly should not go about to determine things established by Act of Parliament, otherwise than by remonstrance or petition to the Parliament."

To understand the end and motive of the first of these conditions, it must be observed, that it was very plainly perceived in Scotland, since the Glasgow Assembly in 1610, how easily the King could secure a majority of votes among the Ministers, whether by fears or hopes, or by present and real favours. For this reason the Male-contents had resolved not to let the Ministers have the sole direction of the Affairs of Religion, and therefore had erected four Tables, whereof that of the Ministers which was but the third, could not determine of any thing without the concurrence of the other three, and the approbation of the General-Table. Moreover when the Tables had demanded a general Assembly, they had at the same time resolved, that this Assembly should be composed not only of the Ministers, but also of Lay-Elders, who should be persons of authority, and whose number should exceed that of the Ministers. In short, they designed the Ministers who were to be sent to the Assembly, should be elected not only by the Ministers themselves of each Presbytery, but also by the Lay-Elders. The Marquis of Hamilton, who had intelligence of their intention, laid therefore a double snare for them in the former of his two conditions. The first snare consisted in that, feigning to be ignorant of their design to send Lay-Elders to the general assembly, he supposed it was to be composed of Ministers only. The second consisted in that he pretended, the nomination of these Ministers for the Assembly should be made by the Ministers alone without the participation of the Lay-Elders. He thereby endeavoured to break the measures, the Tables had judged necessary to secure themselves from the Articles of the Court.

As to the second condition, it was evident that by things

1638. already established by Acts of Parliament, he understood all the innovations complained of, which had been introduced since the year 1606, and which for the most part were, as I said, founded upon Acts of Parliament. So; by this second condition, he broke still more directly than by the first, the measures the Tables might take, to cause these innovations to be examined and declared such by the general Assembly. Wherefore the Tables rejected these two conditions, regarding them as so many snares to surprize them, since they could not accept them without being at the King's mercy. This affair was come to that point, that the Tables were satisfied, the innovations complained of were really innovations, and of their right to require their abolition. The thing was only to devise the properest means to procure the satisfaction they demanded. On the other hand, the King did not in the least doubt the validity of the Acts of Parliament, whereby these pretended innovations were established. And perhaps he still less questioned his power to introduce the Liturgy and Canons. But his concern was to find the properest means to maintain his own and the Parliament's authority, and to dispel the storm that was gathering in Scotland.

The High-Commissioner clearly perceiving, he had to deal with men who were upon their guard, and that it would be difficult to surprize them, resolved to take a second journey to England, to inform the King of the state of affairs. By putting the male-contents in hopes the King would grant such a general Assembly, as they desired, he obtained with great difficulty, that the election of Commissioners should be delayed till his return, which was fixed to the 21st of September. During his absence, the Tables expecting only new snares, or fresh delays from the Court (1), resolved that a general Assembly should be held, either with the King's permission, if he would grant it, or without his consent, and that the election of Commissioners should be the 22d of September. In this interval, they sent to all the Presbyteries, directions in eight Articles, not to chuse any suspected Minister, and to elect every where Lay-Elders, who should be persons of authority, and more numerous than the Ministers. In a word, they took all possible measures to have an Assembly at their devotion, wherein they perfectly succeeded, the King's party being every where so weak, that they were not in condition to oppose it successfully.

The High-Commissioner being returned to Scotland with new instructions, immediately ordered a Proclamation to be published, containing in substance these three principal articles.

1. That his Majesty revoked the Service-book, the book of Canons, the High-Commission, and the five Articles of Perth.
2. That for the future none of his Subjects, whether ecclesiastical or civil, should be liable to the trial and censure of the Parliament, or general Assembly.
3. That persons of all ranks should be required to sign the Confession of Faith of 1580, with the oath he had annexed, but very different from that of the Covenant.

After publishing this Proclamation, the High-Commissioner summoned a general assembly to meet at Glasgow the 21st of November this year 1638, and a Parliament at Edinburgh the 15th of May the next year 1639.

It was not without reason that the male-contents expected some new snare from the King. Though the Confession of Faith which the King ordered to be signed, was exactly the same with that prefixed to the Covenant, the oath [for General-Band] annexed by the King, imported, that they [swore] to maintain the Religion at present professed, which was utterly destroying the oath of the Covenant, whereby the subscribers were bound, to reject all the innovations introduced since 1580. This snare was so palpable, and so very injurious to the King's affairs, that the Council, to prevent its ill effects, were forced to publish a Declaration, that the meaning of the oath was, that they swore to maintain the Religion professed in 1580. But notwithstanding this, the Tables caused a protestation against the Proclamation to be publicly read, to show, as they pretended, that the King acted not with sincerity; that by certain ambiguous clauses, restrictions, and additions, he took away with one hand, what he gave with the other; and reserved to himself a liberty to maintain at a more convenient season, the innovations he seemed to depart from.

During the interval between the publishing of the Proclamation, and the general Assembly, the High-Commissioner and Council used all possible endeavours to make all sorts of people sign the Confession of Faith as sent by the King, and the Tables on their part forgot nothing to oppose it. But there passed at this time, a thing of great importance, which must not be omitted. Many Lords, Barons, Gentlemen, Ministers, Burgesses, who were not Commissioners to the general Assembly, presented to the Presbytery of Edinburgh, an information against David Lindsay Bishop of Edinburgh, and at the same time against all the rest of the Bishops. The substance of this information, which contained several articles, some whereof doubtless were much aggravated, was, that Lindsay and his brethren had not performed the conditions required of them by the Montrose Assembly. The design of this information was to prevail with the Presbytery to summon, as they did accordingly, the Bishops to appear before the Assembly which was to be held at Glasgow. For as the abolition of Episcopacy was now resolved, it was necessary that the general Assembly should have some ground or pretence to prosecute and try the Bishops. And for this the information was intended.

The general Assembly met at Glasgow on the day appointed, consisting of such members as the Tables had desired or rather prescribed (2). The King's party was so weak that they durst not make any opposition, and the matters to be debated had been directed by the Tables, who had sent their instructions to the Commissioners. In a word, as in the Assembly of 1610, and the following ones, King James had so managed as to have every thing transacted as he pleased, the Tables had now taken the same precautions to cause whatever they did not approve to be annulled. Wherefore the Marquis of Hamilton's grand aim, was visibly to raise contests and disputes which should afford him occasion to dissolve the Assembly.

The first day was spent in reading the King's Commission. The second day, a Letter from the King containing nothing extraordinary was read (3). Then the Assembly proceeded to the choice of a Moderator: but at the same time Dr. Hamilton presented from the Bishops, a Declinator, that is, a Protestation against the legality of the Assembly, and the High-Commissioner would have this Declinator read first. But it was objected, there was no Assembly without a Moderator, and consequently it was necessary to begin with his election. The High-Commissioner seeing he could not prevail, protested against the refusal to read the Declinator before the choice of a Moderator, and ordered his protestation to be entered. Before the Moderator was chosen, the High-Commissioner entered a second protestation, that this choice should prejudice neither the King's Prerogative, nor any Law of the Kingdom, nor bar the King from taking legal exceptions, either against the person elected, or the election itself. After that, they unanimously chose Mr. Alexander Henderson a Minister for Moderator.

The third day, the High-Commissioner urged, that the Bishops Declinator might be read. But he was told, the Assembly was not formed till the Commissions of Elections were examined, and the Commissioners that were present, known to be duly authorized. This affair was of more importance than it seems at first sight. As the Declinator contained reasons to show that the election of all the Commissioners, or at least of the greatest part, was null, it was easy to perceive, that these reasons would come too late after the power of the Commissioners should be allowed, and they admitted for members of the Assembly. The High-Commissioner not being able to obtain his desire, entered a third protestation on that head, and a fourth, the same day, against the choice of Mr. Archibald Johnston, for Clerk-Register of the Assembly (4), because he had been Clerk of the General Table at Edinburgh.

The fourth day, the Commissions of elections were examined. But the High-Commissioner first entered a fifth protestation, to take exception against their elections in his own due time.

The examination of the Commissions not being ended the fourth day, was continued the fifth. It may be imagined, that the elections which were agreeable to the instructions of the Tables, were generally approved, and that means were not wanting to weaken or entirely reject those which were otherwise.

The sixth day, the 27th of November, was read at last the Bishops Declinator, wherein they pretended to prove by several reasons the illegality of the Assembly. After the reading of the Declinator, the High-Commissioner caused to be read some other protestations, sent him from 1638. several places, against the Lay-Elders right of voting in the general Assemblies, and Elections of the Ministers by Laymen.

The seventh day, the 25th of November, it was moved in the Assembly, to debate, whether the Bishops cause should be judged, notwithstanding their Declinator. As after several Speeches on this subject, the Moderator was going to put the question, the High-Commissioner rose up and said, since they pretended to assume a right to judge the Bishops, he could not give his consent, nor stay any longer with them. Then after a long Speech, wherein he represented his Majesty's gracious condescensions in his last Declaration, he dissolved the Assembly in the name, and by the authority of the King, alledging these four principal reasons.

1. Lay-Elders were introduced into the Assembly to vote there [which was not warranted by the Laws, practice or custom of the Church or Kingdom, and] which supposing there were such a law, or custom, had been discontinued for above forty years.

2. The Ministers chosen Commissioners, were elected by Lay-Elders, contrary to custom and practice.

3. The few Commissioners chosen contrary to the instructions of the Tables, had been thrown out by mere cavils.

4. The cited Bishops were to be tried by persons who had already declared against them.

It may be observed concerning these reasons, that the High-Commissioner was not ignorant, before the meeting of the Assembly, of the manner of electing the Commissioners, or that the Bishops cause was to be brought before the general Assembly. Consequently these reasons would have been as strong to hinder the Assembly from meeting, as they were to dissolve it the seventh day. But he was unwilling to give the male-contents the advantage of justly complaining, that he had amused them with the hopes of an Assembly, which he intended not to hold. He expected to find in the proceedings of the Assembly, causes or pretences to dissolve it, and his frequent Protections were for many expedients to use, which he intended at a proper season. But as, in all appearance, he had the King's positive order to dissolve the Assembly, in case they should take upon them to try the Bishops, and as this was properly the first thing that was moved, it was not in his power to stay for other pretences. He was forced therefore to use the same reasons for dissolving, as might have served to hinder the meeting, of the Assembly.

The King found not in the Assembly the obedience he expected, though with little reason; considering how the Scots stood affected. It was easy to foresee, that the Covenanters who had resolved to hold an Assembly, though the King should not have given his consent, were not disposed to break up after a seven-days-session, without having finished any affair. They had a mind to abolish Episcopacy entirely, with all the innovations introduced into the Kirk since the last forty years, and after all the steps they had taken, it was not likely they would suddenly relinquish their projects, and return to Petitions and Supplications which hitherto had proved fruitless. They saw moreover, that the King used all sorts of means to prevent his consenting to their desires, or if he feigned to have any condescension for them, it was only to gain time, and that he reserved to himself the power of maintaining the innovations at a more favorable opportunity. This was their belief at least, and the sudden dissolution of an Assembly so earnestly desired, confirmed them in it. Wherefore they were unwilling to neglect so fair an opportunity. They had the whole Kingdom on their side, and knew that the great discontents which reigned in England, would not suffer the King to make any considerable efforts against Scotland. Upon these accounts it was that the Assembly of Glasgow continued their session by their own authority, notwithstanding their dissolution in the King's name, and a Proclamation published the next day (1), which they were contented to answer as usual by protestation. Thus the King had the mortification to see his authority contemned, and the Acts of Parliament procured by his Father to introduce the Hierarchy into the Kirk, serve for foundation to a Scottish rebellion. Hence Sovereigns should learn not to introduce any innovations but what are absolutely necessary. 'Tis certain, the Reformation had been established in Scotland upon the Presbyterian plan, in the same manner as in Switzerland, Geneva, France, Germany, the Low Countries: that this same Government subsisted there till James VI. became King of England: that this Prince was possessed with the design of introducing episcopal Government, and that Charles his son and successor was no less eager to pursue the same project. The question is not to know, whether episcopal Government be good or bad in itself; but supposing it good and even excellent, the point is to know, whether the Church of Scotland could not be without it, and whether Charles I. had sufficient reason to hazard the Peace of that Kingdom and his own, in order to support a design, the execution whereof was not absolutely necessary.

The general Assembly, having continued their session themselves, contrary to the King's order, lost no time to begin and finish what had been resolved in the Tables. Here follows a short list of some of their Acts, which will show how much they endeavoured to abolish, as far as in them lay, all innovations.

"An Act bearing the Assemblies Protestation against the dissolution thereof.

"An Act annulling the six Assemblies holden at Linlithgow 1606, and 1608, at Glasgow 1610, at Aberdeen 1616, at St. Andrews 1617, at Perth 1618.

"An Act declaring the nullity of the Oath, exacted by Prelates, from such as are instituted to Benefices.

"An Act condemning the Service Book.

"An Act condemning the Book of Canons.

"An Act condemning the High-Commission.

"Two Acts containing the Deposition and Excommunication of fourteen Bishops.

"Act clearing the meaning of the Confession of Faith, made Anno 1580, as abjuring and removing Episcopacy.

"An Act declaring the five Articles of Perth to have been abjured, and to be removed.

"Act restoring Presbyteries, provincial and general Assemblies to their constitution of Ministers and Elders, and their power and jurisdiction contained in the Book of Policy.

"Act concerning the power of Presbyteries, admission of Ministers, and chusing of their Moderators.

"Act against the prophaneation of the Sabbath, for want of afternoon's exercise.

"Act against those who speak or write against the Covenant, or the Assembly.

"Act condemning Chapters, Arch-deans, preaching Deacons, and such like popish trash.

"Act condemning all civil Offices in the persons of Ministers separate to the Gospel, as to be Justices of Peace, sit in Session or Council, to vote or ride in Parliament.

"Act appointing the Commissioners to attend the Parliament, and Articles, which they are to represent in the name of the Kirk to the Estates.

"An Act discharging Printers to print any thing ancient the Acts of the proceedings of the Assembly, without a warrant under the Secretary's hand.

"Act ordaining the Covenant to be subscribed, with the Assemblies declaration.

"Act discharging all subscription to the Covenant, subscribed by his Majesty's Commissioner, and the Lords of the Council.

"Act renewing the privileges of yearly general Assemblies, and oftner (pro re nata) and appointing the third Wednesday in July 1639, in Edinburgh, for the next general Assembly.

"Act that none be chosen Ruling-Elders to sit in Presbyteries provincial, or general Assemblies, but those who subscribe the Covenant."

These Acts show, the King was not in the wrong when he said, the general Assemblies of Scotland had usurped a kind of sovereignty in religious affairs, since this is seen boldly to annul, by their authority, things established by Acts of Parliament. But, as I said, in the dispute between the King and his Scotch Subjects, the concern was not to examine the right of the parties, but to use the most effectual means to attain their respective ends. This was the course taken by the general Assembly of Glasgow. As the Parliament was to meet the next May, and they knew they should be supported, they were willing to give the Parliament an occasion to abolish all the innovations complained of, upon the foundation of its being the general ferment of the Kirk. It must be farther remarked concerning this Assembly, that before the Sessions began, the Tables had used their utmost endeavours to hinder the signing the confession of Faith of 1580, with the obligatory clause annexed by the King. But as this did not prevent its being subscribed by many, the Assembly of Glasgow thought proper to explain the Confession, and decide, that it virtually contained the abolition of Episcopacy, though the Bishops were not mentioned. So by this explication, they who had signed the Confession by the King's order, had subscribed to the abolition of Episcopacy Government.

The High-Commissioner, hearing the Assembly of Glasgow were upon this explication, made haste and published a quite different one, wherein he endeavoured to prove, that Episcopacy subsisted in 1580, and consequently, the signing of the Confession of that year, could not be deemed an abjuration of Episcopacy. A very long and particular answer was made to this explication. But without entering into a discussion of the facts alleged on both sides, I shall only observe, that what I said heretofore, concerning the ambiguity in the name of Bishops, must be chiefly applied to these two Papers. The Marquis proved very well, that the name, title, temporal rights of the Bishops, were not abolished by the Parliament, till the year 1580; but he very lamely proved, that till then the Kirk of Scotland had been governed by Bishops. The Benefice had subsisted till that year, but the Office was abolished, if not by Act of Parliament, at least by the custom and practice of the Kirk. On the other hand, the authors of the answer evidently showed, that Episcopacy, as to the Office, was abolished by the general Assemblies, as far as lay in their power, and by the practice of the Kirk: but they could not prove that the order of Bishops was abolished till the year 1592.

(1) Which made their sitting any longer Treason. Nelson, p. 123.

Two Parties
in England.

Hitherto I have endeavoured to show the rise of the troubles of Scotland, to the end it may be the better conceived, how far the English ought to have been concerned in the war which broke out presently after, between the King and his Subjects of Scotland. There were two parties in England, the Courtiers and rigid Episcopals, who being religiously attached to the Hierarchy, verily believed, the Scots were in the wrong to reject so oblatinously this Hierarchy, established thirty years by Acts of Parliament. These looked upon the Scots as rebels, and wished to see them punished as such. The other party consisted of Puritans: under which name were included not only the Church-Puritans, but also the State-Puritans, that is, all those that were dissatisfied with the Government, and thought the King assumed a power which belonged not to him. This party, though without posts or employments, and continually oppressed, was however much superior in number to the other, as plainly appeared afterwards. These, far from disapproving the conduct of the Scots, said, that the Kings, James and Charles, having manifestly introduced innovations into the Kirk, the Scots could not be justly blamed for desiring, things might be restored to their former state. When, therefore, the history of these troubles is read, the Authors are to be distinguished. Some represent the conduct of the Scots as a real rebellion, flowing from a settled design of breaking all the bands of subjection and obedience to the King, and of utterly destroying monarchical Government. Others, on the contrary, speak of the King's behaviour to the Scots as really tyrannical, and pretend he had no less design to render himself absolute in Scotland than in England.

The King's party in Scotland was extremely weak, and consequently he had no other way left, than to use the forces of England to reduce the Scots to obedience. Accordingly, he took this course (1). As soon as he heard that the general Assembly of Glasgow continued their secession by their own authority, and that the people approved of their conduct, he resolved to levy an army in England, to reduce the Male-contents of Scotland to their duty. But as the English might naturally ask, by what reason were they bound to venture their lives, in defence of the interests of the King in Scotland, he thought this objection should be obviated, by supposing the Scots to have already levied an army for the invasion of England. From thence he inferred, it was incumbent upon him to provide for the defence of the Kingdom, by raising sufficient forces to repel the attacks of his enemies. There was little probability that the Scots should think of invading England, if they were left unmolested, but it was necessary to excite the English with the dread of an imaginary danger.

H. Capell's
Letter to James.

The King thought not proper to call a Parliament to enable him to raise the forces he wanted. Experience had taught him, that he was not to expect any great assistance from the Parliament, unless he would alter his maxims, and redress the People's grievances, which he did not intend. On the contrary, he flattered himself that he should easily reduce the Scots, and then be still more absolute in England. He chose therefore to suppose a defensive war, and on that supposition summoned the Nobility to attend him at York the 1st of April following, each with as many Horse as he could raise, and to inform the Court within a fortnight, of the number that could be brought. In this manner, the Kings of England formerly prepared to withstand the invasions with which they were threatened. But the ancient manner and this differed very much in two respects. First, there were certain Crown-lands, the possessors whereof were obliged to find the King Troops, according to the frontiers that were like to be invaded. Most of these lands lay in the northern Counties, because the neighbourhood of Scotland, which was the only place from whence invasions were to be feared by land. But tenants of lands lying in West of Scotland, were not bound to furnish troops for the defence of the northern borders against the Scots; or the tenants of the North, to defend the southern frontiers when threatened by the French. Whereas Charles I. without making any distinction of Counties, or putting any difference between those that did, and those that did not hold their Crown-lands, directed his summons to all the Nobles in general. Again, this method of raising troops was antiently used, only when the Kingdom was actually invaded, or in danger of being so, or at least, when there was a war proclaimed, and judged necessary for the defence of the Kingdom. But Charles I. was contented to suppose an invasion, though contrary to all appearance, that the Scots intended to invade England, and under colour of defending the Kingdom, his real design was to attack the Scots, on account of his own interests.

But, as having troops was not sufficient without money to furnish them, the King used two ways, besides those already in practice, as Ship-Money and others, to increase his revenues. The first was to demand voluntary contributions of the Clergy, by means of the Archbishop of Canterbury. Laud wrote for that purpose a circular Letter to the Bishops and all the Clergy, to exhort them to contribute liberally for the defence of the Kingdom, which was in extreme danger of a Scottish invasion. He added, by way of posscript, that his Majesty expected from the Clergy a larger sum than what they were wont to give in the usual way. The second means used by the King was, to put the Queen upon writing to the Catholics, to incite them to aid the King on this urgent occasion. Besides the Horse to be brought by the Nobility to York, all the Counties were obliged to find such a number of Foot, Horse, Dragoons, Artillery Horse, and a certain quantity of Ammunition. The whole amounted to nineteen thousand four hundred and eighty three Foot, twelve hundred and thirty three Horse (2), besides the troops of the Nobility, and thirteen hundred and fifty Horses for the carriages. Moreover, the King equipped a Fleet of sixteen men of war, the command whereof was given to the Marquis of Hamilton, who was come back to his Majesty.

The King departed for York the 27th of March, [his Coronation-day] and on the 9th of April published a Proclamation, to revoke sundry monopolies, licences, and commissions, which he had granted by his Letters-Patents. But very likely, this was only to amuse the People, and the Proclamation was not executed, since, the next year, he published another, to revoke the same monopolies, which should have been abolished by this. On the 25th of May, the King reviewed his army, which consisted of nineteen thousand six hundred and fourteen men, besides five thousand on board the fleet, his own guards, and the garri- sons of Berwick and Carlisle.

Whilst the King was making his preparations, the Scots were not idle. They had also drawn forces together (3), but their hopes were not so much built on their army as on their friends in England, and even at Court. Some have suspected the Marquis of Hamilton, one of the King's Favorites, of not having, at this juncture, faithfully served his master. As it was the King's interest to exasperate the English against the Scots, and persuade them that these last were in manifest rebellion; it was the Scots interest on the contrary to show, they had never any ill design against England, and if they took arms, it was only in their own defence. They knew the success of the war depended upon the assistance England should freely give the King, and not upon the aid he should extort by force in virtue of his prerogative. And therefore their friends in England had advised them to mind two things especially. First, to clear themselves as fully as possible from the crime of rebellion, which the King laid to their charge. Secondly, to avoid every thing that might excite the English to engage in the war, for fear of giving the King the advantage of being able to say, they were undertaking an offensive war. They punctually followed these two advices, the former, by dispersing in England, by means of their emissaries, a great number of Papers, wherein they set forth with all possible clearness the causes of their discontents, and the King's intentions. They forgot not to insinuate, that it concerned England no less than Scotland, to oppose the arbi-

(1) This was the course the Marquis of Hamilton had from the beginning designed him to take; namely, to send his Fleet quickly with two thousand Land Soldiers in it, and send down Arms to the Northern Counties of England; to garri- son Berwick with seven hundred men, and Carlisle with five hundred; and to come himself in person with a Royal Army. They followed the second advice, by obeying with entire submission a Proclamation published by the King in Scotland, to forbid the Scotch army to approach within ten miles of the borders of England. By this obedience they evidently shewed, the war was not offensive on their side. It is not unlikely, that some of their friends had counselled the King to publish this Proclamation, on purpose to offer them an opportunity to give this proof of it.

But this was not the only advantage the Scots reaped from the counsels given the King by their secret friends. He was persuaded, that their obedience to his Proclamation was the effect of their fear; and was thereby induced to send another Proclamation to Edinburgh, commanding the Scots to lay down their arms on pain of being declared guilty of Treason, offering however pardon to all who should comply with his orders, and return to their duty. Nothing could be more prejudicial to him in Scotland, than such a Proclamation, which shewed he required a speedy obedience without any conditions; but the Magistrates of Edinburgh would not suffer it to be published. The same notion, that the Scots were intimidated, caused him to commit another error, in detaching the Earl of Holland with three thousand foot and a hundred horse into Scotland by way of Kelley. Lesley, General of the Scots, being informed of the Earl of Holland's march, sent five or six thousand foot and five hundred horse against him, who made him halt on a sudden. He sent however a Trumpet to command them to retire according to their promise. It was answered, he would do much better to withdraw himself; and indeed, he found it proper to take their advice. The Earl of Holland's march, which came to nothing, freed the Scots from their promise of not approaching the borders, and on the morrow, Lesley marched towards Kelley, with about twelve thousand men.

The King began then to perceive that the obedience of the Scots was not owing to their fear, and that hitherto he had followed wrong counsels. Wherefore he took a sudden resolution to stand upon the defensive, and that very day writ to the Marquiss of Hamilton, who was in the Frith with the fleet, to order him not to begin hostilities, tho' he had been sent there to take all possible advantages upon the Scots. But this resolution was taken a little too late, after what he had just done, at least if he had no other design than to make the publick believe he had undertaken the war only in his own defence. But he had a stronger reason not to engage too far. For, upon notice of the Scots approach, most of his Generals had advised him not to give battle, though he was much superior in number of Troops, which he could ascribe only to their unwillingness to venture their lives in his service.

The two armies were so near one another, that a battle was expected every day, though, in truth, both sides were alike resolved to stand upon the defensive. But when it was least expected, the Lord Dumfries, a Scot, came to the King's camp with a Trumpet, and presented to his Majesty, in the name of the Scots, a very humble Petition, intreating him to appoint Commissioners to negotiate a Peace. The King answered, he had sent a Proclamation to Edinburgh, whereby he offered his Subjects of Scotland the free enjoyment of their Religion and Laws, with a pardon to such as should return to their duty: that this Proclamation had been rejected with contempt; but he desired it might be published in the Scotch army, after which, he would be graciously pleased to hear their Petitions. The Lord Dumfries returning with this answer, the Scotch General ordered the Proclamation to be publicly read in the army, which done, the King appointed six Commissioners to treat with the Scots (1).

In the conference held the 11th of June, between the Commissioners of both parties, the Scots desired three things; namely,

- "1. That the Acts of the late Assembly at Glasgow should be ratified in the ensuing Parliament.
- "2. That all matters ecclesiastical might be determined by the Assemblies of the Kirk, and matters civil by Parliament.
- "3. That his Majesty's ships and forces by land be recalled; that all persons, ships, and goods arrested be restored: And that all excommunicate persons, incendiaries and informers against the Kingdom, who had caused these commotions for their own private ends, might be returned to suffer their deserved censure and punishment."

Upon this the King desired the Scots to give in writing the reasons and grounds of their demands, the Lord Levendon, one of the Scottish Deputies, said, Their desires were only to enjoy their Religion and Liberties according to the ecclesiastical and civil Laws of the Kingdom, and that they would not insist upon any point that was not so warranted; humbly offering all civil and temporal obedience to his Majesty, which could be required or expected of loyal Subjects. The King replied, If this was all that was desired, the Peace would soon be concluded: And indeed, he granted immediately what the Lord Levendon demanded, in the very same words, and on the same terms.

Then the Scottish Deputies gave in writing the reasons and grounds of their three demands, and added, it was also desired that Parliaments might be held at set times, once at least in two or three years, by reason of his Majesty's absence, which hindered his Subjects in their complaints and grievances to have immediate access to his Majesty. They took occasion likewise to declare in this paper, that it had always been far from their thoughts to refuse due obedience to their native King, or to make an invasion upon England. They said, these were calumnies, the authors whereof they most humbly desired might be made a publick example.

It was the 15th of June before the King returned his answer, which must have embarrassed him. He had filled all England with complaints concerning the horrible rebellion of the Scots, and yet these same people whom he would have to be deemed Rebels, desired only to enjoy their Religion and Liberties. On the other hand, he had levied a great army, and prepared a fleet on pretence to defend England against the invasion the Scots were meditating: but they solemnly declared, they never intended any such thing. At last, he gave his answer to this effect.

- "1. That he could not ratify or approve the Acts of the general Assembly at Glasgow.
- "2. That notwithstanding he was pleased to confirm and make good whatsoever his Commissioner had granted and promised in his name.
- "3. That according to the Petitioners desire, all matters ecclesiastical should be determined by the Kirk, and matters civil by the Parliament.
- "4. That a free general Assembly should be held at Edinburgh the 6th day of August, and a Parliament at the same place the 20th of August next ensuing.
- "5. That upon the Scots disarming and disbanding their forces, dissolving and discharging all their pretended Tables and Conventions, and restoring to every one whatsoever had been taken and detained from them since the late pretended general Assembly, his Majesty would presently after recall his fleet, and retire his land-forces, and cause restitution to be made to all persons of their ships and goods, detained and arrested since the aforesaid Assembly."

Upon this answer the seven following Articles were at last agreed on, the 17th of June, wherein however there was no mention of the principal reasons of the quarrel, because these matters were to be examined by the general Assembly and Parliament of Scotland. So, though these Articles were called Articles of Pacification, it could not but be a very doubtful Peace, since there was nothing yet decided concerning the grounds of the war.

Articles agreed upon.

- "1. The forces of Scotland to be disbanded and dissolved, within eight and forty hours after the publication of his Majesty's Declaration being agreed upon.
- "2. His Majesty's Castles, Ports, Ammunitions of all sorts, and Royal Honours to be delivered after the said publication, so soon as his Majesty can send to receive them.
- "3. His Majesty's ships to depart presently after the delivery of the Castles, with the first fair wind, and in the mean time no interruption of trade or fishing.
- "4. His Majesty is graciously pleased to cause to be restored all persons, goods and ships, detained and arrested since the first day of November last past.
- "5. There shall be no meetings, treatings, consultations, or convocations of his Majesty's Lieges, but such as are warranted by Act of Parliament.
- "6. All fortifications to desist, and no farther working therein, and they to be remitted to his Majesty's pleasure.
- "7. To restore to every one of his Majesty's good Subjects their liberties, lands, houses, goods and means whatsoever, taken or detained from them by whatsoever means since the aforesaid time."

Pursuant to these Articles the Scots disbanded their troops, but in such a manner, if we may believe the King's friends, that they could easily reassemble them in case of necessity.

As the general Assembly and Parliament were to meet in August, the King appointed the Earl of Traquair to represent his person in quality of High-Commissioner. This Lord, who was Treasurer of Scotland, was entirely devoted to him, and it was with him that the Scotch Bishops and Archbishop of Canterbury held, before the war, a strict correspondence, in order to accomplish the King's designs. The King gave him the following Instructions, signed with his own hand.

Instructions given to the Earl of Traquair, Lord High-Commissioner for Scotland.

“AT the first meeting of the Assembly, before it be brought in dispute who shall preside, you shall appoint him who was Moderator in the last Assembly, to preside in this till a new Moderator be chosen.

“We allow that Lay-elders shall be admitted members of this Assembly; but in case of the election of Commissioners for Presbyteries, the Lay-elders have had voice, you shall declare against the informality thereof; as also against Lay-elders having voice in fundamental points of Religion.

“At the first opening of the Assembly, you shall strive to make the Assembly sensible of our goodness, that notwithstanding all that is past, whereby we might have been justly moved not to hearken to their Petitions, yet we have been graciously pleased to grant a free general Assembly; and for great and weighty considerations, have commanded the Archbishops and Bishops not to appear at this Assembly.

“You shall not make use of the assessors in publick, except you find you shall be able to carry their having vote in the Assembly.

“You shall labour to your utmost, that there be no questions made about the last Assembly; and in case it come to the worst, whatever shall be done in ratification, or with relation to the former Assembly, our will is, that you declare the same to be done as an act of this Assembly, and that you consent thereto only upon these terms, and no ways as having any relation to the former Assembly.

“You shall by all means shun the dispute about our power in Assemblies; and if it shall be urged or offered to be disputed, whether we have the negative voice, or the sole power of indicting, and consequently of dissolving, except you see clearly that you can carry the same in our favour, stop the dispute; and rather than it be decided against us, stop the course of the Assembly until we be advertised.

“For the better facilitating of our other services, and the more peaceable and plausible progress in all businesses recommended to you, we allow you at any time you shall find most convenient, after the opening of the Assembly, to declare, that notwithstanding our own inclination, or any other considerations, we are contented, for our People's full satisfaction, to remit Episcopacy, and the estate of Bishops to the freedom of the Assembly; but so, as no respect be had to the determination of the point in the last Assembly.

“But in giving way to the abolishing of Episcopacy, be careful that it be done without the appearing of any warrant from the Bishops; and if any offer to appear for them, you are to enquire for their warrant, and carry the dispute so, as the conclusion seem not to be made in prejudice of Episcopacy as unlawful, but only in satisfaction to the People for settling the present disorders, and such other reasons of State: But herein you must be careful that our intentions appear not to any.

“You shall labour, that Ministers deposed by the last Assembly, or commissions flowing from them, for no other cause but the subscribing the Petition or Declaration against the last Assembly, be upon their submission to the determination of this Assembly, reposed in their own places; and such other Ministers as are deposed for no other faults, that they be tried of new; and if that cannot be, strive that commissions may be directed from this Assembly, for trying and censuring them, according to the nature of their process.

“That immediately upon the conclusion of this Assembly, you indict another at some convenient time, as near the expiring of the year as you can, and if you find that Aberdeen be not a place agreeable, let Glasgow be the place; and if that cannot give content, let it be elsewhere.

“The general Assembly is not to meddle with any “thing that is civil, or which formerly hath been established by Act of Parliament, but upon his Majesty's special command or warrant.

“We will not allow of any Commissioner from the Assembly, nor no such act as may give ground for the continuing of the Tables or Conventicles.

“In case Episcopacy be abolished at this Assembly, you are to labour that we may have the power of chusing of so many Ministers, as may represent the fourteen Bishops in Parliament; or if that cannot be, that fourteen others whom we shall present be agreed to, with a power to chuse the Lords of the Articles for the Nobility for this time, until the business be further considered upon.

“We allow that Episcopacy be abolished, for the reasons contained in the Articles; and the Covenant 1580, for satisfaction of our People be subscribed, provided it be so conceived, that thereby our Subjects be not forced to abjure Episcopacy, as a point of Popery, or contrary to God's Law, or the Protestant Religion; but if they require it to be abjured, as contrary to the constitution of the Church of Scotland, you are to give way to it rather than to make a breach.

“After all Assembly-business is ended, and immediately before Prayers, you shall in the fairest way that you can, protest, that in respect of his Majesty's resolution of not coming in person, and that his instructions to you were upon short advertisement, whereupon many things may have occurred, wherein you have not had his Majesty's pleasure; and for such other reasons as occasion may furnish, you are to protest, that in case any thing hath escaped you, or hath been contended upon in this present assembly, prejudicial to his Majesty's service, that his Majesty may be heard for redress thereof in his own time and place (3).

At Berwick the 27th of July 1639.

Further Instructions to the Earl of Traquair.

Right Truly,

“AS I have hitherto commanded Hamilton to answer several of your Letters, but that of the 16th of August being of more weight than any of your former, we have thought fit to answer it ourself.

“And whereas you say, that nothing will satisfy them, except in terminis, the last Assembly be named and ratified, or that way be given to the discharging of Episcopacy, as abjured in that Church, as contrary to the Confession of Faith 1580, and the Constitutions of the same, you being yet in some hope that the word abjured may be got changed, and that in drawing up the words of the Act, it be only condemned as contrary to the Constitution of the Church: We in this point leave you to your instructions, they being full, if you consider what we have said concerning Episcopacy, and subscribing the Confession of Faith 1580, we thinking it fit to declare hereupon unto you, that let their madness be what it will, further than we have declared in our instructions, in these points we will not go.

“For the Service-Book, and Book of Canons, though we have been and are content they be discharged, yet we will never give our voice nor assent that they be condemned, as containing divers heads of Popery and Superstition; in like manner, though we have been and are content that the High-Commission be discharged, yet we will never acknowledge that it is without Law, or destructive to the civil and ecclesiastical judicatories of that our Kingdom: Nor that the five Articles of Perth, though discharged with our approbation, be condemned, as contrary to the aforesaid Confession. As concerning the late Assemblies, we cannot give our consent to have them declared null, since they were so notoriously our Father (of happy memory) his Acts; it seeming strange that we having contended to the taking away of these things that they complained of, which were done in those Assemblies, they will not be content therewith, without laying an asperson on our Father's actions. Wherefore if the Assembly will, in despite of your endeavour, conclude contrary to this, you are to protest against their proceedings in these points, and be sure not to ratify them in Parliament.

“Concerning the yearly Indiction of general Assemblies, and the Confession of Faith, we commanded Hamilton, in his of the 16th, to answer that Point to this effect, that we think it infinitely to our prejudice that we should consent to tie ourself for the keeping yearly of their Assemblies, not needing to repeat the reasons, they being well enough known to you; seeing at 1639. "Berwick it was conceived upon debate of that point, that your having Power to indict a new one within the year, would save that dispute, which you are by all means to eschew. But if this will not give satisfaction, you are by no means to give your assent to any such Act, nor to ratify the same in Parliament.

"The article in your Instructions, which is only that the Covenant 1580, shall be subscribed, you must have an especial care of, and how you proceed therein; that the bond be the same which was in our Father's time, mutatis mutandis; and that you give your assent no other ways to the interpretations thereof, than may stand with our future intentions well known to you; nor is the same otherwise to be ratified in Parliament.

"Thus you have our pleasure fully signified in every particular of your Letter; which you will find no ways contrary to our resolution taken at Berwick, and our instructions given to you there. But if the madness of our Subjects be such, that they will not rest satisfied with what we have given you power and authority to condescend to, which notwithstanding all their insolencies we shall allow you to make good to them, we take God to witness, that what misery soever shall fall to that Country hereafter, it is no fault of ours, but their own procurement. And hereupon we do command you, that if you cannot compose this business according to our instructions, and what we have now written, that you prorogue the Parliament till the next spring; and that you think upon some course how you may make publicly known to all our Subjects, what we had given you power to condescend to. And because it is not improbable, that this way may produce a present rupture, you are to warn and assist Rathven for the defence of the Castle of Edinburgh; and to take in general the like care of all our houses and forts in that Kingdom; and likewise to advertise all such who are affected to our service, that timely they may secure themselves; and so we bid you heartily farewell."

It is plain from these instructions, that the King had some private intentions, but which were known to the Earl of Traquair. The following Letter may help to discover part of these intentions, at least with respect to the Bishops.

His Majesty's Letter to the Archbishop of St. Andrews.

Right trusty, and well-beloved Counsellor, and Reverend Father in God, we greet you well.

YOUR Letter, and the rest of the Bishops (sent by the Elect of Gathness) to my Lord of Canterbury, hath been by him communicated to us: And after serious consideration of the contents thereof, we have thought fit our self to return this answer to you for direction according to our promise, which you are to communicate to the rest of your brethren.

"We do in part approve of what you have advised, concerning the proroguing of the Assembly and Parliament, and must acknowledge it to be grounded upon reason enough, were reason only to be thought on in this business: but considering the present state of our affairs, and what we have promised in the articles of Pacification, we may not (as we conceive) without great prejudice to our self and service, condescend thereunto; wherefore we are resolved (rather necessitated) to hold the Assembly and Parliament at the time and place appointed; and for that end we have nominated the Earl of Traquair our Commissioner, to whom we have given instructions, not only how to carry himself at the same, but a charge also to have a special care of your Lordships, and those of the inferior Clergy, who have suffered for their duty to God, and obedience to our commands. And we do hereby assure you, that it shall be still one of our chiefest studies, how to rectify and establish the government of that Church aright, and to repair your losses, which we desire you to be most confident of.

"As for your meeting to treat of the affairs of the Church, we do not see at this time how that can be done; for within our Kingdom of Scotland we cannot promise you any place of safety; and in any other of our Dominions we cannot hold it convenient, all things considered; wherefore we conceive, that the best way would be for your Lordships to give in, by way of protestation or remonstrance, your exceptions against this Assembly and Parliament to our Commissioner, which may be sent by any mean man, so he be trusty, and deliver it at his entering into the Church; but we would not have it to be either read or argued in this meeting, where nothing but partiality is to be expected, but to be represented to us by him; which we promise to take so into consideration, as becometh a Prince sensible of his own interest and honour, joined with the equity of your desires; and you may rest secure, that though perhaps we may give way for the present, to that which will be prejudicial both to the Church and our own Government, yet we shall not leave thinking in time how to remedy both.

"We must likewise intimate unto you, that we are so far from conceiving it expedient for you, or any of my Lords of the Clergy to be present at this meeting, as we do absolutely discharge your going thither; and for your absence, this shall be to you, and every of you, a sufficient warrant: In the interim, your best course will be to remain in our Kingdom of England, till such time as you receive our farther order, where we shall provide for your subsistence; though not in that measure as we could wish, yet in such a way as you shall not be in want.

"Thus you have our pleasure briefly signified unto you, which we doubt not but you will take in good part: You cannot but know, that what we do in this, we are necessitated to; so we bid you farewell."

Whitehall, Aug. 6, 1639.

C. R.

I have already observed, that the late peace between the King and his Subjects of Scotland, did not properly consist in the seven articles of Pacification, since there was no mention there of the true ground of the quarrel, but only of what passed after the breach. Indeed both parties agreed to lay down their arms; but the Peace could not be said to be concluded, so long as the motives of rupture still subsisted. If the demands of the Scots, and the King's answer be considered, such ambiguity on both sides will appear, that the Peace must have been deemed very doubtful. The Scots reduced their demands to this: That they might enjoy their Religion and Liberties, according to the ecclesiastical and civil Laws of the Kingdom, offering in return all obedience to his Majesty, which could be required or expected of loyal Subjects. The King granted this their desire in the same words, and on the same conditions. But there was a palpable ambiguity as well in the demand, as in the answer. The Scots understood by the Laws of the Kingdom, those that were in force before King James's accession to England, and all the innovations by them complained of; but the King meant such as were enacted since that time. The condition was no less equivocal, for the obedience promised by the Scots, related to the observance of the ancient Laws, but that expected by the King, was founded upon the late Laws. Both parties must have perceived the equivocation in what was to be the foundation of the Peace, since neither of the parties could be ignorant of the occasion of the breach. But however, both sides feigned not to perceive it, in order to be freed from their embarrassment in taking arms. The Scots had flattered themselves, that considering the discontents which reigned in England, the King would not be able to raise an army to reduce them to obedience. But contrary to their expectation, they saw him near their borders, at the head of twenty thousand men, whilst they had not above twelve thousand, without reckoning his fleet, which interrupted their Trade. It was therefore their interest, to endeavour by all means to avoid a decision of the quarrel by arms. The loss of a battle would have certainly reduced them to slavery. Besides, their friends in England dissuaded them from running any hazard, and made them hope, they should, very shortly, put it out of the King's power to hurt them. For these reasons, they were contented with the general demand of their Religion and Liberties, in order to gain time, knowing, that when matters came to be discussed, they should find means to include all their pretensions in this general demand. The King, on his side, was no less embarrassed. Tho' he had an army superior in number of troops, he was apprehensive of treacheries, or at least, that his English Subjects would not cheerfully venture their lives for his sake: So that the loss of a battle would not only have occasioned the loss of Scotland, but even put his affairs in England in a very ill situation. Therefore, though he could not possibly be ignorant of what the Scots meant by their Religion and Laws, finding they did not explain themselves more clearly, he took them at their word, in a belief, that at a more convenient season, it would be in his power to give these terms the sense that to him seemed most natural. It may therefore be affirmed, that this peace, which yet decided nothing, was concluded upon very uncertain foundations, and that both parties, when they laid down, were in much the same state as when they took up their arms. But it was easy to foresee, a time would come, when it would be necessary to explain what hitherto remained in obscurity.

The Bishops failed not, according to the King's advice, to present a Declinator or Protestation to the High-Commissioner (1), who receiving it publicly as he was going Church, was presented with a Paper to the King, without communicating it to the Assembly (1). The King was desirous to have such a Paper in his hands, that he might use it upon occasion, or at a more proper time.

In this general Assembly held at Edinburgh by the King's order, the High-Commissioner had sufficient interest to hinder any mention of the former Assembly at Glasgow. Nevertheless, there passed several Acts very disagreeable to the King, to which however the High-Commissioner gave his consent.

"The first contained the causes of the evils that had lately happened in the Kirk of Scotland." These causes, were, 1. The want of a Service-book, the books of Canons and of Confirmation and Ordination, and the High-Commission. 2. The five articles of Perth. 3. The changing the Government of the Kirk into episcopal Government. 4. The civil places conferred on Kirkmen. 5. The keeping and authorizing the Assemblies in 1606, 1608, 1610, 1616, 1617, 1618. 6. The want of lawful and free general Assemblies." It was therefore ordained by this Act, that all these things should be abolished, and the Kirk restored to its former state. To this Act the High-Commissioner consented verbally, and promised to have it ratified in the ensuing Parliament. "Another Act also passed for the better keeping the Lord's-day."

After which followed a supplication of the general Assembly to the Commissioner, desiring that a Book called, The large Declaration, and written by [Dr. Balcanquhall] Dean of Durham, a Scotchman, against his Countrymen, might be called in. To this the Commissioner gave no other answer, but that he would impart the same to his Majesty.

Then was presented to the High-Commissioner another supplication from the Assembly, and the Lords of the Privy-Council, wherein they petitioned, that it might be enjoined by Act of Council, that the Confession and Covenant should be subscribed by all his Majesty's Subjects in Scotland, of what rank and quality soever. The High-Commissioner answered, by advice of the Council, That he thought himself bound in conscience to approve of the Covenant, and as Earl of Traquair, would subscribe it as heartily as any subject in the Kingdom: but as the King's Commissioner he could not do it, unless a clause was added, that this Covenant was the same with that subscribed by King James VI. in the years 1580, 1581, and 1590. Whereupon the Assembly made a new Act, enjoining all the members of the Kirk to sign the Covenant, with this clause prefixed to the names of the subscribers:

"We subscribe this Covenant according to the explanation it hath received from the general Assembly, that is, as declaring the five Articles of Perth, the Government of the Kirk by Bishops, and the bestowing of civil places on Kirkmen, to be unlawful within this Kirk."

After that, the Assembly resolved to present a Petition to the King, to pray him to cause these Acts to be ratified by the Parliament. That done, they appointed the last Tuesday in July 1640, for holding another general Assembly at Aberdeen, without consulting the High-Commissioner.

The Acts passed in this Assembly plainly shew what the Scots meant by their Religion, namely, that professed in 1580. The Assembly had also determined, contrary to the King's pretensions, that Episcopacy was abolished (2) by the Confession of Faith of the year 1580, though the Bishops were not so much as mentioned. Whereas, the King pretended, the Religion of the Kingdom was that which was actually professed since the year 1606, and since established by several Acts of Parliament, and general Assemblies. On the contrary, the Assembly of Edinburgh declared, that the Assemblies held from 1606, to 1618, were void, and thereby annulled the Acts of Parliament by which they were confirmed and ratified. As to the Covenant, the same Assembly, in pretending to admit of the clause annexed by the Earl of Traquair, had rendered it of no effect, by an additional explication. The Earl was much blamed for not stoutly opposing this interpretation; nay, when he came to give the King an account of his Commission, a Scotch Bishop (3) accused him of Treason, and offered to suffer as a traitor, if he did not make good his accusation.

By what had passed in the Assembly, the King saw plainly what he was to expect from the Parliament, which he called at Edinburgh. The ratification of the Acts of the Assembly was proposed, they presented to the High-Commissioner some Acts, which shewed they were no less bent to maintain the privileges of the People, and guard against the artifice by which the Court had endeavoured to get the Parliament to pass what they pleased. I have mentioned elsewhere the manner of chusing the Lords of the Articles in the Parliament of Scotland, but it is necessary to explain it a little more fully, for the better understanding how advantageous to the King this method was grown. Ever since the Reign of David Bruce, that Ann. 1329, is, for about three hundred years, it had been customary in Scotland, that when the Parliament met, there were elected a certain number of Noblemen, Bishops, Barons, and Burghesses, who were called Lords of the Articles. The business of this select Committee was to examine and prepare the Bills which were to be moved in Parliament; and as they had power to reject such as they did not judge necessary, they were ever thrown out. The manner of Election, sealed at a time when the inconveniences could not be foreseen, was thus: The body of the Nobility nominated eight Bishops, these Bishops named eight Lords, the sixteen elect Bishops and Lords chose eight Barons (4), the eight Barons and Lords chose eight Bishops (5). This custom subsisted without many inconveniences, till James VI. attempted to restore Episcopacy. That Prince, as we have seen, began with restoring the Bishops and Lay-Abbots, to their seats in Parliament; and thereby had the votes of all the representatives of the Church at his command. So the Nobility, in chusing eight Bishops, could name none but what were devoted to the King, from whom they received their Benefices. These eight Bishops made it their chief care to name eight Lords, on whom the King could depend. These sixteen never failed to chuse eight Barons of the same party, and consequently, the eight Burghesses elected by the twenty four, were likewise friends of the Court. By this means, the King obtained of the Parliament the fore-mentioned Acts, to restore episcopal Government in the Kirk, notwithstanding all the endeavours of the general Assemblies. This gave occasion to the complaint publicly dispersed in writing, that Charles I. in his journey to Scotland, had used unlawful methods to obtain the two Acts concerning Religion, of which I have spoken. It is said, that among the eight Lords then chosen by the Bishops, there were three suspected of Popery.

As since that time the face of affairs had been much changed in Scotland, and the King had no longer any power there, the Parliament, which met by his Majesty's order at Edinburgh in the year 1639, resolved to prevent the inconveniences flowing from the election of the Lords of the Articles. To that purpose they presented to the High-Commissioner an Act, declaring null and void whatever should be done in Parliament, before the ancient way of electing the Lords of the Articles should be altered. This Act was founded not only upon the fore-mentioned inconveniences, but chiefly upon the Parliament's disposition to abolish entirely the order of Bishops, from whence followed an absolute necessity to alter the manner of chusing the Lords of the Articles. Besides, in all appearance, the Parliament was willing to obviate thereby the King's demand, that fourteen Ministers or Lay-Abbots of his chusing might supply the place of the Bishops (6).

Besides this Act, which was very material at this juncture, the Parliament presented also several others, all tending to lessen the King's prerogative.

"2. By the second it was enacted, that the Coin should not be meddled with, but by advice of Parliament."

"3. By the third, that no Stranger should be entrusted with keeping of any castles, nor other person put in them, but by advice of the Estates." This was because the King had lately made two Englishmen Governours of the Castles of Edinburgh and Dunbarton.

"4. That no patent of honour be granted to any stranger, but such as have a competency of Land-rent in Scotland."

"5. That no commission of Justiciary or Lieutenancy may be granted but for a limited time."

"6. They protested against the precedence of the

(4) Or Lords.
(5) These thirty two, with the eight Officers of the Crown, made up the select Committee, called, Lords of the Articles. Wodrow, and after him E. Ward, says, the King chose the eight Noblemen.

(6) The Parliament allowed the High-Commissioner to name the eight Lords, who should have been named by the Bishops, electors for the future; and they went so roundly to take away the Lords of the Articles entirely. When it was known about the election of the Bishops, The Commissioner urged for the King to have fourteen Lay-Abbots to represent the three Estates, but it should be completed by small Barons, who were to represent the Commonalty. Rushworth, Tom. III. p. 935.

1639. "Lord-Treasurer, and Lord Privy-Seal, because, as they alleged, the same was not warranted by a positive Law.

There were others of the same nature, all prejudicial to the King, but which it is needless to infer. It may well be thought, the High-Commissioner did not believe himself sufficiently authorized to give his consent to all these Acts, without informing his Majesty.

The King seeing what course his affairs were taking in the Parliament of Scotland, plainly perceived by these first proceedings, that his Commissioner would be little able to follow his instructions, and therefore, ordered him by Letter only, to prorogue the Parliament till the ad of June the next year 1640, and if he met with opposition, to declare that the Members who should continue to assemble, were guilty of High-Treason. This order being signified to the Parliament, met not with that compliance, the King perhaps had expected. They broke up however, but in such a manner as was no less disagreeable to the King, than if they had continued their session. Before they parted, they made a declaration, importing that the Earl of Traquair had not power to prorogue the Parliament upon the King's letter, without the consent of the Parliament itself. That this order was owing to misinformations, the Parliament not having given the King any offence, or cause of complaint. That hitherto the Parliaments were never prorogued without their own consent, and consequently this prorogation was contrary to the usage of the Kingdom. They complained moreover, that the Earl of Traquair and the Council had several ways violated the privileges of Parliament, during this present session. In short, they declared, that though they might lawfully remain assembled, notwithstanding the prorogation, they were willing to break up, in order to give the King a proof of their obedience; but however thought proper to leave a committee of some of each Estate, to present a Remonstrance to his Majesty, and attend his gracious answer, and to assure the King on all occasions of the Parliament's sincere intention to pay him all due obedience. The declaration concluded with a protestation, that if any outrages and insolencies should be committed, they could not be imputed to them, since they were constrained to use the proper means to secure the Kirk and State from the impending misery and confusion.

Pursuant to the power given them by the Parliament, the committee sent the Earl of Dunfermling and the Lord Loudoun to present a remonstrance to his Majesty. But the King refused to give these deputies audience, as coming without warrant from the High-Commissioner, and without communicating to him the occasion of their journey. After their departure, the King sent for the Earl of Traquair, and ordered him to report to the Council what had passed in Scotland since the Pacification. It was upon this Lord's report, and without hearing what the Scots had to say in their defence, that the Council of England unanimously declared, it was absolutely necessary to reduce the Scots to their duty by force of arms. Mean while, as this resolution seemed a little too hasty, since it was not yet known what the Scots might plead in their vindication, the King, perceiving how prejudicial this precipitation might be to him, gave the committee of Edinburgh leave to send their deputies. But this was more for decency, than to see whether there would be any reason to alter the resolution already taken, the King not being ignorant of what could be said on this occasion.

Pursuant to the King's permission, four deputies came presently after, namely, the Earl of Dunfermling, the Lord Loudoun, Sir William Douglas, and Mr. Robert Berkley, and presented to him two Petitions. The first was from the late general Assembly held at Edinburgh, who, after thanking him for being pleased to consent that ecclesiastical affairs should be determined in the Assembly of the Kirk, prayed him to ratify their constitutions by the Parliament. By the other Petition, the four deputies desired to be heard before some of the counsellors of both Kingdoms, and that the Earl of Traquair's report to the Council of England might be given them in writing under his hand. The King thought not proper to grant either of these articles. However, he appointed a committee of the Council to hear them, to which the deputies would not agree, saying, they were sent to his Majesty to justify the proceedings of the Parliament of Scotland, and not to the Council of England, who had no jurisdiction over the Scots. To remove this objection, the King was pleased to hear them himself, in the presence of the committee he had appointed. The Lord Loudoun made a long Speech in vindication of the transactions in Scotland; for that was the sole motive of the deputation. But the King feigning to believe, and being very willing to suppose they were come to treat with him of an agreement, objected to them, that their Powers were insufficient, since they could neither offer nor accept any terms. A few days after, the Council of England declared, that the Scotch deputies had power only to justify the proceedings of their Countrymen. And indeed, they had been sent only for that purpose, and not to treat with the King (1).

It was resolved, as I said, in the Council of England, to reduce the Scots to obedience by force. It is necessary therefore to shew upon what this resolution was founded. Though the King was by no means pleased with the Acts of the general Assembly of Edinburgh, he had no reason however to complain, since they were approved by his High-Commissioner, authorized for that purpose by a commission under the Great-Seal. Wherefore being desirous to hinder these Acts from being ratified by the Parliament, he thought it more proper to ground the breach occasioned by the prorogation of the Parliament of Scotland, upon the proceedings of the Parliament than upon those of the Assembly. He complained therefore,

"1. That under pretence of his having promised a free Parliament, they had carried that freedom so far as to imagine, that it was not to be limited by their own conditions, subscribed by the Lord Loudoun, which were to enjoy their Religion and Liberties, according to the ecclesiastical and civil Laws of their Kingdom. For it was evident, that the Parliament had far exceeded the bounds established by the Laws.

"2. If they object, that they assume this liberty by our allowing of the Covenant, and commanding our former High-Commissioner the Lord Marquis of Hamilton, and other our Subjects to subscribe it; the answer is very ready, that there is a great difference between the Covenant and Band subscribed by our commandment, and their Band; for that Covenant and Band was made by our late Father King James of blessed memory, Anno 1580, and obligeth those that swear to it, that they should mutually assist one another, as they should be commanded by the King, or any authorized by him. But this new Band was made without our consent, and by it they swear, mutually to assist one another, not excepting the King. Neither can the Earl of Traquair's subscription or allowance of the Covenant be any warrant for their rebellious courses, seeing they did humbly supplicate, that they might be allowed and warranted to subscribe it: Which clearly evinces, that what they did before, and of themselves, without warrant of authority, was neither laudable nor warrantable. Besides, it appears by what is prefixt to the Earl of Traquair's subscription, that by the Covenant he meant the same with that of 1580.

"3. Since the Parliaments, they have, without any authority or commission from us, taken upon them to levy and raise forces in several parts of the Kingdom; and have assigned them a rendezvous, and a day to be in a readiness to march.

"4. They have made provisions of great quantities of artillery, munition and arms, from foreign parts, which they have ready in magazine to make use of against us their Sovereign.

"5. They have of themselves laid taxes and impositions of ten marks in every hundred upon all and every our Subjects, according to their several revenues; and this they have exacted with the greatest rigour and tyranny that can be imagined.

"6. They have caused to be framed and published, sundry false, seditious and scandalous Papers and Pamphlets; and amongst others, one entitled, An Information from the Estates of the Kingdom of Scotland, to the Kingdom of England, &c. which we have caused to be burnt by the hand of the hangman.

"7. They have refused the Lord Estrick, Governor of our Castle at Edinburgh, timber, and other materials necessary for reparation of the works lately fallen down there, notwithstanding our express commandment by our letters to them, upon their allegiance to furnish them.

"8. They have committed sundry outrages and violences upon the persons of some of the Garrison at Edinburgh, that came out of the Castle to buy victuals.

"9. They have begun to raise works and fortifications against the said Castle, thereby to block up that our royal fort, and to render it useless. And they have

The Earl of Essex, Bedford, and Holland; the Lord Say, Mr. Hampden, pressed them to engage in a new War, and among other motives, brought them engagements in writing from most of the greatest Peers in England, to join wth them, and assist them when they should come into England wth an Army. but these engagements were discovered at the Treaty of Rippon to have been a bare forgery. The Magistrates of Edinburgh have upon sundry occasions refused to yield us due obedience, alledging, That they have delivered up the power of governing the town into the hands of the Committee of the pretended Tables, by which they have not only voluntarily disabled themselves to serve us, but have incurred the guilt of High-Treason, by conferring upon any that power of Government which they derive and hold from us alone."

Of these eleven articles, nine were inconsiderable. As after the prorogation of the Parliament, the Scots had great reason to fear the King intended to renew the war, the precautions they took for their defence, could not be deemed a just cause of invading them, though their fears had been vain. At least, all these proceedings could have been easily repaired by the conclusion of a good peace. But the most material article, on which the King chiefly insisted was.

" 12. A Letter communicated to him by the Earl of Traquair, and which had been intercepted by his Lordship. It was written to the King of France by the chief of the male-contents to desire his assistance. The Letter follows, with this endorsement, Au Roy, which, as his Majesty observed, is in France always understood from those Subjects only to their natural Prince.

SIR,

YOUR Majesty being the refuge and sanctuary of afflicted Princes and States, we have found it necessary to send this Gentleman, Mr. Colvil, to represent unto your Majesty the candour and ingenuity, as well of our actions and proceedings, as of our intentions, which we desire to be engraven and written to the whole world with a beam (1) of the Sun, as well as to your Majesty. We therefore most humbly beseech you (Sir) to give faith and credit to him, and to all that he shall say on our part, touching us and our affairs; being most assured (Sir) of an assistance equal to your wonted clemency heretofore, and so often shewed to this Nation, which will not yield the Glory to any other whatsoever to be eternally,

SIR,

Your Majesty's most humble,
Most obedient, and
Most affectionate Servants.

This Letter, though no date appears, was writ before the peace. At least, the Lord Levendon, who was committed to the Tower on that account, affirmed it, and I don't find he was ever contradicted. On the other hand, the King who pretended to receive great advantages from this letter, never said it was penned since the signing of the articles of pacification. From whence it may be inferred, either the subscribers forgot to date it, or the date was not serviceable to the King who produced it. However this be, though the letter was never sent to France, since it was put into the hands of the Earl of Traquair in Scotland, the King, who had resolved to renew the war, made great use of it to vitiate his conduct. He pretended, the Scots designed to introduce a foreign army into their country to invade England, and therefore he was indispensably obliged to defend his English Subjects. But it will be seen hereafter, that he reaped not from it all the advantages he expected.

Upon this foundation however he resolved to renew the war with Scotland. But though he alledged many reasons, as we have seen, it is certain, the chief motive was the abolition of Episcopacy, to which he could not consent. If this single point could have been adjusted, the rest were not considerable enough to oblige the two parties to take arms again. So, the whole question of right between Charles and the Scots was reduced to this: Whether James and Charles could alter the Government of the Kirk of Scotland, notwithstanding the opposition of the Kirk itself; and whether the Scots might demand the abolition of Episcopacy, established upon the ruins of Presbytery, on pretence of the artifices practised by the Court to get these Acts passed.

The war being resolved, the King took all possible measures to have a numerous army, by taxing, as usual, each County to find a certain number of troops. On the other hand, a Sea-fight between the Spaniards and Dutch, near the coast of England, furnished the King with a pretence to renew his warrants for the payment of Ship-money. As on this occasion the Dutch, who were the aggressors, had shown little regard to the Sovereignty of the Sea assumed by the King, his Majesty loudly complained of the affront he had received, and upon this foundation seemed bent to equip a powerful Fleet to preserve the dominion of the sea, and defend the Kingdom. Wherefore he ordered Ship-money, as well as the arrears of that tax, to be levied with great severity. The Sheriff of Northamptonshire having sent to Court a Petition of the County against Ship-money (2), the Council reprimanded him very sharply, commanding him to do his office on pain of exemplary punishment. On the other hand, Sir John Finch being made Lord Keeper (3) upon the death of the Lord Coweney, made a Speech to the Judges, to exhort them to use in their circuits all their authority to promote this tax. So, it was evident the King was resolved to compass his ends, let what would be the consequence, and that this imposition was grown by degrees a standing tax upon the people.

At last, the King appointed [Algernon Percy] Earl of Northumberland for General of the army against Scotland, and gave him for Lieutenant-General Thomas Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland, lately made Earl of Strafford. As he always dreaded the correspondents the Scots had in England, and for that reason durst not trust his Council with all his affairs, he appointed a secret Council, consisting of three persons only, namely, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Marquis of Hamilton, and the Earl of Strafford (4). These three entirely directed the King's most important affairs, and were the persons, that after mature deliberation, advised him to call a Parliament. But as the King objected to them, that before the Subsidies, which the Parliament should grant, could be paid, he should be reduced to great straits; the secret Council provided against this inconvenience, by advising him to borrow of each of his Counsellors or others, who should be willing to lend, the sums he should want to supply his present occasions. The Earl of Strafford alone subscribed twenty thousand pounds. The example of the Council was being followed by some other Lords, the King was enabled to make preparations for the war, before he had received any aid from the Parliament. So, the Parliament was called for the 13th of April, and a few days after the King published a Proclamation, to revoke the same Patents which had served to establish Monopolies, though they had been revoked once before without any effect.

The Parliament being assembled at Westminster, on the day appointed, the King went to the House of Lords, and made the following Speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" THERE was never a King that had a more great and weighty cause to call his People together than myself: I will not trouble you with the particulars; I have informed my Lord-Keeper, and commanded him to speak, and desire your attention."

Then Sir John Finch Lord-Keeper, spake thus:

My Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeses of the House of Commons,

" You are here this day assembled by his Majesty's gracious writ and royal command, to hold a Parliament, the general, ancient, and greatest Council of this renowned Kingdom. By you, as by a select choice and abstract, the whole Kingdom is presented to his Majesty's royal view, and made happy in the beholding of his excellent and sacred person. All of you, not only the Prelates, Nobles and Grandees, but in your persons that are of the House of Commons, every one, even the meanest of his Majesty's Subjects, are graciously allowed "to participate and share in the honour of those counsels, that concern the great and weighty affairs of the King and Kingdom. You come all armed with the votes and suffrages of the whole Nation : and I assure my self, your hearts are filled with that zealous and humble affection to his Majesty's person and government, that so just, so pious, and so gracious a King, hath reason to expect from all his Subjects. I doubt not, but you rejoice at this day's meeting, and methinks you should do so too ; and good reason you have to do so, and with all humbleness of heart to acknowledge, the great goodness of his Majesty, who sequestering the memory of all former discouragements in preceding Assemblies, is now of a fatherly affection to his People, and a confidence that they will not be failing in their duty to him, who is pleased graciously to invite you and all his loving Subjects to a sacred unity of hearts and affections, in the services of him and of the Commonwealth, and in the execution of those counsels that tend only to the honour of his Majesty, and to the good preservation of you all. His Majesty's kingly resolutions are seated in the ark of his sacred breast, and it were a presumption of too high a nature, for any Uzzah uncalled to touch it : Yet his Majesty is now pleased to lay by the shining beams of Majesty, as Phaëbus did to Phaeton, that the distance between sovereignty and subjection should not bar you of that filial freedom of access to his person and counsels, only let us beware how, with the Son of Clymene, we aim not at the guiding of the Chariot, as if that were the only testimony of fatherly affection : and let us ever remember, that though the King sometimes lays by the beams and rays of Majesty, he never lays by Majesty itself.

"In former Parliaments you have been advised with, for the preventing and diverting of those dangers, which by foreign and more remote counsels, might have tended to the dishonour and ruin of this nation ; therein his Majesty's great wisdom and providence hath for many years eased you of that trouble, his Majesty having with great judgment and prudence, not only seen and prevented our danger, but kept up the honour and splendor of the English Crown, of which at this day we find the happy and comfortable experience, Almighty God having vouchsafed such success to his Majesty's counsels, that our Fleece is dry, when it raineth blood in all the neighbour States. But what availeth this the Kingdom ? Si Jovis hostem non inveniat, si modo domi inveniat. You are now summoned to counsels and resolutions that more nearly concern you, to prevent a danger and a dishonour that knocks at our gates, and that moves from such, from whom we had little reason to suspect it. It is well known upon what happy and solid counsels one of our wisest Kings made a match with Scotland for his eldest daughter. We cannot forget (I am sure we should not) the blessed success that waited upon those counsels, when the Crown of England descended upon King James of ever blessed and famous memory, who with the fullness of joy to all true English hearts, made his entry not by bloodshed. The wall of separation was thereby taken away ; and that glorious King, to make his word good, faciam eos in Gentem unam, made all England rejoice, and Scotland I am sure had no reason to be sorry for it : They participated of English honours, the wealth and revenue of this Nation they shared in, and no good thing was withheld from them, such was the largeness of heart in that most excellent King, and such was the comfort we took in this fraternity, or rather unity : When both of us had but one brazen wall of fortification to look unto, the sea, and all things equally and evenly carried between us, that Tros Tyriusque nullo discrimine habentur. His Majesty, our most gracious Sovereign, became heir, as well to his Father's virtues as to his Kingdoms, Pacatumque regit, &c. and in his gracious and tender affection to that Nation, hath given as many indulgent testimonies of love and benignity, as they could expect. Thus became we both like a Land flowing with milk and honey ; peace and plenty dwell in our streets, and we have had all our blessings crowned with the sweet hopes of perpetuity. God found out for my Lord the King a companion meet for him, his royal comfort, our most gracious Queen, who, as the is not to be paralleled for her person and virtue, so hath she made his Majesty and the whole Kingdom most happy and blessed in the sweetest pledges of their love, and our hopes, which ever stood like olive-branches about the throne or table : But which I sorrow for, Civiles furor patriæ nimia infelicitas, and when his Majesty had most reason to expect a grateful return of loyalty and obedience from all the Scottish Nation, some men of Belial, some Zeba, hath blown the trumpet there, and by their infolencies and rebellious actions draw many after them, to the utter desertion of his Majesty's government ; his Majesty's and his kingly Father's love and bounty to that Nation quite forgotten, his goodness and piety unremembered.

"They have led a multitude after them into a course of disloyalty and rebellious Treason, such as former times have not left in mention, nor this present age can any where equal ; they have taken up arms against the Lord's anointed, their rightful Prince, and undoubted Sovereign, and following the wicked counsels of some Achitophels, they have seized on the trophies of honour, and invested themselves with regal power and authority : Such, and so many acts of disloyalty and disobedience, as (let their pretences be what they will be,) no true English or Christian heart, but must acknowledge them to be the effects of foul and horrid treason.

"The last summer his Majesty, at his own charge, and at the vast expence of many of his faithful and loving Subjects of England, went with an army, and then they took upon them the boldness to outface and brave his royal army, with another of their own raising ; yet for all this, his Majesty's goodness was not lessened by that, nor could his gracious nature forget what he was to them, nor what they were to him ; but confidering with himself they were such quos nec vincere, nec, vinci gloriosum fuerat, out of his piety and clemency, chose rather to pass by their former miscarriages, upon their humble protestations of future loyalty and obedience, than by just vengeance to punish their rebellions.

"But his Majesty (who is ever awake for the good and safety of all his Subjects) hath since too plainly discovered, that they did but prevaricate with him to divert the storm which hung over their heads, and by gaining time to purchase themselves more advantage, for pursuing their rebellious purposes.

"For since his Majesty came from Berwick, it is come to his certain knowledge, that instead of performing that loyalty and obedience, which by the laws of God, of Nature, and Nations, they owe unto him, they have addressed themselves to foreign States, and treated with them to deliver themselves up to their protection and power (as by God's great providence and goodness, his gracious Majesty is able to shew under the hands of the prime ring-leaders of that faction) than which nothing could be of more dangerous consequence to this and his Majesty's other Kingdoms. Whosoever they be that do, or shall with England ill, they may know it to be of too tough a complexion and courage, to be assailed in the face, or to be set upon at the forehead : And therefore it is not unlikely, but they may (as in former times) find out a postern-gate.

"There were heretofore two of them, Scotland and Ireland, and both of them had their several defences.

"Ireland, through his Majesty's just and prudent Government, is not only reduced from the dilemma of former times, but settled in such a condition of Peace, and during his Majesty's happy reign so altered and civilized, that instead of being a charge to him (as it was to his predecessors) hath yielded to him some revenue, and his Subjects there do daily give very acceptable testimonies of their loyal and dutiful affection, both to his person and government. And now lately at the Parliament assembled, they have not only with full and free consent, made his Majesty a cheerful aid towards his present preparations, to reduce his disaffected Subjects in Scotland to their due obedience, but they have also professed and promised, that they will be ready with their persons and estates, to the uttermost of their ability, for his Majesty's future supply, as his great occasions, by the continuance of his forces against that distemper, shall require ; so that the hopes of hurting England that way, are quite extinct.

"Scotland then only remains, whither (as to a weak and distempered part of the body) all the rheums and fluxes of factious and seditious humours make way.

"His Majesty hath taken all these and much more into his princely consideration, and to avoid a manifest and apparent mischief, threatened to this and his other Kingdoms, hath resolved, by the means of a powerful army, to reduce them to the just and modest conditions of obedience.

"It is a course his Majesty takes no delight in, but is forced unto it ; for such is his Majesty's grace and goodness to all his subjects, and such it is and will be to them (how undutiful and rebellious soever they now are) that if they put themselves into a way of humility becoming them, his Majesty's piety and clemency will soon appear to all the world : But his Majesty will not endure to have his honour weighed at the common beam ; nor admit any to step between him and his virtue : and therefore as he will upon no terms, admit the mediation of any person whatsoever ; so he shall judge it as high presumption in any person to offer it, and as 1640. "I liver unto you the causes of calling of it, which was for the assistance and supply of his Majesty in so great, weighty, and important affairs, as ever King of England had to require at his Subjects hands.

"I am now to put you in mind what I then said unto you, and withal to let you know that such and so great are his Majesty's occasions at this time, that if the Supply be not speedy, it will be of no use at all: For the army is now marching, and doth stand his Majesty in at least one hundred thousand pounds a month, and if there be not means used to go on with this as is fitting, his Majesty's design will be lost, and the charge all cast away. It is not a great and ample Supply for the perfecting of the work, that his Majesty doth now expect, but it is such a Supply, as without which, the charge will be lost, and the design frustrated, being built upon those weighty reasons which tend to the infinite good of the Kingdom, and preservation of you all.

"This done, his Majesty will give you scope and liberty to present your just Grievances unto him, and he will hear them with a gracious ear, and give them such an answer, as you and all the Kingdom shall have reason to joy therein.

"His Majesty taketh notice of one particular, and that is concerning Ship-money; wherein his Majesty hath commanded me to declare thus much unto you: First, his Majesty never had it in his Royal heart to make an annual revenue of it, nor ever had a thought to make the least benefit or profit of it: But whatsoever he did or intended in it, it was for the common good of you all; for the honour, glory and splendor of this Nation, and that every one of us are made sharers and partakers in the benefits, fruits, and successes of it, which otherwise you would have felt the woes of it. He hath been so far from making the least benefit of it, that he hath expended great sums of money out of his own coffers to work with, to those necessary ends I have named unto you.

"The accounts of such moneys so received, have been brought to the Council-table, the moneys delivered to Sir William Russell the Treasurer of the Navy, and by them all it may appear, whether there hath been a fulness and clearness of truth in the disbursements thereof, for the good and safety of the Kingdom.

"It is true, his Majesty had once intended this year not to have taken that course, but an Army, which his Majesty, so just a King, for the preservation of the Kingdom, hath now taken into consideration; and I must tell you, that his Majesty prizeth nothing more than his honour, and he will not lose for any earthly thing, his honour in the least; they cannot make those expressions of love, duty and affection to him, which the graciousness of his nature will not exceed in.

"Of all his Kingdoms this ought to be the nearest and dearest unto him; yet for his Kingdom of Ireland, the last Parliament before this, the very second day of the Parliament they gave him six Subsidies, they relied upon his gracious words, the success was that before the end of the Parliament they had all that they desired granted, and had it with an advantage. This last Parliament there, it is well known unto you all, what a cheerful Supply they have given unto his Majesty, for their hearts went with it; and let it not be apprehended, that Subsidies there are of a small value; there is not a Subsidy that is granted, but it is worth fifty or sixty thousand pounds at the least: Consider that Kingdom, what proportion it holdeth with this of England, and you will find that it is a considerable gift, as hath been given in many years. It hath wrought this effect, that certainly his Majesty will make it apparent to all the world, what a good construction, and how graciously he doth esteem and interpret this act of theirs. I have directed hitherto my speech to you that are of the House of Commons; now I shall address myself to your Lordships.

"It is true, the proper and natural supply proceeds from the House of Commons, yet in aid at this time, his Majesty hath called you hither, and hopeth he shall not find the House of Commons backward to his desires, nor your Lordships to concur with them.

"To you of the House of Commons, I did forget one thing of an objection that might perhaps be made; that Tunnage and Poundage is given towards the maintenance of a Fleet at Sea, let me tell you that Tunnage and Poundage was never intended but for ordinary preservation of the Sea, not that that should be to defend the Dominion of the narrow Seas, when the navies of all the Princes of Christendom, are so increased as they are. It is fit for his Majesty (as things now stand) to have such a strength at sea, as may be a terror to others abroad.

"His Majesty was once resolved, that no Shipping-Writs should have issued out this year, but he was enforced for your good, and the good of the Kingdom, and for his honour, upon necessary and weighty reasons to send forth Writs, and those reasons were these.

"It was of necessity for his Majesty to prepare an army to reduce his disaffected Subjects of Scotland to their due obedience. This very year all the neighbouring Princes are preparing with great Fleets of ships, so as it is time for his Majesty to put himself into a strength that he may be able to preserve the Dominion of the narrow seas, without which this Kingdom will be lost, he not able to maintain his right of being the moderator of the sea, whereby there may be freedom and commerce of Trade, which adds exceedingly to the flourishing of this Kingdom. Another reason for Shipping-Writs this year is, that those of Argier are grown to that insolence, that they are provided of a Fleet of sixty sail of ships, and have taken divers ships, and one called the Rebecca of London (well known to the mer chants upon the Exchange), taken upon the coast of Spain, worth at the least two hundred and sixty thousand pounds. And therefore the Writ having gone out upon those weighty reasons, before it was possible the Parliament could give any Supply to provide for those things, his Majesty cannot this year forbear it, but he doth expect your concurrence in the levying of it for the future. I shall speak that unto you by his Majesty's command, which may comfort any English heart: His Majesty hath no thoughts of enriching himself by the moneys coming in upon these Writs; he doth desire but to live as it behoves a King of England, able to defend you and this nation in honour and in lustre, which is famous abroad, and glorious at home, and to live but like such a King, as every true English heart desireth their King should be.

"Be masters of your own way, settle it so secure and so safe, that it may never come to the least benefit and advantage to himself, but for the common good and those necessary ends wherein you shall all share in your plenty, peace, honour, and whatsoever any Englishman can glory in. His Majesty commands me to tell you, you shall propound nothing wherein you may receive all security for the property of your goods, and nothing for securing your own liberties, wherein he will not most readily listen unto you; and be as willing to grant, as you to ask. His Majesty doth now offer unto you the reasons, occasions, and the way to make this the most blessed and most happy Parliament that ever was, and that may produce such effects, that the King may delight in his People, and the People in their King. And he layeth before you not only the counsel to do so; but he will tell you the way, and that is, by putting an obligation of trust and confidence upon him, which shall more secure you than all that you can invent, or fears or jealousies can imagine to be provided for; it is a course that good manners, duty, and reason should require of you, to take into consideration."

This Speech was not capable of hindering the Commons from proceeding in the examination of the Grievances, and thereby they perverted the order prescribed them by the King. He was extremely troubled to see the time pass away to no purpose, and that the Commons should so little regard him, as not to rely on his promise, to hearken to their Grievances, when the affair of Supply should be ended. In short, perceiving, the Commons were not much moved by whatever he could represent to them, he so managed, that the Lords demanded a conference, where they endeavoured to shew, that the affair of Supply ought to precede that of Grievances. This conference served only to retard the King's affairs. The Commons taking offence, that the Lords should meddle with what did not belong to them, voted it to be a breach of privilege (1). Several days were spent in this contest, and many conferences held, in which, contrary to the King's expectation, much time was lost. Wherefore, on the 2d of May, the King sent a message to the Commons for a positive answer (2). concerning the Supply he expected. But as they made no haste to answer, on the 4th of May his Majesty sent Sir Henry Vane Secretary of State with the following message:

His Majesty (the better to facilitate your resolutions) this the King's day has thought fit to let you know, that of his grace and Majesty, favour he is pleased, upon your granting twelve Subsidies to be presently passed, and to be paid in three years, with a proviso, that it shall not determine the Sessions, his Majesty will not only for the present forbear the levying any Ship-Money, but der the hands of the prime ringleaders of that rebellious

"These courtes of theirs tending so much to the ruin and overthrow of this famous Monarchy, united by the descent of the Crown of England upon his Majesty and his Father of blessed memory: His Majesty (in his great wisdom, and in discharge of the trust reposed in him by God, and by the fundamental laws of both Kingdoms, for the protection and government of them) resolved to suppress, and thereby to vindicate that Sovereign power intrusted to him.

"He had by the last Summer's trial found, that his grace and goodness was abused, and that, contrary to his expectation and their faithful promises, they had (since his being at Berwick, and the pacification there made) pursued their former rebellious designs: And therefore it was necessary now for his Majesty by power to reduce them, to the just and modest condition of their obedience and subjection, which whenever they should be brought unto, or seeing their own errors, should put themselves into a way of humility and obedience becoming them, his Majesty should need no other mediator for clemency and mercy to them, than his own piety and goodness, and the tender affection he hath ever born to that his native Kingdom.

"This being of so great weight and consequence to the whole Kingdom, and the charge of an army fit to master such a business amounting to such a sum as his Majesty hath no means to raise, having not only emptied his own Coffers, but issued between three and four thousand pounds, which he borrowed of his Servants upon security out of his own Estate, to provide such things as were necessary to begin such an action with; his Majesty after the example of his predecessors, resorted to his people in their representative body the Parliament, whom he desired (with all the expressions of grace and goodness which could possibly come from him) that taking into serious and dutiful consideration the nature of these bleeding evils, and how dangerous it was to lose the least minute of time, left thereby those of Scotland should gain the opportunity to frame their parties with foreign States; that they would for a while lay aside all other debates, and pass an Act for the speedy payment of so many Subsidies, as might enable his Majesty to put in readiness for this Summer's expedition those things which were to be prepared before so great an army could be brought into the field.

"For further supply necessary for so great undertaking, his Majesty declared, that he expected it not till there might be a happy conclusion of that session, and till their just grievances might be first graciously heard and redressed.

"Wherein as his Majesty would most willingly have given them the precedence before matter of supply, if the great necessity of his occasions could have permitted; so he was graciously pleased for their full assurance and satisfaction therein, to give them his royal word, that without determining the session (upon granting of the Subsidies,) he would give them, before they parted, as much time as the season of the year, and the great affairs in hand would permit, for considering all such Petitions as they conceived to be good for the Commonwealth, and what they would not now finish, they should have full time to perfect towards winter: His Majesty graciously assuring them, that he would go along with them for their advantage, through all the expressions of a gracious and pious King, to the end there might be such a happy conclusion of that, as might be the cause of many more meetings with them in Parliament.

"From their first assembling until the 21st of April, the House of Commons did nothing that could give his Majesty any content or confidence in their speedy supplying of him: Whereupon he commanded both the Houses to attend him in the Banqueting-House at Whitehall in the afternoon of that 21st of April, where (by the Lord Keeper) his Majesty put them in mind of the end for which they were assembled, which was for his Majesty's supplies; That if it were not speedy it would be of no use unto him, part of the army then marching at the charge of above a hundred thousand pounds a month; which would all be lost if his Majesty were not presently supplied, so as it was not possible to be longer forborn.

"Yet his Majesty then expressed, that the supply he for the present desired was only to enable him to go on with his designs for three or four months, and that he expected no further supply till all their just grievances were relieved.

"And because his Majesty had taken notice of some misapprehensions about the levying of Ship-money, his Majesty commanded the Lord-Keeper to let them know "that he never had any intention to make any revenue of it, nor had ever made any, but that all the money collected had been paid to the Treasurer of the Navy, and by him expended, besides great sums of money every year out of his Majesty's own purse.

"That his Majesty had once resolved this year to have levied none, but that he was forced to alter his resolution, in regard he was of necessity to send an army for reducing those of Scotland, during which time it was requisite the Seas should be well-guarded.

"And besides, his Majesty had knowledge of the great Fleets prepared by all neighbouring Princes this year, and of the insolencies committed by those of Algiers, with the store of ships they had in readiness.

"And therefore though his Majesty for this present year could not forbear it, but expected their concurrence in the levying of it, yet for the future, to give all his Subjects assurance, how just and royal his intentions were, and that all his aim was, but to live like their King, able to defend himself and them; to be useful to his friends, and considerable to his enemies; to maintain the Sovereignty of the Seas, and so make the Kingdom flourish in trade and commerce: He was graciously pleased to let them know, that the ordinary revenue now taken by the Crown, could not serve the turn; and therefore that it must be by Ship-money, or some other way, wherein he was willing to leave it to their considerations, what better course to find out, and to settle it how they would (so the thing were done) which so much imported the honour and safety of the Kingdom.

"And his Majesty for his part, would most readily and cheerfully grant any thing they could desire, for securing them in the propriety of their goods and estates, and in the liberty of their persons. His Majesty telling them, it was in their power to make this as happy a Parliament as ever was, and to be the cause of the King's delighting to meet with his People, and his People with him.

"That there was no such way to effect this, as by putting obligations of trust and confidence upon him, which as it was the way of good manners with a King, so it was a surer and safer course for themselves, than any their own jealousies and fears could invent; his Majesty being a Prince that deserved their trust, and could not lose the honour of it; and a Prince of such a gracious nature, that disdained his People should overcome him by kindness.

"He had made this good to some other Subjects of his, and if they followed his counsel, they should be sure not to repent it, being the people that were nearest and dearest unto him, and Subjects whom he did and had reason to value more than the Subjects of any his other Kingdoms.

"His Majesty having thus graciously expressed himself unto them, he expected the House of Commons would have the next day taken into consideration the matter of supply, and laid aside all other debates, till that was resolved of, according to his desire.

"But instead of giving an answer therein, such as the pressing and urgent occasions required, they fell into discourses and debates about their pretended grievances, and raised up so many and of so several natures, that in a Parliamentary way they could not but spend more time than his Majesty's great and weighty affairs could possibly afford.

"His Majesty foreseeing in his great wisdom, that they were not in the way to make this a happy Parliament, (which he so much desired and hoped) that nothing might be wanting on his part to bring them into the right way, for his honour, the safety of the Kingdom, and their own good, he resolved to desire the assistance of the Lords of the Higher-House, as persons in rank and degree nearest to the royal throne; and who having received honour from him and his royal progenitors, he doubted not would, for those and many other reasons, be moved in honour and dutiful affection to his Person and Crown, to dispose the House of Commons to express their duties to his Majesty, in expediting the matter of Supply for which they were called together, and which required so present a dispatch.

"For this purpose, his Majesty in his royal person came again to the Lords House on Wednesday the 24th day of April, where himself declared to the Lords the cause of his coming, which was to put them in mind of what had been by the Lord-Keeper in his name delivered to both the Houses the first day of the Parliament, and after at Whitehall: how contrary to his expectation, the House of Commons having held consultation of matter of Religion, property of Goods, and liberty of Parliament, and voted some things concerning those three heads, had thereby given them the precedence before the matter of his supply. That his necessities were such, they could not bear delay; that whatever he had by the Lord-Keeper promised he would perform, if the House of Commons would trust him.

For Religion, that his heart and conscience went together with the Religion established in the Church of England: and he would give order to his Archbishops and Bishops, that no innovation in matter of Religion should creep in.

For the Ship-money, that he never made, nor intended to make any profit to himself of it, but only to preserve the Dominion of the Seas; which was so necessary, that without it the Kingdom could not subsist. But for the way and means by Ship-money or otherwise he left it to them.

For property of Goods and liberty of Parliament, he ever intended his People should enjoy them; holding no King so great, as he that was King of a rich and free People; and if they had not property of Goods and liberty of Persons, they would be neither rich nor free.

That, if the House of Commons would not first trust him, all his affairs would be disordered, and his business lost. That though they trusted him in part at first, yet before the Parliament ended he must totally trust them; and in conclusion, they must for execution of all things wholly trust him.

Therefore since the matter was no more, than who should be first trusted; and that the trust of him first, was but a trust in part, his Majesty desired the Lords to take into their considerations his and their own honour, the safety and welfare of this Kingdom, with the great danger it was in, and that they would by their advice dispose the House of Commons, to give his Supply the precedence before the grievances.

His Majesty being departed, the Lords took into serious consideration what his Majesty had commended to their care, and forthwith laying aside all other debates, their Lordships delivered their votes in these words: We are of opinion, that the matter of his Majesty's Supply should have precedence, and be refused of, before any other matter whatsoever. And we think fit, there shall be a conference desired with the House of Commons, to dispose them thereunto.

Accordingly, the next day being Saturday, the 25th day of April, a conference was had in the Painted Chamber by a committee of both Houses, where the Lord-Keeper (by the Lords command) told the House of Commons of his Majesty's being the day before in person in the Higher-House, how graciously he had expressed himself in matter of Religion, property of Goods, and liberty of Parliament; and that he would therein graciously hear and relieve them, and give them what in reason could be desired, with the effect of what else had been graciously delivered unto them by his Majesty; as well touching his constant zeal and affection to the Religion established in the Church of England, as touching the Ship-money.

By all the proceedings herein declared, it is evident to all men, how willing and desirous his Majesty hath been to make use of the antient and noble way of Parliaments used and instituted by his Royal predecessors, for the preservation and honour of this famous Monarchy: And that on his Majesty's part nothing was wanting, that could be expected from a King, whereby this Parliament might have had a happy conclusion, for the comfort and content of his Majesty's Subjects, and for the good and safety of this Kingdom.

On the contrary it is apparent, how those of the House of Commons, (whose sinister and malicious courses enforced his Majesty to dissolve this Parliament) have vitiated and abused that antient and noble way of Parliament, perverting the same to their own unworthy ends, and forgetting the true use and institution of Parliaments.

For whereas, these meetings and assemblies of his Majesty, with the Peers and Commons of this realm, were in their first original, and in the practice of all succeeding ages, ordained and held as pledges and testimonies of affection between the King and his People; the King for his part graciously hearing and redressing such grievances, as his People in humble and dutiful manner should represent unto him; and the Subjects on their part, (as testimonies of their duty) supplying his Majesty upon all extraordinary occasions, for support of his honour and sovereignty, and for preserving the Kingdom in glory and safety.

Those ill-affected Members of the House of Commons, instead of a humble and dutiful way of presenting their grievances to his Majesty, have taken upon them to be the guides and directors in all matters that concern his Majesty's government, both temporal and ecclesiastical: and (as if Kings were bound to give an account of their regal actions, and of their manner of government to their Subjects assembled in Parliament) they have, in a very audacious and insolent way, entered into examination and censuring of the present Government, traduced his Majesty's administration of Justice, rendered, as much as in them lay, odious to the rest of his Majesty's Subjects, not only the officers and ministers of State, but even his Majesty's very Government, which hath been so just and gracious, that never did this, or any other nation, enjoy more blessings and happiness, than hath been by all his Majesty's Subjects enjoyed ever since his Majesty's access to the Crown: Nor did this Kingdom ever so flourish in trade and commerce, as at this present, or partake of more peace and plenty in all kinds whatsoever.

And whereas, the ordinary revenues of the Crown not sufficing to defray extraordinary charges, it hath ever been the usage in all Parliaments, to aid and assist the Kings of this realm with free and fitting supply, towards the maintenance of their wars, and for making good their royal undertakings; whereby the Kingdom, intrusted to their protection, might be held up in splendour and greatness.

These ill-affected persons of the House of Commons, have been so far from treading in the steps of their ancestors, by their dutiful expressions in this kind, that contrarily they have introduced a way of bargaining and contracting with the King; as if nothing ought to be given him by them, but what he should buy or purchase of them, either by quitting somewhat of his royal prerogative, or by diminishing and lessening his revenues; which courses of theirs, how repugnant they are to the duty of Subjects, how unfit for his Majesty in honour to permit and suffer, and what hazard and dishonour they subject this Kingdom to, all men may easily judge, that will but equally and impartially weigh them.

His Majesty hath been by this means reduced to such straits and extremities, that were not his care of the public good and safety the greater, these men (as much as in them lies) would quickly bring ruin and confusion to the State, and render contemptible this glorious Monarchy.

But this frowardness and undutiful behaviour of theirs, cannot lessen his Majesty's care of preserving the Kingdoms entrusted to his protection and government, nor his gracious and tender affection to his People, for whose good and comfort his Majesty, by God's gracious assistance, will so provide, that all his loving Subjects may still enjoy the happiness of living under the blessed shade and protection of his royal Scepter.

In the mean time, to the end all his Majesty's loving Subjects may know how graciously his Majesty is inclined to hear and redress all the just grievances of his People, as well out of Parliament as in Parliament, his Majesty doth hereby further declare his royal will and pleasure, that all his loving Subjects, who have any just cause to present, or complain of any grievances or oppressions, may freely address themselves by their humble Petitions to his sacred Majesty, who will graciously hear their complaints, and give such fitting redress therein, that all his People shall have just cause to acknowledge his grace and goodness towards them; and to be fully satisfied, that no persons or assemblies can more prevail with his Majesty, than the piety and justice of his own royal nature, and the tender affection he doth and shall ever bear to all his People and loving Subjects.

After the reading of this Declaration, the inserting it here at length will perhaps be thought needless, since it contains nothing but what was related before. However, it is of use to show, that the King and his adversaries agreed as to facts, and disputed only upon the consequences and right.

Though the Parliament was dissolved, the King however continued the Convocation, under the title of Synod. Since the time of the Reformation, it had been always customary to assemble the Clergy, at the same time with the Parliament, and this Assembly of the Clergy, was called the Convocation, and always begun and ended with the Parliament. The King not thinking himself bound to a strict observance of this custom, dissolved the Parliament, and continued the Convocation, contrary to the opinion of several (1), who believed that he thereby exceeded his power. But the Judges of the Realm determined, that

(1) Dr. Bromwich, Dr. Hacket, and other Members of this Convocation, (in all thirty six,) protested against the continuance of its Session. Fuller, B. XI

640. notwithstanding the dissolution of the Parliament, the Convocation subsisted, unless dissolved by the King's Writ (1). The Convocation therefore continued a month longer, and in that time did two things which gave occasion to great complaints in the ensuing Parliament. First, they made certain Canons, whereby all Clergymen and Graduates in the Universities, were enjoined to take the following Oath (2).

"I, A. B. do swear, That I approve the doctrine and discipline, or Government established in the Church of England, as containing all things necessary to salvation: And that I will not endeavour, by my self or any other, directly or indirectly, to bring in any popish doctrine, contrary to that which is so established: Nor will I ever give my consent to alter the government of this Church, by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, &c. as it now stands established, and as by right it ought to stand; nor yet ever to subject it to the usurpations and superstitions of the See of Rome. And all these things I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation, or mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever. And this I do heartily, willingly, and truly upon the faith of a Christian. So help me God in Jesus Christ."

This Oath was thought very strange, for several reasons. 1. It was not liked that the Clergy should take upon them to enjoin Oaths, which, according to the general opinion, belonged to the Parliament only. 2. The et cetera after the word Archdeacons, offended many, because those that swore could not tell what they were to understand by this abbreviation. 3. The prescribing such an oath was affirmed to be a confinement, and tying down of the civil Legislature, since thereby the Government was deprived of the liberty of making any alteration in the discipline of the Church, which nevertheless might be altered without any danger to salvation. 4. 'Twas objected, that the person was to declare, he took the Oath object willingly, though he was constrained thereto under very severe penalties.

The second thing the Convocation did before they broke up, was the granting the King, for the Scotch war, a Subsidy of four Shillings in the pound for six years (3). This proceeding, which tended to diminish the Parliament's power, was no less disliked than the former. It is true, that to justify it, a precedent was alleged; for it must be observed, that in this Reign, examples or precedents in favour of the Crown, were looked upon as so many Laws. The Clergy, it seems, in the year 1585, after having granted Elizabeth a Subsidy approved by the Parliament, made of themselves an addition of two Shillings in the pound, which the Queen accepted without consulting the Parliament. But, besides that this was a single precedent, there was a great difference between the time of Elizabeth, and that of Charles I. In Elizabeth's days, every one was pleased with the Government. It was believed the Queen was not capable of making an ill use of these unusual favours, but employed the money given her solely for the good of the Kingdom. It was not the same in the time of Charles I. The King was not trusted at all; it was known by experience, that he would draw from the least precedent, consequences destructive of the liberties of Parliaments, and in fine, the number of the male-contents was infinite: Nay, the King seemed to do all that lay in his power to increase it, or at least, not to regard it. And what still more inflamed the People's discontent, was the seeing the popish Recusants not only tolerated, but moreover protected, countenanced, and considered as the best Subjects. They resorted publicly to masks to Somerset-house, and returned from thence in great multitudes, as if their Churches had been allowed by authority. A publick Agent from Rome resided at London, Count Rosetti by name, who openly went to Court in great pomp, and whose House was the general rendezvous of the Catholics. The Queen had prevailed with the King to receive this Agent as a sort of Nuntio, and by that, as well as by the avowed protection she afforded those of her Religion, she so drew upon herself the people's hatred, that they were even wanting in that outward respect they ought to have paid her.

All these discontents were fomented by the Scots, who feeling themselves upon the point of being attacked, were extremely diligent by means of their emissaries, to incense the People against the King. In justifying their own conduct, they forgot not to insinuate to the English, that the tyranny which was intended to be established in Scotland, was in order to introduce the like into England. And that if the King laboured to support the Hierarchy erected in the Kirk of Scotland by his Father and himself, it was not so much for the sake of episcopal Government, as in order to establish in that Kingdom an arbitrary power, which would be one day fatal to the English. Nay, that there was great danger, that after the accomplishment of his designs, he would restore Popery in his Kingdoms, since he could refuse nothing to the Queen, to Laud, and the other enemies of the Protestant Religion. The King himself, by his conduct, rendered those insinuations so plausible, that besides the Presbyterians, who were very numerous, there were many Church of England men, who could not forbear dreading, that the King's zeal for the Church was only to engage them to be subservient to his more hidden designs. Be this as it will, the Kingdom was full of suspicions, fears, jealousies, divisions, so that if the King had been well-informed, he might easily have seen there were but very few that served him willingly and cheerfully, in the war he was going to wage with Scotland. This he had cause to know presently after.

The King being engaged in a war with Scotland, without having received any supply from the Parliament, was in great straits. He even solici-^{The King after January 1641/2} tude, that it would not be possible for him to maintain his army, unless he had recourse to extraordinary methods to raise money. Accordingly, he made use of the following expedients, to supply in part what he had expected from the Parliament. 1. He ordered that the Counties should advance Coat and Conduct money for their respective troops (4). 2. He bought upon credit of the East-India merchants all their Pepper, and sold it again for ready money. 3. He took forty thousand pounds worth of the Bullion, which the merchants had brought into the mint to be coined, which sum was afterwards punctually repaid (5). 4. He would have borrowed two hundred thousand pounds of the City of London, but had the mortification to meet with a denial. He was so displeased at it, that he resolved to be revenged in this manner. The City, having some time before settled a Colony at Londonderry in Ireland, had obtained a Patent from the King for certain Lands in that Country. The Londoners had no sooner refused to lend the King money, but the Lord-Mayor and the Sheriffs were cited before the Star-Chamber, to answer to the charge of having abused the Patent, by usurping more Lands than the King had granted to the City. Upon this charge, whether well or ill-grounded, the Londoners were condemned to forfeit their rights, and grievously fined, but upon payment of the fine, their Patent was restored (6). They had but too many opportunities afterwards to be revenged of the King in their turn. On the other hand, the Writ to levy Ship-Money having been sent to the City of London, as well as to all the other towns in the Kingdom, it appeared that the Lord-Mayor and City Council had neglected to levy this tax, or at least, they had not disfrained any one person for non-payment, according to the tenor of the Writ. For this reason, the Council sent the following order to the Attorney-General

At Whitehall, July 5. 1640. Present, &c.

"WHEREAS the Lord-Mayor of London and the two Sheriffs did this day appear before his Majesty and the Board, to give an account of their proceedings upon the Writ for the Ship-busines this present year: Forasmuch as it did appear, that besides all former neglects in the execution of that Writ, his Majesty having

(2) The Canons, seventeen in all, with the Oath, were voted, nemine contradicente, except Gudfrey Goodman Bishop of Gloucester, who did not read the Oath. When he was suspended; but afterwards he submitted, took the Oath, and in a Letter to Archbishop Laud 1641, he was intreated to dissent by Bishop Merdun, though at that instant he could have proved that Mastague did dissent, and hold correspondence, with the Pope's Agent, &c. Rymer, Tom. III. p. 1187. Nelson, Tom. I. p. 771.

(3) The Convocation voted six subsidies, payable in six years. Their Subsidies were rated according to the valuation of the Livings in the King's Books. Nelson, Tom. I. p. 366. A Subsidy of four Shillings in the pound, amounted to above twenty thousand pounds. So the whole six came to 120,000 l. They were paid out of the M^{ty} of each County. Their allowance was eight pence a day; and their whole number amounted to 16,800. Nelson, Tom. I. p. 366. Rymer, Tom. III. p. 1187. Nelson, Tom. I. p. 381, 386.

(5) The Bullion of the Mint was ordered to be seized; but the Merchants representing to his Majesty and Council the great prejudice it would be to his Majesty's Honour, Reputation and Interest, both at home and abroad, the design was laid aside, and 40,000 l. taken up of the Merchants concerned in the M^{ty}, upon credit of the Council. There was likewise a design to debase the Coin, but it was laid aside by the remarks of John Bates, in a Speech at the Council Table. Nelson, Tom. I. p. 391. These several methods, and particularly a voluntary Loan of some Lords of the Council, and other Gentlemen, brought the King in 1640, 1641, and 1642, to 120,000 l. Nelson, Tom. I. p. 391.

1640. "respired the information against them for the same; yet they have not since diftrained any one person according to the said Writ. It was this day ordered by his Majesty, with the advice of the Board, that his Majesty's Attorney-General shall forthwith prefer an information in the Star-Chamber against the Lord-Mayor, and Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, for their contempt and default in the execution of the said Writ; and shall forthwith proceed against them, De die in diem, until the cause be ready for hearing: And if upon examination of the said cause, his Majesty's Attorney-General shall find sufficient cause against any of the Aldermen, that then he do prefer one other information against the said Aldermen, and in like manner do proceed against the same apart."

Thus the King, instead of relinquishing this odious tax, continued to exact it with great rigour, though his affairs were then at a crisis, which should have injured him with a dread, that in case the success of the Scotch war did not answer his expectations, he should be little able to support himself. But in all appearance, he thought himself secure of victory.

Part of the army designed against Scotland was now upon the frontiers, under the command of the Lord Conway, General of the Horse, whilst the rest lay incamped near York. The Earl of Northumberland, who was to command under the King, remained sick at London, and the Earl of Stratford, who was Lieutenant-General, had not been able to depart soon enough, because he was a very necessary Member of the King's secret Council. The Lord Conway being advanced as far as Newcastle, with three thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, was informed that Lesly, General of the Scots (1), was preparing to march at the head of two and twenty thousand men, in order to enter England. And indeed, he passed the Tweed the 20th of August, the very day the King departed from London for York, where he arrived on the 23d. Lesly purging his march, came the 27th to Newburn, on the north-side of the Tyne, four miles from Newcastle. At his arrival, he found the Lord Conway posted with his troops on the south-side of the river, where he had raised breast-works over against the two fords, to oppose his passage. It is needless to give a particular account of this action. It suffices to say, the Scots forced the passage of the Tyne, after a fight very faintly maintained by the English. The Lord Conway was seized with so great terror, that he left Newcastle the next day, and retreated to Durham, where not thinking himself yet safe, he went and joined the King's army, which was advanced to Northampton. The King's troops had no sooner quitted Newcastle, but the Scots entered, and found there the artillery and stores ordered thither by the King, who designed that place for the magazine of his army.

The entrance of the Scots into England, and the taking of Newcastle, broke all the King's measures. Though in this first action he had not lost above three or four hundred men, this considerable loss produced however great effects, all to the King's disadvantage. 1. The Earl of Stratford having spoken a little too roughly to the officers and soldiers, who were returned from the defeat of Newburn, displeased the whole army, and thereby put the vanquished upon magnifying in their own vindication, the valour and number of the Scotch troops. This could not but produce a very ill effect in the King's army, which before was not very well-inclined. 2. The English male-contents were more at ease, and spoke more boldly against the Government, knowing it was no proper season to silence them. 3. The Scots missed not this opportunity to shew the English, by as moderate a conduct as the juncture could allow, that their design in entering England, was not to injure the English, but only to procure access to the King in order to lay their Grievances before him. By this means they separated, as much as they could, the King's cause from that of the People of England, which did the King an unspeakable prejudice. 4. The confederation caused by the Newburn Defeat, and, on the other hand, the moderation of the Scots, who notwithstanding the success of their arms, affected to desire only an accommodation, inclined the whole Nation to a peace. None but the Court-party used their utmost endeavours, though in vain, to inspire the English with a desire of revenge. 5. As in the King's present circumstances, with an army of enemies before him, and numberless male-contents in all the rest of the Kingdom, as well as in his own army, it was not possible for him to raise money, by the same methods he had till then practised, there resulted a general opinion that a Parliament was absolutely necessary. To this it was that the Scots and the English male-contents desired to lead him, though against his will, knowing it was hardly possible that a new Parliament should be disposed in his favour.

The Scots had in England more correspondents than the King had till now imagined, but he perceived it not, till his affairs began to decline. They had offered a Manifesto, of which one was entitled, Six General Articles of the Lawfulness of their Expedition into England, and others, Intentions of the Scots and their Brethren of England. In these two Papers, extremely careful to shew, that the motive of the march and entry into England, was not to injure the Kingdom, but only to defend themselves against particular persons, their sworn enemies.

named as the principal, the Earl of Stratford, and the bishop of Canterbury. They said, in their pretension, their Country being blocked up by Parliament, and their trade interrupted, it was not possible to expect any other remedy, but to march into England, and being exposed to certain ruin. They compared themselves to a man who, when his House is besieged, and his enemies ready to assault it, falls out himself and attacks them in hopes of averting, by a vigorous effort, the impending ruin. They maintained, it was the King that had broke the peace, and having granted that the General-assembly should regulate the affairs of the Kirk, and its regulations be ratified in Parliament, had, without any lawful cause, prorogued the Parliament, before what the general Assembly had judged necessary, was confirmed. Nay, he had denied to give audience to the Deputies of the Parliament, and though he had agreed, other Deputies were sent to him, it was only to amuse them, since the war with Scotland had been already determined in the Council, and the Parliaments of Ireland and England convened in order for supplies. They carefully represented the justice and equity of the late Parliament of England, in denying the King money for a war so notoriously unjust. In short, for it would be too tedious to relate all the particulars contained in these two Papers, their aim was to demonstrate to the People of England, 1. The justice of their cause. 2. The artifices of their enemies to surprise them. 3. The necessity, they were under, of taking arms in their own lawful defence, and to prevent their ruin. 4. They said, notwithstanding their entry into England, the war was defensive on their part, and 5. That they intended not to offer any injury or violence, or enrich themselves with the spoils of the English, but only to procure access to his Majesty, to present their grievances, which was denied them, unless they would entirely deliver themselves to the mercy of their enemies. 6. They called God to witness, this was their intention, and the better to gain belief, they made use of the strongest expressions and most solemn oaths. 7. Lastly, they forgot not to intimate to the English, that they had the same cause to maintain, since the Liberties of England were equally in danger with those of Scotland.

These Manifestos, which were doubtless owing to the counsels of some of the English male-contents, produced such an effect upon the People, the Army, and the Lords themselves who were not wholly devoted to the Court, that the King might very easily see how difficult it would be to support the war, and to what danger he would be exposed, if he hazarded a battle at such a juncture. Nothing was more disadvantageous to the King, than the extreme desire expressed by the Scots to end the quarrel by an agreement, which shewed their aim was not to make war upon the English, whereas it was the King's interest to engage them both in a national quarrel. Wherefore the Scots did not fail to improve the advantage of their moderate conduct. As soon as they were masters of Newcastle, they sent a very humble Petition to the King, beseeching him to give ear to their complaints, and cure their evils, by the service of the Parliament of England. The King, who was pressed on all sides, had already summoned the Nobility to meet him at York the 24th of September, to give their advice upon the present situation of his affairs. He therefore told the Scots, that their Petition was expressed in such general terms, that he could not give them a positive answer. But if they would speak more plainly, and declare the particulars of their Demands, he would give such answers as the Peers who were to meet at York should think proper. Upon this they sent their demands to the King, the 8th of September, namely:

"1. That his Majesty would be graciously pleased to command, that the last Acts of Parliament may be published in his Highness's name, as our Sovereign Lord with the Estates of Parliament convened by his Majesty's authority.

"2. That the Castles of Edinburgh and other Strengths of the Kingdom of Scotland may, according to the first foundation, be furnished and used for our defence and security.

"3. That our Countrymen in his Majesty's Dominions of England and Ireland may be freed from cen-

"sure for subscribing the Covenant, and be no more preferred with oaths and subscriptions unwarrantable by your Laws, and contrary to their national oath and covenant approved by his Majesty.

"4. That the common incendiaries which have been the authors of this combustion may receive their just censure.

"5. That all our ships and goods, with all the damage thereof, may be repaired.

"6. That the wrongs, losses, and charges which all this time we have sustained, may be repaired.

"7. That the Declarations made against us as traitors, may be recalled in the end, by the advice and counsel of the States of England convened in Parliament. His Majesty may be pleased to remove the garrisons from the Borders, and any impediments which may stop free trade."

It appears by this last article, how careful the Scots were to lose no opportunity to gain the people of England to their interest. Of this they also gave the following instance. As the Londoners had all their coals from Newcastle, and could by no means be without that trade, the Scots were no sooner matters of Newcastle, but they write to the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, That knowing how necessary the free traffick of Coals was for their City, and other places of England, they had, as a testimony of greatest respect and good-will to the City of London, sent two Noblemen to declare to the masters of ships, who, possessed with needless fears, were halting out of the River, that their purpose was not to stop, but to use their best means to continue that trade.

This Letter answered the expectations of the Scots. Presently after it was publicly talked at London of presenting a Petition to the King, to pray him to summon a Parliament. The Privy-Council, left by the King at London, having some notice of this design, endeavoured to prevent it by a letter directed to the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen: but they could not succeed. So a Petition was resolved, and sent to his Majesty at York by some of the Aldermen and Common-Council, which was as follows:

Most gracious Sovereign,

"BEING moved with the duty and obedience which by the Laws your Petitioners owe unto your sacred Majesty, they humbly present unto your princely and pious wisdom, the several pressing grievances following; viz.

"1. The pressing and unusual impositions upon merchandize, importing and exporting, and the urging and levying of Ship-money, notwithstanding both which, Merchants ships and goods have been taken and destroyed both by Turks and other Pirates.

"2. The multitude of monopolies, Patents and warrants, whereby trade in the City and other parts of the Kingdom is much decayed.

"3. The sundry innovations in matter of Religion.

"4. The Oath and Canons lately enjoined by the late Convocation, whereby your petitioners are in danger to be deprived of their Ministers.

"5. The great concourse of Papists, and their inhabitations in London, and the suburbs, whereby they have more means and opportunity of plotting and executing their designs against the Religion established.

"6. The seldom calling, and sudden dissolutions, of Parliaments, without the redress of your Subjects grievances.

"7. The imprisonment of divers Citizens for non-payment of Ship-money and impositions, and the prosecution of many others in the Star-Chamber, for not conforming themselves to Committees in Patents of monopolies, whereby trade is restrained.

"8. The great danger your sacred person is exposed unto in the present war, and the various fears that seized upon your petitioners, and their families by reason thereof, which grievances and fears have occasioned so great a stop and distraction in trade, that your petitioners can neither buy, sell, receive, or pay as formerly, and tends to the utter ruin of the inhabitants of the City, the decay of navigation and cloathing, and the manufactures of this Kingdom.

"Your humble petitioners conceiving that the said grievances are contrary to the Laws of this Kingdom, and finding by experience that they are not redressed by the ordinary course of Justice, do therefore most humbly beseech your most sacred Majesty, to cause a Parliament to be summoned with all convenient speed, whereby they may be relieved in the premises."

And your Petitioners, &c.

Within a few days, this Petition was followed by another from twelve Lords, in behalf of themselves and divers others.

Most gracious Sovereign,

"THE sense of that duty and service which we owe unto your sacred Majesty, and our earnest affection to the good and welfare of this your realm of England, have moved us in all humility to beseech your royal Majesty, to give us leave to offer unto your princely wisdom, the apprehension which we and other your faithful Subjects have conceived of the great dangers and dangers now threatening the Church and State of your royal person, and the fittest means by which they may be prevented."

"The evils and dangers whereof your Majesty may be pleased to take notice are these:

"1. That your sacred Majesty is exposed to hazard and danger in the present expedition against the Scotish army, and by the occasion of the war your revenue is much wasted, your Subjects burthened with coat and conduct-money, billeting of Soldiers, and other military charges, and divers rapines and disorders committed in several parts in this your Realm, by the Soldiers raised for that service, and your whole Kingdom become full of fear and discontent.

"2. The sundry innovations in matters of Religion; the Oath and Canons lately imposed upon the Clergy, and other your Majesty's Subjects.

"3. The great increase of Popery, and employing of Popish Recusants, and others ill-affected to the Religion by law established in places of power and trust, and especially commanding of men and arms both in the field and other Counties in this Realm; whereas by the laws they are not permitted to have arms in their own houses.

"4. The great mischief which may fall upon this Kingdom, if the intentions which have been credibly reported of bringing in of Irish forces shall take effect.

"5. The urging of Ship-money, and prosecution of some Sheriffs in the Star-Chamber for not levying of it.

"6. The heavy charges of merchandize to the discouragement of trade, the multitude of monopolies or other patentees, whereby the commodities and manufactures of the Kingdom are much burthened, to the great and universal grievance of your people.

"7. The great grief of your Subjects by the intermission of Parliaments, in the late former dissolving of such as have been called, with the hoped effects which otherwise they might have procured.

"For a remedy whereof, and prevention of the danger that may ensue to your royal person, and to the whole State, we do in all humility and faithfulness beseech your most excellent Majesty, that you would be pleased to summon a Parliament within some short and convenient time, whereby the cause of these, and other great grievances which your poor petitioners now lie under, may be taken away, and the authors and Counsellors of them may be there brought to such legal trial and condign punishment, as the nature of the offence does require; and that the present war may be composed by your Majesty's wisdom without blood-shed, in such manner as may conduce to the honour and safety of your Majesty's person, and content of your people, and continuance of both of your Kingdoms against the common enemy of the Reformed Religion (1).

Presently after the King having called the Yorkshire gentlemen together, proposed to them the payment of the Trained Bands for two months. This proposition being accepted, the gentlemen prepared an address to inform the King of their content: but whilst they sought his Majesty to endeavour to compose the differences with the Scots, and to summon a Parliament. The Earl of Strafford being desired to present the address to the King, refused it, unless the clause about calling a Parliament was left out, adding, he knew the King fully designed it. But the Gentlemen were unwilling to leave out these words, and delivered their address themselves.

The King perceiving by the Petitions which were presented to him, that it was the Nation's fervent desire, a resolution to call a Parliament should be called, did not doubt it would be his first advice, the Peers, when assembled, would give him. He resolved therefore to prevent this advice, by summoning

(1) The King's answer to this Petition was: "That before the Receipt thereof, he well foresaw the danger that threatened himself and Crown, and therefore refused to summon all the Peers to his presence the 24th of September, and with them to consider what in this case he was to do, and what he should do, and what he should do, where the Petitioners, with the rest, might offer any thing conducing to these ends." Whitlock's Memoirs, p. 36.

1640. ing of the Parliament. The Lords, as well those at Rippon as those at York, being indispenfably obliged to repair to London, it would have been needlefs to begin the negotiation at Rippon, where the time would fcarce have allowed it to be opened. Wherefore the Engliſh Commiſſioners, whether of themſelves, or by the ſuggeſtion of the Scots, propoſed to the King the removal of the Treaty from Rippon to London; and the King was forced to conſent to it, though he plainly perceived the Scots expected to find many friends at London, and even in the Parliament, as indeed was the caſe. One may venture to ſay, that on occaſion of this Treaty, the King committed three capital errors. Firſt, in ſummoning the Parliament to meet at Weſtminſter, ſince he could not be ignorant how much the City of London was diſſatisfied with the Government, and conſequently, ready to countenance ſuch reſolutions as the Parliament might take againſt it. Whereas, had he ſummoned the Parliament to meet at York, or in any other place at a diſtance from London, he would thereby have broken in part the meaſures of the Scots and Engliſh male-contents. He had but too much cauſe afterwards to be ſenſible of this error. The ſecond was, the removal of the Treaty to London, where the Scots had their principal correſpondents. The third, in taking fo ſhort a time for the meeting of the Parliament, ſo that he had only the month of October to conclude a Peace with the Scots, a ſpace hardly ſufficient to agree with them on the preliminaries and terms of the ceſſation, before the King and Peers would be obliged to leave York and go to London. If he had not been in ſuch haſte to fix the meeting of the Parliament to the 3d of November, he might have either concluded the Treaty with the Scots, by granting what he could not have helped, or at leaſt, left them without excuſe, if they had obſtinately perſiſted in any unreaſonable demands. Whereas, not being able to finiſh the negotiation at Rippon, he was forced to remove the conferences to London, a City well-affectcd to the Scots, and where they could better than any where elſe, take juſt meaſures, whether with the chief inhabitants, or with the friends in the Parliament. The King was ſufficiently convinced of theſe errors, when it was too late to retrieve them.

Not to omit any thing, which to me ſeems material in this Hiſtory, I thought proper to add here the Earl of Briſtol's Proceſs at the beginning of King Charles's reign. For, it is not foreign to the purpoſe. On the contrary, this Proceſs, with the Earl's Answers, may be of great ſervice to clear the latter part of the reign of James I, as to the negotiation of the marriage of Prince Charles with the Spaniſh Infanta, and the reſtitution of the Palatinate. It may alſo give an idea of the character of Charles I, and the Duke of Buckingham. But it could not be infered in any other place, without a too great interruption of the thread of the Hiſtory.

Proceedings againſt the Earl of BRISTOL.

THE Earl of Briſtol, who had been Ambaſſador in Spain, to negotiate Prince Charles's marriage with the Spaniſh Infanta, was confined at his return to England, without being ever ſuffered to come into the King's preſence. As long as King James lived, the Duke of Buckingham, who was the cauſe of the Earl's diſgrace, pretended however to be willing to adjust his affair, if he would but answer to ſome queſtions or objections, before Commiſſioners appointed by the King. The Earl answered thoſe queſtions, but his reconciliation was not advanced by it. On the contrary, he found himſelf much farther from it by the death of King James, and the acceſſion of Charles I. to the Crown. The Earl of Briſtol finding himſelf on very ill terms, wiſhed to come off if poſſible, without injuring his honour. To this end, he applied to the Lord Conway Secretary of State, to deſire him to intercede for him with his Majeſty. There paſſed ſome Letters between theſe two Lords upon that ſubject, and at laſt, during the ſecond Parliament of King Charles in 1626, the Earl received from the Lord Conway, the following Letter.

My Lord,

I Received a Letter from your Lordſhip, dated the fourth of this month, written in answer to a former Letter, which I directed to your Lordſhip by his Majeſty's commandment. This laſt Letter, according to my duty, I have ſhewed unto his Majeſty, who hath peruſed it, and hath commanded me to write back to you again, that he finds himſelf nothing ſatisfied therewith. The queſtion propounded to your Lordſhip from his Majeſty, was plain and clear, Whether you did rather chuſe to fit ſtill, without being queſtioned for any errors paſt in your negotiation in Spain, and enjoy the benefit of the late gracious pardon granted in Parliament, whereof you may have the benefit: Or whether, for the clearing of your innocency, (whereof your ſelf, and your friends and followers are ſo confident) you will be content to wave the advantage of that pardon, and put your ſelf into a legal way of examination for the tryal thereof? His Majeſty's purpoſe thereby, is not to prevent you of any favours the Law hath given you; but if your allowance be ſuch as your words and letters import, he conceives it ſtands not with that publick and reſolute profeſſion of your integrity to decline your tryal. His Majeſty leaves the choice to your ſelf, and requires from you a direct answer, without circumlocution, or bargaining with him for future favours beforehand; but if you have a deſire to make uſe of that pardon, which cannot be denied you, nor is any way deſired to be taken from you, his Majeſty expects you ſhould at the leaſt forbear to magnify your ſervice, and out of an opinion of your innocency, caſt an aſperſion upon his Majeſty's juſtice, in not affording you that preſent fullneſs of liberty and favour, which cannot be drawn from him, but in his good time, and according to his good pleaſure.

No. 60. VOL. II.

Thus much I have in commandment to write to your Lordſhip, and to require your answer clearly and plainly, by this meſſenger ſent on purpoſe for it, and fo remain,

Your Lordſhip's humble Servant,

Edw. Conway.

The Earl of Briſtol's Answer.

My Lord,

I Have received your Letter of the 24th of March, the twenty eighth, and I am infinitely grieved to underſtand, that my former answer to yours of the 4th of March, hath not ſatisfied his Majeſty, which I will endeavour to do this, to the beſt of my underſtanding; and to that end, ſhall answer to the particular points of your preſent Letter, with the greateſt clearneſs I am able.

Firſt, Whereas you ſay in your Letter, that the queſtion propounded to me was plain and clear, viz. Whether I would chuſe to fit ſtill, without being queſtioned for any errors paſt in my negotiation with Spain, and enjoy the benefit of the late gracious pardon, whereof I may take the benefit? Or whether, being content to wave the advantage of that pardon, I ſhall put my ſelf into a legal way of examination for the tryal thereof, &c?

Firſt, Your Lordſhip may be pleaſed to remember, your laſt Propoſition was, Whether I deſired to reſt in the ſecurity I was in, which you now expreſs, whether I will chuſe to fit ſtill?

Secondly, Your Propoſition was, Whether I would acknowledge the gracious favour of his Majeſty that now is, who had been pleaſed not to queſtion my actions, when it is beſt known to your Lordſhip, That by a Commiſſion of the Lords, I was queſtioned upon twenty articles, divers involving felony and treaſon. Although it be true, that when I had ſo answered, (as I am confident their Lordſhips would have cleared me) I was ſo unhappy, as their Lordſhips never met more about that buſineſs.

But now your propoſition is, whether I will now chuſe to fit ſtill without being further queſtioned for errors paſt, whereas before it was required I ſhould acknowledge that I have not been queſtioned at all, which is a different thing? But conſidering both your letters together, and gathering the ſenſe and meaning, by making the latter an explanation of the former, which I could have wiſhed your Lordſhip would have more clearly explained, I return unto your Lordſhip this plain and direct answer.

That underſtanding by the ſecurity I am in, and fitting ſtill, and not being further queſtioned, I am reſtored to the bare freedom and liberty of a Subject and Peer (for a man being called in queſtion by his Majeſty, if after his Majeſty ſhall be pleaſed out of his goodneſs, that he reſt quiet and ſecure, and that he ſhall not be farther queſtioned, I conceive that it is not apparent that his liberty naturally revolveth unto him, when by his Majeſty's grace he is pleased to declare, he shall not be farther questioned, but may live in further security.) So that understanding your letter in this sort (for no direct answer can be made, until the sense of the question be truly stated,) I do most humbly acknowledge and accept his Majesty's grace and favour, and shall not wave any thing that shall come to me by the pardon of the 21st Jac. Regis, nor by the pardon of his Majesty's Coronation; and am so far from bargaining, as you are pleased to express it, for future favour (though I hope my humble and submissive courses of petitioning his Majesty, neither hath, nor shall deserve so hard an expression) that I shall not presume to much as press for any favour, until my dutiful and loyal behaviour may move his Majesty's royal and gracious heart thereunto, but receive with all humbleness, this my freedom and liberty; the which I shall only make use of in such sort, as I shall judge may be most agreeable to his Majesty's pleasure.

As for the second part of your letter, wherein you say, that if I desire to make use of that pardon, his Majesty expects that I should at least forbear to magnify my services; or out of an opinion of my own innocency cast an aspersion upon his Majesty's justice. To this point I answer, That as I hope I shall never err in that sort of immodesty of valuing my services, which I acknowledge to have been accompanied with infinite weakness and disabilities; so I trust it shall not displease, that I make use to mine own comfort, and the honour of my posterity, of those many written testimonies which my late most blessed master hath left me, of his gracious acceptance of my services for the space of twenty years. So likewise I hope the modest avowing of mine innocency will not be thought to cast any aspersion upon his Majesty's honour or justice. I must freely confess unto your Lordship, I am much afflicted with the differences of this nature made, both in your Lordship's last letter and in this. For if it shall be inferred as a thing reflecting upon the King's honour, that a man questioned, shall not endeavour to defend his own innocency before he be convicted, it will be impossible for any man to be safe; for the honour of his Majesty is too sacred a thing for any Subject, how innocent soever to contest against. So likewise, God forbid that it should be brought into consequences, (as in your former letter) as a tax upon the Government and Justice of his late Majesty, and Majesty that now is, that I should have suffered so long time, not being guilty. For as I never have been heard so much as to repine of injustice in their Majesties in all my sufferings, so I well know, That the long continuance of my troubles may well be attributed unto other causes; as to my own errors of passion, or other accidents; for your Lordship may well remember, That my affairs were almost two years since upon the point of a happy accommodation, had it not been interrupted by the unfortunate mistaking of the Speeches I used to Mr. Clark.

I shall conclude by intreating your Lordship's favour, That I may understand from you, as I hope for my comfort, that this letter hath given his Majesty satisfaction; or if there should yet remain any scruple, that I may have a clear and plain signification of the King's pleasure, which I shall obey with all humility,

Your Lordship's humble Servant,

BRISTOL.

Not long after, the Earl of Bristol being informed that the House of Commons were ill-affected to the Duke of Buckingham, believed he ought to improve that juncture. For which purpose he petitioned the House of Lords, shewing that he being a Peer of this Realm, had not received a summons to Parliament, and desired their Lordships to mediate with his Majesty, that he might enjoy the liberty of a Subject, and the privilege of his Peerage, after almost two years restraint, without being brought to a trial. And if any charge be brought in against him, he prayed that he might be tried by Parliament.

Upon which petition, it was resolved in a Committee of the Upper-House. That their Lordships should humbly beseech his Majesty, that a Writ of summons might be sent to the Earl of Bristol.

Hereupon the Duke of Buckingham signified to the House, That upon the Earl of Bristol's petition to the King, his Majesty had sent him his writ of summons: And withal, shewed the Lords a copy of a letter written from the King unto the said Earl, being as followeth:

We have received your Letter addressed unto us by Buckingham, and cannot but wonder that you should through forgetfulness, make request to us of favour, as if you stood evenly capable of it, when you know what your behaviour in Spain deserved of us, which you are to examine by the observations we made, and know you well remember; how at our first coming into Spain, taking upon you to be so wise as to foresee our intention to change our Religion, you were so far from dissuading us, as you offered your advice and secrecy to concur in it; and in many other conferences pressing to show how convenient it was to be a Roman Catholic; it being impossible in your opinion to do any great action otherwise: And how by wrong disadvantage, and difference you did to the Treaty, and to the right and interest of our dear Brother and Sister, and their Children; what disadvantage, inconvenience, and hazard you intangled us in by your artifices, putting off and delaying our return home; the great price you made of that State, and the low price you set this Kingdom at; still maintaining that we under colour of friendship to Spain, did it is in our power against them, which they said, you very well knew: And lest of all, your approving of these conditions, that our Navy should be brought up in the Emperor's Court, to which Sir Walter Aston then said, That he durst not give his consent for fear of his head: You replying unto him, That without some such great action, neither marriage nor peace could be had.

The Lord-Keeper to the Earl of Bristol.

My very good Lord,

By his Majesty's commandment, I herewith send unto your Lordship your Writ of Summons for the Parliament; but withal to signify his Majesty's pleasure herein further, that howsoever he gives way to the awarding of the Writ; yet his meaning is thereby, not to discharge any former directions for restraint of your Lordship's coming hither, but that you continue under the same restriction as you did before; so as your Lordship's personal attendance is to be forborn, and therein I doubt not but your Lordship will readily give his Majesty satisfaction. And so I commend my service very heartily unto your Lordship, and remain,

Your Lordship's assured Friend and Servant,

Dorset Court,

The Earl of Bristol's answer to the Lord-Keeper.

May it please your Lordship,

I Have received your Lordship's Letter of the 31st of March, and with it his Majesty's Writ of Summons for the Parliament; in the one his Majesty commandeth me, that all excuses be laid aside, upon my faith and allegiance, I fail not to come and attend his Majesty; and this under the Great-Seal of England. In the other, as in a Letter missive, his Majesty's pleasure is intimated by your Lordship, that my personal attendance should be forborn: I must crave leave ingenuously to confess unto your Lordship, that I want judgment rightly to direct my self in this case; as likewise that I am ignorant how far this may trench upon the privileges of the Peers of this land, and upon mine and their safety hereafter: For if the Writ be not obeyed, the Law calleth it a Misprision, and highly fineable, whereof we have had late examples; and a missive letter being avowed or not, is to be doubted would not be adjudged a sufficient discharge against the Great-Seal of England. On the other side, if the Letter be not obeyed, a Peer may, de facto, be committed unto a contempt, in the interim, and the question cleared afterwards; so that in this case it is above mine abilities. I can only answer your Lordship, that I will most exactly obey; and to the end I may understand which obedience will be, in all kinds, most suitable to my duty, I will presently repair to my private lodging at London, and there remain until in this, and other causes, I shall have petitioned his Majesty, and understand his further pleasure. For the second part of your Lordship's Letter, where your Lordship saith, That his Majesty's meaning is not thereby to discharge any former directions, for restraint of your Lordship's coming hither, but that you continue under the same restriction as before; so that your Lordship's personal attendance here is to be forborn: I conceive your Lordship intendeth this touching my coming to Parliament only; for as touching my coming to London, I never had at any time one word of prohibition, or colourable pretence of restraint; but on the contrary, having his late Majesty's express leave to come to London, to follow my affairs; out of my respect to his Majesty, then Prince, and to the Duke of Buckingham, I forbore to come until I might know, whether my coming would not be disagreeable unto them. Whereunto his Majesty was pleased to answer, both under the hand of the Duke, and of Mr. Secretary Conway, that he took my respect unto him herein in very good part, and would with me to make use of the leave the King had given me: Since which time I never received any letter or message of restraint, only his Majesty by his Letter, bearing date June the last, commandeth me to remain as I was in the time of the King his Father, which was with liberty to come to London to follow my own affairs as I pleased, as will appear pear unto your Lordship, if you will afford me so much favour as to peruse them. I have writ this much unto your Lordship, because I would not, through misunderstanding, fall into displeasure by my coming up, and to intreat your Lordship to inform his Majesty thereof: And that my Lord Conway, by whose Warrant I was only restrained in the late King's time of famous memory, may produce any one word, that may have so much as any colourable pretence of debarring my coming up to London. I beseech your Lordship to pardon my desire to have things clearly understood; for the want of that formerly hath caused all my troubles; and when any thing is misinformed concerning me, I have little or no means to clear it; so that my chief labour is to avoid misunderstanding. I shall conclude with beseeching your Lordship to do me this favour, to let his Majesty understand, that my coming up is only rightly to understand his pleasure, whereunto I shall in all things most dutifully and humbly conform my self. And so with my humble service to your Lordship, I recommend you to God's holy protection, and remain,

Your Lordship's most humble Servant,

Sheshorn, April
12, 1626.

B R I S T O L .

The Earl of Bristol's second Petition presented to the House of Lords, April 19, 1626.

The humble Petition of John Earl of Bristol.

Humbly shewing unto your Lordships,

THAT he hath lately received his Writ of Parliament, for which he returneth unto your Lordships most humble thanks, but jointly with it a Letter from my Lord-Keeper, commanding him in his Majesty's name to forbear his personal attendance; and although he shall ever obey the least intimation of his Majesty's pleasure, yet he most humbly offereth unto your Lordships wife considerations as too high a point for him, how far this may trench upon the liberty and safety of the Peers, and the authority of their Letters Patents, to be in this sort discharged by a Letter missive of any Subject, without the King's hand; and for your Lordships due information, he hath annexed a copy of the said Lord-Keeper's letter, and his answer thereunto.

He further humbly petitioneth your Lordships, That having been, for the space of two years, highly wronged in point of his liberty, and of his honour, by many sinister aspersions which have been cast upon him, without being permitted to answer for himself; which hath been done by the power and industry of the Duke of Buckingham, to keep him from the presence of his Majesty and the Parliament, lest he should discover many crimes concerning the said Duke.

He therefore most humbly beseecheth, That he may be heard both in the point of his wrong, and of his accusation of the said Duke; wherein he will make it appear, how infinitely the said Duke hath both abused their Majesties, the State, and both the Houses of Parliament. And this he is most confident will not be denied, since the Court of Parliament never refuseth to hear the poorest Subject seeking for redress of wrongs, nor the accusation against any, be he never so powerful: And herein he beseecheth your Lordships to mediate to his Majesty, for the suppliant's coming to the House, in such sort as you shall think fitting; affording his Majesty, that all he shall say, shall not only tend to the service of his Majesty and the State, but highly to the honour of his Majesty's royal person, and of his princely virtues: And your suppliant shall ever pray for your Lordships prosperity.

Hereupon the Lord-Keeper delivered this message from the King to the House of Lords.

That his Majesty hath heard of a petition preferred unto this House by the Earl of Bristol, so void of duty and respects to his Majesty, that he hath great cause to punish him; That he hath also heard with what duty and respectfulness to his Majesty their Lordships have proceeded therein, which his Majesty conceiveth to have been upon the knowledge they have, that he hath been restrained for matters of State; and his Majesty doth therefore give their Lordships thanks for the same, and is resolved to put the cause upon the honour and justice of their Lordships and this House. And thereupon his Majesty commanded him (the Lord-Keeper) to signify to their Lordships his royal pleasure, that the Earl of Bristol be sent for as a Delinquent, to answer in this House his offences, committed in his negotiations before his Majesty's being in Spain, and his offences since his Majesty's coming from Spain, and his scandalizing the Duke of Buckingham immediately, and his Majesty by reflection, with whose privacy, and by whose directions the Duke did guide his actions, and without which he did nothing. All which his Majesty will cause to be charged against him before their Lordships in this House.

The Lords appointed a Committee to attend the King, and to present their humble thanks to his Majesty, for the trust and confidence he had placed in the honour and justice of their House.

ON Monday the first of May, the Gentleman-Usher brought the Earl of Bristol to the Bar, according to their Lordships order; and the Lord-Keeper acquainted him, that the King had commanded his Attorney-General, to charge the Earl of Bristol before their Lordships with high-Treason, and other offences and misdemeanours of a very high nature, that they might proceed in a legal course against him, according to the justice and usual proceedings of Parliament.

Articles of accusation against the Earl of Bristol, presented to the Upper-House by the King's Attorney-General.

I. Offences done and committed by the Earl of Bristol, before his Majesty's going into Spain, when he was Prince.

I. THAT the said Earl being trusted and employed by the said late King as his Ambassador to Ferdinando, then and now Emperor of Germany; and to Philip the IVth, then and now King of Spain, in Annis 1621, 22, 23. And having commission, and particular and special direction, to treat with the said Emperor and the King of Spain, for the plenary restoring of such parts of the Dominions, Territories, and Possessions of the Count Palatine of Rhine, who married with the most excellent Lady Elizabeth his now royal consort, the only daughter of the said late King James; which were then wrongfully and in hostile manner taken, and possessed with and by the armies of the said Emperor and King of Spain, or any other; and for the preserving and keeping such other parts thereof as were not then lost, but were then in the protection of the said late King James; and to the use of the said Count Palatine and his Children: And also to treat with the said King of Spain for a marriage to be had between the most high and excellent Prince Charles, then Prince of Wales, the only Son and Heir-apparent of the said King James, and now our most Sovereign Lord, and the most illustrious Lady Donna Maria the Infanta of Spain, Sister to the now King of Spain: He the said Earl, contrary to his duty and allegiance, and contrary to the trust and duty of an Ambassador, at Madrid in the Kingdom of Spain, to advance and further the designs of the said King of Spain against our said sovereign Lord, his children, friends, and allies; falsely, willingly, and traitorously, and as a traitor to our said late Sovereign Lord the King, by sundry letters and other messages sent by the said Earl from Madrid, in the year aforesaid, unto King James and his Ministers of State of England, did confidently and reclusely inform, advise, and assure the said late King, that the said Emperor and King of Spain, would really, fully and effectually make restitution and plenary restitution to the said Count Palatine, and his children of the said Dominions, Territories and Possessions of the said Count Palatine, and of the said Electoral Dignity: And that the said King of Spain did really, fully and effectually intend the said Marriage between the said Lady his Sister, and the said Prince our now Sovereign Lord, according to articles formerly propounded between the said Kings: Whereas in truth, the said Emperor and King of Spain, or either of them, never really intended such restitution as aforesaid; and whereas the said King of Spain never really intended the marriage according to those Articles propounded, but the said Emperor and the King of Spain, intended only by those treaties, to gain time to compass their own ends and purposes, to the detriment of this Kingdom, (of all which, the said Earl of Bristol neither was nor could be ignorant) the said late King James by entertaining those Treaties, and continuing them upon those false assurances given unto him by the said Earl, as aforesaid, was made secure, and lost the opportunity of time, and thereby the said Dominions, Territories and Possessions of the said Count Palatine, and the Electoral Dignity become utterly lost; and some parts thereof were taken out of the actual possession of the said King James, unto whose protection and safe-keeping they were put, and committed to the said Count Palatine; and the most excellent Lady Elizabeth his wife, and their children, are now utterly disposed of and bereaved thereof, to the high dishonour of our said late Sovereign Lord King James, to the dishonour of the said late King's children, and their posterity, of their ancient patrimony, and to the disadvantage and discouraging of the rest of the Princes of Germany, and other Kings and Princes in amity and league with his Majesty.

II. That the said Earl of Bristol being Ambassador for his late Majesty King James as aforesaid, in Annis supra dictis, and having received perfect, plain, and particular instructions instructions and directions from his said late Majesty, that he should put the King of Spain to a speedy and punctual answer, touching the treaties aforesaid : And the said Earl well understanding the effect of those instructions and directions so given unto him, and taking precise knowledge thereof ; and also knowing how much it concerned his late Majesty in honour and safety (as his great affairs then stood) to put these Treaties to a speedy conclusion : Yet nevertheless, he the said Earl, falsely, willingly and traitorously, contrary to his allegiance, and contrary to the trust and duty of an Ambassador, continued those treaties upon generalities, without effectual pressing the said King of Spain unto particular conclusions, according to his Majesty's directions as aforesaid ; and so the said Earl intended to have continued the said Treaties upon generalities, and without reducing them to certainties and to direct conclusions, to the high dishonour of his said late Majesty, and to the extreme danger and detriment of his Majesty's person, his crown and dominions, confederates and allies.

III. That the said Earl of Bristol, being Ambassador for his said late Majesty as aforesaid, in the years aforesaid, to the intent to discourage the said late King James, for the taking up of arms, entering into hostility with the said King of Spain, and for resisting him and his forces, from attempting the invasion of his said late Majesty's Dominions, and the Dominions of his said late Majesty's Confederates, Friends, and Allies ; the said King of Spain having long thirsted after an universal Monarchy in these western parts of the world, hath many times, both by words and letters, to the said late King and his Ministers, extolled and magnified the greatness and power of the said King of Spain, and represented unto his said late Majesty, the supposed dangers which would ensue unto him, if a war should happen between them ; and affirmed, and insinuated unto his said late Majesty, that if such a war should ensue, his said late Majesty, during the rest of his life, must expect neither to hunt, nor hawk, nor eat his meat in quiet : Whereby the said Earl of Bristol did cunningly and traitorously strive to retard the resolutions of the said late King, to declare himself an enemy to the said King of Spain, (who, under colour of Treaties and Alliances, had so much abused him) and to resist his arms and forces, to the loss of opportunity of time, which cannot be recalled, or regained, and to the extreme danger, dishonour, and detriment of this Kingdom.

IV. The said Earl of Bristol, upon his dispatch out of this Realm of England, in his ambassage aforesaid, having communication with divers persons of London, within this Realm of England, before his going into Spain, in and about his ambassage concerning the said Treaty, for the negotiation whereof, the said Earl purposely was sent ; and he the said Earl being then told, that there was little probability, that these Treaties would or could have any good success, he the said Earl acknowledged as much ; and yet nevertheless, contrary to his duty and allegiance, and to the faith and truth of an Ambassador, he the said Earl said and affirmed, that he cared not what the success thereof would be ; for he would take care to have his Instructions, and pursue them punctually ; and howsoever the business went, he would make his fortune thereby, or used words at that time to such effect ; whereby it plainly appeareth, that the said Earl, from the beginning herein, intended not the service or honour of his late Majesty, but his own corrupt and sinister ends, and for his own advancement.

V. That from the beginning of his Negotiation, and throughout the whole management thereof, by the said Earl of Bristol, and during his said ambassage, he the said Earl, contrary to his faith, and duty to God, the true Religion professed by the Church of England, and the Peace of this Church and State, did intend and resolve, that if the said Marriage so treated of as aforesaid, should by his ministry be effected, that thereby the Romish Religion, and Professors thereof, should be advanced within this Realm, and other his Majesty's Realms and Dominions, and the true Religion and Professors thereof, discouraged and discountenanced. And to that end and purpose, the said Earl, during the time aforesaid, by Letters unto his late Majesty, and otherwise, often counselled and perswaded his said late Majesty to set at liberty the Jesuits and Priests of the Romish Religion ; which, according to the good, religious, and publick Laws of this Kingdom, were imprisoned or restrained, and to grant, and to allow unto the Papists, and professors of the Romish Religion, free toleration, and silencing of all the Laws made, and standing in force against them.

VI. That by the false informations and intelligence of the said Earl of Bristol, during the time aforesaid, unto his said late Majesty, and to his Majesty that now is, (being then Prince) concerning the said Treaties ; and by the assurances aforesaid given by the said Earl, his said late Majesty, and the Prince, his now Majesty, being put in hopes, and by the said long delay used, without producing any effect, their Majesties being put into jealousies, and just suspicion, that there was no such sincerity used toward them as they expected ; and with so many answers from the Earl, had on their part been undertaken, the said Prince, our now gracious Sovereign, was informed, out of his love to his Country, to his Allies, Friends, and Confederates, and to the peace of Christendom, who all suffered by those intolerable delays, in his own person to undertake his long and dangerous journey into Spain, that thereby he might either speedily conclude those Treaties, or perfectly discover, that on the Emperor's, and the King of Spain's part, there was no true and real intention to bring the same to conclusion, upon any fit and honorable terms and conditions, and did absolutely and speedily break them off. By which journey, the person of the said Prince, being then Heir-apparent to the Crown of this Realm, and in his person, the peace and safety of this Kingdom, did undergo such apparent, and such inevitable danger, as at the very remembrance thereof, the hearts of all good Subjects do even tremble.

II. Offences done and committed by the said Earl, during the time of the Prince's being in Spain.

VII. THAT at the Prince's coming into Spain, during the time aforesaid, the Earl of Bristol, cunningly, falsely, and traitorously, moved and perswaded the Prince, being then in the power of a foreign King of the Romish Religion, to change his Religion, which was done in this manner. At the Prince's first coming to the said Earl, he asked the Prince, for what he came thither ? The Prince at first not conceiving the Earl's meaning, answered, You know as well as I. The Earl replied, Sir, Servants can never serve their Masters indifferently, although they may do it faithfully, unless they know their meanings fully. Give me leave therefore to tell you what they say in the Town, is the cause of your coming, that you mean to change your Religion, and to declare it here, and yet cunningly to disguise it. The Earl added further : Sir, I do not speak this, that I will persuade you to do it, or that I will promise you to follow your example, though you will do it ; but as your faithful Servant, if you will trust me with so great secret, I will endeavour to carry it the discreetest way I can. The Prince being moved at this unexpected motion, again said unto him, I wonder what you have ever found in me, that you should conceive I would be so base and unworthy, as for a wife to change my Religion. The said Earl replying, he desired the Prince to pardon him if he had offended him, it was but out of his desire to serve him. Which persuasions of the said Earl was the more dangerous, because the more subtle ; whereas it had been the duty of a faithful Servant, to God and his Master, if he had found the Prince staggering in his Religion, to have prevented so great an error, and to have perswaded against it, so to have avoided the dangerous consequence thereof to the true Religion, and to the State, if such a thing should have happened.

VIII. That afterwards, during the Prince's being in Spain, the said Earl having conference with the said Prince about the Romish Religion, he endeavoured falsely and traitorously to persuade the Prince to change his Religion, and to become a Roman Catholic, and to become obedient to the usurped authority of the Pope of Rome : And to that end and purpose, the said Earl traitorously used these words unto the said Prince, that the State of England never did any great thing, but when they were under the obedience of the Pope of Rome, and that it was impossible they could do any thing of note otherwise.

IX. That during the time of the Prince's being in Spain, the Prince consulting and advising with the said Earl, and others, about a new offer made by the King of Spain, touching the Palatine's eldest Son, to marry with the Emperor's Daughter, but then he must be bred up in the Emperor's Court ; the said Earl delivered his opinion, that the proposition was reasonable ; whereas, when Sir Walter Aston then present, falling into some passion, said, that he durst not for his head consent to it ; the Earl of Bristol replied, that he saw no such great inconvenience in it ; for that he might be bred up in the Emperor's Court in our Religion. But when the extreme danger, and, in a manner, the impossibility thereof was pressed unto the said Earl, he said again, that without some great action, the peace of Christendom would never be had ; which was so dangerous, and so desperate a Counsel, that one near the Crown of England should be poisoned in his Religion, and become an unfriend to our State, that the consequences thereof, both for the present and future times, were infinitely dangerous ; and yet hereunto did his disaffection to our Religion, the blindness in his Judgment, misled by his sinister respects, and the too much regard he had to the House of Austria, lead him

III. Offences

III. Offences done and committed by the said Earl, after the Prince's coming from Spain.

X. THAT when the Prince had clearly found him self and his Father deluded in these Treaties, and hereupon resolved to return from the Court of Spain; yet because it behoved him to part freely, he left the powers of the Desponsores with the Earl of Bristol, to be delivered upon the return of the dispensation from Rome, which the King of Spain insisted upon; and without which, as he pretended, he would not conclude the marriage. The Prince foreseeing and fearing, lest after the Desponsores, the Infanta that should then be his wife might be put into a Monastery, wrote a Letter back to the said Earl from Segovia, thereby commanding him not to make use of the said powers, until he could give him assurance, that a Monastery should not rob him of his wife; which Letter the said Earl received, and with speed returned an answer thereto in England, persuading against this direction, yet promising obedience thereunto. Shortly after which, the Prince sent another Letter to the said Earl into Spain, discharging him of his Father's command. But his late Majesty, by the same messenger, sent him a more exprefs direction, not to dispatch the Desponsores, until a full conclusion were had of the other Treaty of the Palatinate with this of the marriage; for his Majesty said, That he would not have one Daughter to laugh, and leave the other Daughter weeping. In which dispatch, although there were some mistaking, yet in the next following, the same was corrected, and the Earl of Bristol tied to the same restriction, which himself confessed in one of his dispatches afterwards, and promised to obey punctually the King's command therein; yet nevertheless, contrary to his duty and allegiance, in another Letter sent immediately after, he declared That he had let a day for the Desponsores, without any assurance, or so much as treating of those things which were commanded to him as restrictions; and that so short a day, that if extraordinary diligence, with good success in the journey, had not concurred, the Prince's hands might have been bound up; and yet he neither sure of a wife, nor any assurance given of the temporal Articles. All which, in his high presumption, he adventured to do, being an exprefs breach of his instructions; and if the same had not been prevented by his late Majesty's vigilancy, it might have turned to the infinite dishonour and prejudice of his Majesty.

XI. Lastly, That he hath offended in a high and contemptuous manner, in preferring a scandalous Petition to this honourable House, to the dishonour of his Majesty of blessed memory deceased, and of his sacred Majesty that now is, which are no way sufferable in a subject towards his Sovereign; and in one article of that Petition specially, wherein he gives his now Majesty the lie, in denying and offering to falsify that relation which his Majesty affirmed, and thereunto added many things of his own remembrance to both Houses of Parliament.

Robert Heath, [Attorney-General.]

The Earl of Bristol, upon the Attorney-General's accusing him of High-Treason, thus exprest himself:

"That he had exhibited his Petition to the House, April 19, that he might come up and be heard in his accusation of the Duke of Buckingham, and that thereupon, he being a Peer of this realm, is now charged with Treason: That he had heretofore informed the late King of the Duke's unfaithful service, and thereupon the Duke laboured that he might be clapt up in the Tower, presently upon his return out of Spain: That he importuned the late King, that he might be heard before himself, and his Majesty promised it; I pray God, (said he) that that promise did him no hurt, for he died shortly after. And for the King's promise, he vouched the Lord-Chamberlain for a witness; and he desired the Lords to take notice, that their House was possessed already of his said Petition, and of his accusation of the said Duke: And therefore desired first, that they would receive his charge against the Duke and the Lord Conway, and not to invalid his testimony against him by the King's charge against him; and that he might not be impeached, till his charge of so high a nature be first heard.

"So he tendered to the House the Articles against the Duke, which the Clerk received, and he withdrew, and his Petition exhibited the 19th of April was read; and the Lords resolved upon the question, That the said Earl's charge against the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Conway should be presently read."

The Earl being shortly after called in again to the Bar of the Lord's House, concerning his Articles against the Duke, made this Speech.

First, He craved pardon of their Lordships for his earnest Speeches the other day, confessing them to have been in passion, saying, That unexpected accusation of Treason would warm any honest heart, but would hereafter amend it. Then he rendered their Lordships humble thanks for their manner of proceeding against him; and desired to know, from Mr. Attorney, whether that was his whole charge or not. Mr. Attorney answered, That he had commandment to open no more against him; peradventure, upon the opening of the charge, some particulars might arise, and be urged, but no new matter should.

Then the Earl desired to know of Mr. Attorney, who was the relator to his charge, and that he might understand who was his accuser. Mr. Attorney answered, That the King himself, out of his own mouth, had given him directions for his own relation against him, and corrected many things that were added. Unto which the Earl answered, that he would not contest with the King, neither did it seem him so to do; neither esteemed he his life or his fortunes so much, as to save them by contesting with his Sovereign; and therefore would make no reply or answer, were it not that his Religion and Honour were jointly questioned with his life; but this being to defend to his posterity, for their sakes he was an humble suitor unto his Majesty, that he would not take indignation at his own just defence, yet would be ready to make any humble submission to his Majesty; and heartily desired some means might be made, that he might make it personally to himself, wherein he would submit himself most willingly to some such act of humiliation and submission, (not wronging his innocency) that never subject did towards his Sovereign: And also that his Majesty would be pleased to set himself in his throne of Justice, and declare out of his royal Justice, that he would have the Duke and him upon equal terms, and that neither of their causes should be advanced before the other's.

These were his humble Petitions, which he besought their Lordships to present unto his Majesty, and to take it into their considerations, of how dangerous a consequence it would be, if the King should be accuser, judge, witness, and should have the confiscation. As touching the charge against him, he said, He had once answered it all, except that of his Petition; and he doubted not but to clear himself before their Lordships, of every particular of it. He said, He expected not to have heard of this again, having once answered it: He rather expected to have been charged with some practice with Spain against the State; or the receipt of ten or twenty thousand pounds, for the persuading and procuring of the delivery up of some Town, of which the Crown was in possession, as might be the town of Flushing, the Brill, or the like; or for being the means of lending the King's ships to a foreign nation, and that against thole of our own Religion; or for revealing his Majesty's highest secrets, which none above two or three dares know; or for treating the greatest affairs (1), as it were by his own authority, without formal instructions in the points; for having taken rewards, or been corrupted by a foreign Prince; or to have broken his instructions in any ecclesiastical point; or, as the Law calleth it, to have committed an overt-act of disloyalty; and not to be charged, after seven ambassages, with discourses and interferences.

Then he desired their Lordships, that he might have a copy of his charge in writing, and time allowed him for his answer, and counsel assigned him to plead his cause; and said, There was a great difference between the Duke of Buckingham and him; for the Duke was accused of treason, and yet at large, and in the King's favour; and he being accused but of that which he had long since answered, was a prisoner: And therefore he moved, that they might be put in equal condition.

And as touching the Lord Conway, inasmuch as he had given in Articles against him, he desired his Lordship, he might not meddle in that particular business, or use the King's name against him, ex officio; he also besought their Lordships to be suitors to his Majesty on his behalf, that all the particular dispatches of his own ambassages, and Sir Walter Aston's, might be brought thither, and that he might make use of them for his defence, as his evidence: Then he desired their Lordships, not to think it tedious for him to proceed, and lay open his case unto them: Which being granted, he began as followeth.

He said, That he had the honour to serve the late King his Master, of happy memory, for the space of twenty years, and a long time as a counsellor, and in seven foreign ambassages: In all which time, in point of his negotiation, he had never received one check or rebuke, until the return of the Duke of Buckingham out of Spain; and therefore, from thence he would begin his present narration.

(1) Of all these things was the Duke of Buckingham accused by the Publick. Rapin.
No. 60. Vol. I. II.

The very day that his Majesty departed from Spain, he was pleased to tell him, That he had no ways offended him, but did him the honour to trust him with the custody of the powers for his marriage; and after his return into England, wrote unto him some Letters, which did in no kind express any distrust or displeasure against him. About the same time, he wrote unto his Majesty several letters, as in duty he was bound, not for any earthly respect whatsoever, to conceal from him the true estate of his affairs; in which Letters he set down truly and honestly, That he conceived, that the distastes grown there betwixt the King of Spain and his Ministers, and the Duke of Buckingham, would disorder and utterly overthrow all his affairs, if his wisdom prevented it not; hinc ille lachrymæ: The Duke of Buckingham got a sight and knowledge of the Letters; and fearing, lest the Earl at his return should discover unto his said late Majesty, his practices and misdemeanors in Spain, he resolved, That his access to the King was no ways to be admitted, and therefore laboured and endeavoured, that he might be committed to the Tower presently upon his arrival; and conceiving that the Lord Marquis Hamilton, in regard of his friendship with the Earl, and the alliance which was then intended between them, might oppose his course, he earnestly pressed him therein, and moved him to deal with my Lord Chamberlain to the same purpose, vowing, That there was no hurt intended to the Earl, but only that he feared, that if he should be admitted to the King, he would cross and disturb the course of affairs. But they were so honourable, that neither of them would condescend therunto; and so that intention of his took no effect.

This design of the Duke not taking, he fell upon other things, indeed to have frightened the Earl out of his country and honour; and thereupon laid some great and sinister aspersions upon him in both Houses of Parliament, thinking thereby to have terrified him, that he should not return, saying, That if he kept not himself where he was, and laid hold of those great offers which he heard were made unto him in Spain, it would be worse with him.

Here the Earl desired my Lord Chamberlain, that he would be pleased upon his honour, to deliver what he knew of the matter. Whereupon the Lord Chamberlain attested the truth of what the Earl had said concerning the Duke of Buckingham, the Marquis of Hamilton, and himself.

Then the Earl of Bristol proceeded and said, That the knowledge of these aspersions cast upon him in the Parliament, came first unto him at Bourdeaux in France, where he was coming home at leisure, in the company of his wife and family, having formerly sent a post of purpose to the Lord Conway, to know if his speedy return would be any way useful to his Majesty's service: Who answered him, That he might very well return at leisure with his family. And in the mean time, he was fallen upon by the Duke of Buckingham in Parliament, in such sort as your Lordships well remember; of whose declaration, he said, he would boldly affirm unto their Lordships, that there was scarce any one thing concerning him in it, which was not contrary to, or different from the truth.

From Bourdeaux the Earl took post, making haste, for that he hoped to clear his honour in Parliament before it should break up; and being arrived at Calais, he sent over to have one of the King's ships, for which there was public order given: But although both wind and weather were as fair as could be, and the King's ships lay at Bologne, having carried over Count Mansfield, and might every day within three hours have been with him, yet the ship came not in eight days expectation; so that the Earl, fearing the Parliament would be dissolved, was enforced to pass the sea in a boat with six oars, as he did, having with him thirty or forty thousand pounds of the King's Jewels.

Upon his landing at Dover, hoping that if his arrest should have been deferred till his coming to London, he might have gotten directly to the King's presence, which the Duke resolved was by no means to be admitted: The Earl was there, by a letter of the Lord Conway's, delivered unto him by a servant of his, in his Majesty's name, commanded to retire himself to his house, and not to come to the Court, or the King's presence, until he should have answered unto certain questions, which his Majesty would appoint some of the Lords of the Council to ask him. Hereupon he sent presently to his Majesty, who sent him word, That his restraint was neither for any ill meaning unto him, nor that it should last long, but was intended for his good, to keep the Parliament from falling violently upon him. And the same reason the Duke alleged to some of his friends; and all those his troubles, which have followed upon his first restraint, have been procured by the Duke's art, under colour of favour. But the Earl having received his message from the King, became a most humble suitor unto his Majesty, that he would expose him to the Parliament; for that if he had not served him honestly in all things, he deserved no favour, but to be proceeded against with all severity. And in this particular he pressed the King, as far as could stand with duty and good manners; but received answer from his Majesty, That there should but few more days pass, before he would put an end to his affairs. And about this time the Parliament was dissolved.

He still continued his solicitation to be admitted to the King's presence, who sent him word, and confirmed it by oath: That as soon as he should have answered the questions which the Commissioners were to propound to him, he would both see him and hear him, and wondered that he should so much doubt thereof. He then solicited with all earnestness to have the questions sent unto him, which was promised he should be within few days. In the interim, his Majesty being desirous that the business should have been accommodated, sent secretly to him by a Gentleman (who is ready to depose it,) this message; That he should write a fair Letter to the Duke, and leave the rest to him. Hereupon the Duke sent a Gentleman (one Mr. Clark) with fair propositions, offering to procure him whatsoever he could reasonably pretend; only he must not be admitted to the King's presence for some time; and that the Duke would have the disposing of his Vice-Chamberlain's place, having been therein formerly engaged. The said Gentleman, That to condescend to any such course, were jointly to confess himself faulty in some kind, which he would not do for any respect in the world; and let him know the great wrong that the Duke had already done him; and therefore it would be more honorable for him to procure him some reparation, than to press him farther. Moreover, not by way of message, but by way of information of the said Mr. Clark, he let him know, how fit it were for the Duke not to press these things, who could not but be conscious of his own faults, and knew his innocency; and withal shewed him a Paper that he had made ready for the King, containing the particulars wherein the Duke had disparaged him.

Mr. Clark making the Duke acquainted herewith, the Duke wrote a letter the next day to the Earl, bearing date 7th July, telling him, that he had willingly intended the accommodation of his affairs; but by what he had now said to Mr. Clark, he was dissuaded, unless he should be pleased to relent it. Whereupon the Earl answered with that directness he thought besting him in point of honour. The course of mediation was interrupted, and the Duke so far incensed, that he swore he would have him questioned for his life. In the interim, (which the Earl desired might be known to the Lords) his late Majesty was so far from thinking him a delinquent, or any way dishonest, that he was often heard to say and swear, That he held him an honest man, and that he would answer for him that he had neither committed felony nor treason. And this divers are ready to depose. The which he well confirmed, for that he gave general leave to all Gentlemen of the Court, Privy-Counsellors, and to his Secretary of State, to have free access unto him; yea, even so far as to admit of visits and intercourses with Spanish ambassadors, and the Padre Maestro, as is best known to my Lord Conway, by whose letter he received his Majesty's leave in that particular.

Then he resumed the state of his business, where he left it, which was in the hands of the Commissioners, and they were to frame interrogatories for him; the which, although they had promised should be sent within a few days, yet such art was used, that six or seven weeks were spent in the framing of them, to the end that his Majesty's progress beginning, there might be no means for the further clearing of the business: And so supposing that for the answering of the twenty interrogatories of so high a nature, the Earl would take some time, they caused the said interrogatories to be delivered unto him within a few days before the beginning of the progress; but he used so much diligence, that he made ready to answer in Person, though it were in the nature of a delinquent. Unto which his Majesty answered most graciously, That out of his favour, and for that he would not do him wrong, he would not admit of it, but that he should send him his answer, and he would instantly put an end to his businesses; as will appear by letters. Hereupon the Duke was put into a great strait how to keep him any longer from his Majesty, but desired that only a few questions more might be asked of him; which the King upon great urging and instance, condescended unto, so that the questions might be presently sent him: But herein were such artifices used, that the bringing of any was delayed until the King had begun his progress; and then within a day or two, the Lord Conway sent him word, That he had order indeed for the sending of him some more questions, but out of his affection to him he forbore the sending of them, unless he should press for them. Whereupon the Earl instantly wrote unto him, that they might be sent unto him. My Lord Conway made him answer by his letter, That he wished rather the course of mediation might be pursued, for that would but further exasperate; but if he would needs have the questions they should be sent to him. Whereupon he sent to solicit his Lordship for them with all earnestness, inasmuch as to petition his late Majesty twice, that the said questions might be sent: But when the turn was served of keeping him from the King's presence, the said questions were never more heard of till this day.

So likewise the Earl having sent his answer to all the Commissioners, who most of them made not nice to declare, that they were fully satisfied; and when it was perceived that the Commissioners would certainly clear him, and that he thereby should be restored unto his Majesty's favour, they were never more permitted to meet: A proceeding, which, as he conceived, their Lordships would think hardly to be paralleled, that a commission should be appointed to condemn, if there had been cause, but not to clear.

After the progress was ended, he began again to solicit his Majesty, and wrote particularly unto the Duke of Buckingham. Whereupon the Duke was pleased to send four or five propositions, which he desired he should acknowledge; the which propositions contained nothing but what hath been already propounded and satisfied in the former interrogatories: And if he would make his acknowledgment, he then promised to employ his force and power with the King and Prince, that he should be admitted to kiss their hands, and be received into their gracious favour; but otherwise, in a menacing sort, that he should lay his hands upon his breast, and so that would be best for him. And in the preface of the said propositions, he writeth these words which follow, It is an assertion not granted, that the Earl of Bristol, by his answer hath satisfied either the King, the Prince, or me of his innocency. A presumptuous commination for any Subject.

But these propositions were so unjust, that he wrote unto the Duke, that instead of an acknowledgment, he had sent him an answer unto them; unto which, if either himself, or any man living was able to reply, he would submit himself to any thing that should be demanded. But this no way satisfied the Duke, although it did his late Majesty, who, in the Duke's presence said, I were to be accounted a tyrant, to enjoin an innocent man to confess faults, of which he was not guilty. And thereupon sent him word, that he should make his answer, but acknowledge nothing he was not faulty in. And although he had received this message from the King's own mouth, as will be depoled, yet the Duke at the same time wrote unto him, that the conclusion of all that has been treated with his Majesty, was, that he should make the acknowledgment in such manner, as was set down in this paper. And at this time likewise it was that his Majesty sent him word, that he would hear him concerning the Duke of Buckingham, as well as he had heard the Duke concerning him. And this was not long before his Majesty's sickness; And in the interim, as he had heard by several ways the King suffered much, and was infinitely pained by the Duke concerning the said Earl and his affairs; and this he said, was the suffering he had spoken of to their Lordships the other day.

The Earl craved leave of their Lordships to specify some other particulars, whereby it should appear, that his Majesty was in no kind ill-opinion of him till his dying day, viz. That several persons will depole, that they have heard his Majesty say, that he esteemed him an honest man; and that he was pleased to accept of toys by way of present from him, graciously, and in good part; and at last was likewise pleased to give him leave to come to London, and to follow his own affairs; and that his pleasure was signified unto him by the Duke his own letter. Whereupon he determined to come to London, intimating to the Duke his intention of going to his lodgings in Whitehall; but the Duke was therewith incensed again, and said, he mistook the King's meaning, which was, that he might privately follow his own business. And this he said, was the true state and condition, when it pleased God to take unto his mercy his late most gracious Majesty.

Upon his Majesty's coming to the Crown, he said, he wrote a most humble letter unto his Majesty, imploring his grace and goodness, and desiring the Duke's mediation. But he was pleased to answer by his Letter of 7 May 1625. That the resolution was to proceed against him, without a plain and direct confession of the point which he had formerly required him to acknowledge; and in a courtly manner of menace telleth him, that he would take the freedom to advise him, to bethink himself in time what would be most for his good. But in the interim, his Majesty was graciously pleased that his Writ of Parliament should be sent him; and thereupon he wrote unto the Duke of the receipt of the said Writ, but that he should do nothing but what he should understand to be most agreeable to his Majesty's pleasure. Whereunto the Duke answered in his letter of May, in this manner: I have acquainted his Majesty with your request towards him, touching our summons to the Parliament, which he taketh very well, and would have you rather make excuse for your absence, notwithstanding your Writ, than to desire a Letter of leave under his Majesty's hand for his warrant; but unadvised thereof, he received from the Lord Conway an absolute prohibition, and to refrain and confine him in such sort, as he hath been in the late King's time: And although he was indeed absolutely set free, he could never get cleared by the Lord Conway, though he sent him all the papers to examine; and when he could make no farther reply, he said, he conceived he was under restraint, and that his liberty expired with the late King's death; when indeed restraint may expire, but liberty is natural. After this he continued for the space of three quarters of a year in the country without moving, in which time he was removed from those places and offices he held during his late Majesty's life; and the greatest part of his Estate being laid out in their Majesty's service, by their particular appointment, he could never be admitted so much as to the clearing of accounts. Yet hereof he never made the least complaint: But against the time of his Majesty's continuation, he thought it fit to lay hold of that occasion, when Princes do Acts of grace and Favour, to be a most humble suitor to his Majesty for his grace and goodness; and addressed his Letters unto the Duke of Buckingham, from whom he received a Letter all written in his own hand, and therein a Letter inclosed from his Majesty, so different from some gracious message which he had received from his Majesty since the said Earl returned into England, upon the occasion of a great sickness; and likewise from his Speeches several times delivered to his wife, to wit, that he had never offended him, and that for his faults he no ways held them criminal, but to be expiated by any easy acknowledgment; that he confessed he knew not what judgment to make of the said Letter, neither hath presumed hitherto to make any answer thereto; although by reducing the occasion of speeches and circumstances to his Majesty's memory, he no ways doubteth but he shall be able to give unto his Majesty such satisfaction to every particular, that his Majesty would not remain with the least scruple in any one point.

After this he said, that his Writ of Parliament was detained; whereupon he addressed himself to the Lord-Keeper, that he would be a suitor to his Majesty for him in that behalf: which diligences not taking effect, by petition he became a suitor to their Lordships for their honourable mediation to his Majesty, and thereupon his Writ of Parliament was awarded: But the Duke of Buckingham upon that took occasion, as he had published copies of the said Letter over all the Kingdom, to read it likewise unto their Lordships, and the Writ was accompanied with a prohibition from the Lord-Keeper; whereupon he addressed himself for Justice to that honourable House, (being possessed of his cause by his petition) for both redress of his own wrongs, and likewise of complaints against the Duke for many crimes. And that honourable House being possessed of his cause by his petition, there is preferred against him a succeeding complaint, amounting as high as treason, (as it is pretended) although he for divers years hath not been questioned; yet since his complaint against the Duke he hath been fetched up like a prisoner, and brought into the House as a delinquent; and the Duke, of whom he hath complained for his great crimes, is admitted still to sit in the House as one of his Judges. The which, with all that he hath formerly said, together with his life, fortunes and honour, he did with all willingness, humility and duty, submit to the justice and honour of that House.

Then the Lords asked him, when he would bring in his answer? He promised to answer as soon as might be, but knew not how far he should have occasion to use his ancient dispatches. The Lord-Keeper told him, that Mr. Attorney might help him by letting him know it. The Attorney said, that his charge should in nothing look further back than to the year 1621, which he desired might be recorded.

Whereupon the Earl thanking their Lordships for their patience, he was carried away by Mr. Maxwell the Gentleman-Usher, in whose house and custody he remained.

Then were read the Earl's Articles against the Duke and the Lord Conway; viz.

Articles of the Earl of Bristol, whereby he chargeth the Duke of Buckingham, bearing date the first day of May, 1626.

I. THAT the Duke of Buckingham did secretly combine with the Conde of Gondomar, Ambassador for the King of Spain, before his, the said Ambassador's, last return into Spain, in the Summer, Anno 1622, to carry his Majesty, (then Prince) into Spain, to the end

He might be informed and instructed in the Roman Religion, and thereby have perverted the Prince, and subverted the true Religion established in England: From which misery this Kingdom, (next under God's mercy,) hath by the wife, religious, and constant carriage of his Majesty, been almost miraculously delivered, considering the many bold and subtle attempts of the said Duke in that kind.

II. That Mr. Porter was made acquainted therewith, and sent into Spain; and such messages at his return framed, as might serve for a ground to set on foot this Conspiracy: The which was done accordingly, and thereby the King and Prince highly abused, and their consents thereby first gotten to the said journey, that is to say, after the return of the said Mr. Porter, which was about the end of December, or the beginning of January 1622, whereas the said Duke had plotted it many months before.

III. That the said Duke, at his arrival in Spain, nourished the Spaniards Ministers, not only in the belief of his own being popishly affected, but did, (both by absenting himself from all exercises of Religion, constantly used in the Earl of Bristol's house, and frequented by all other Protestant English, and by conforming himself to please the Spaniards in divers rites of their Religion, even so far as to kneel and adore their Sacrament) from time to time give the Spaniards hope of the Prince his conversion: The which conversion, he endeavoured to procure by all means possible; and thereby caused the Spaniards Ministers to propound far worse conditions for Religion, than had been formerly by the Earl of Bristol, and Sir Walter Aston, settled and signed under their Majesty's hands, with a clause in the King of Spain's answer of December 12, 1622, that they held the Articles agreed upon sufficient, and such as ought to induce the Pope to the granting of the Dispensation.

IV. That the Duke of Buckingham having several times, in the presence of the Earl of Bristol, moved and pressed his late Majesty; at the instance of the Comte de Gondomar, to write a Letter unto the Pope, and to that purpose having once brought a Letter ready drawn, wherewith the Earl of Bristol, by his Majesty being made acquainted, did so strongly oppose the writing of any such Letter, that during the abode of the said Earl of Bristol in England, the said Duke could not obtain it; yet not long after the Earl was gone, he procured such a Letter to be written from his said late Majesty unto the Pope, and to have him filed [Sanctissime Pater.]

V. That the Pope being informed of the Duke of Buckingham's inclination and intention in point of Religion, sent unto the said Duke a particular Bull in parchment, for to persuade and encourage him in the perversion of his Majesty, then Prince.

VI. That the said Duke's behaviour in Spain was such, that he thereby so incensed the King of Spain and his Ministers, as they would admit of no reconciliation, nor further dealing with him. Whereupon the said Duke seeing that the match would be now to his disadvantage, he endeavoured to break it, not for any service to the Kingdom, nor dislike of the match in itself, nor for that he found, (as since he had pretended) that the Spaniards did not really intend the said match, but out of his particular ends, and his indignation.

VII. That after he intended to cross the Marriage, he put in practise divers undue courses; as namely, making use of the Letters of his Majesty (then Prince) to his own ends, and not to what they were intended; as likewise concealing divers things of high importance from his late Majesty, and thereby overthrew his Majesty's purposes, and advanced his own ends.

VIII. That the said Duke, as he had with his skill and artifices formerly abused their Majesties, so to the same end he afterwards abused both Houses of Parliament, by his sinister relation of the carriage of affairs, as shall be made appear almost in every particular, that he spake unto the said Houses.

IX. As for scandal given by his personal behaviour, as also the employing of his power with the King of Spain for the procuring of favours and offices which he bestowed upon base and unworthy persons, for the recompence and heir of his lust: These things, as neither fit for the Earl of Bristol to speak, nor indeed for the House to hear, he leaveth to your Lordships wisdom, how far you will be pleased to have them examined; it having been indeed a great infamy and dishonour to this nation, that a person of the Duke's great quality and employments, a Privy-Counsellor, and Ambassador, eminent in his Master's favour, and solely trusted with the person of the Prince, should leave behind him in a foreign Court so much scandal, as he did by his ill-behaviour.

X. That the Duke hath been in great part the cause of the ruin and misfortune of the Prince Palatinate, and his Estates, inasmuch as those affairs had relation unto this Kingdom.

XI. That the Duke of Buckingham hath in his relations to both Houses of Parliament, wronged the Earl of Bristol in point of his honour, by many sinister aspersions which he hath laid upon him, and in point of his liberty by many undue courses, through his power and practices.

XII. That the Earl of Bristol did reveal unto his late Majesty, both by word and letter, in what sort the said Duke had diserved him, and abused his trust: And that the King by several ways sent him word, that he should rest assured, he would hear the said Earl, but that he should leave it to him to take his own time. And thereupon, few days before his sickness, he sent the Earl word, that he would hear him against the said Duke, as well as he had heard the said Duke against him. Which the Duke himself heard; and not long after his blessed Majesty sickened and died, having been in the interim much vexed and pressed by the said Duke.

Articles of the Earl of Bristol against the Lord Conway leaving date 1 Maij 1628.

I. THAT the Lord Conway is so great a Servant of the Duke of Buckingham's, that he hath not flock to send the Earl of Bristol plain word, that if business could not be accommodated betwixt him and the Duke, he must then adhere and declare himself for the said Duke; and therefore unfit to be a judge in any thing that concerneth the Duke or the Earl.

II. That the said Lord Conway professeth himself to be a Secretary of the Duke of Buckingham's creation, and so acknowledgeth it under his own hand: And although that he be the King's Secretary of State, and a Privy-Counsellor, he usually beginneth his Letters to the Duke, [Majt graciosus Patron.]

III. That as a creature of the said Duke's, the said Lord Conway hath been made the Infrument of keeping the Earl of Bristol from the King's presence, and of imprisoning of him by Warrants only under his own hand; for which he cannot (as the Earl conceiveth) produce any sufficient Warrant.

IV. That by the space of twelve months last past, the said Lord Conway hath been the cause of the Earl's restraint, only by mis-informing his Majesty, and procuring a Letter of restraint upon undue grounds: And when it was made apparent unto him, that the said Earl was restored to his liberty, freely to follow his own affairs, by his late Majesty of blessed memory, he replied, that that liberty given him by his Majesty expired with the King's death.

V. That the Earl of Bristol's mother lying sick upon her death-bed, desired for her comfort to see her Son, and to give him her last blessing: Whereupon the Earl writ to the Lord Conway, to desire him to move the King for his leave; which he putting off from day to day, told the person employed, that by reason of the Duke's sickness, he could not find opportunity to get the Duke's leave to move the King: And having spoken with the Duke, he made a negative answer in the King's name. Whereupon when the Earl acquainted the King by some of his Bed-chamber, his Majesty was in a very great anger, swearing the Secretary had never moved him, and that to deny the said Earl leave, was a barbarous part; and thereupon sent him presently free leave, which the Secretary bearing of, sent afterwards a Letter of leave, but with divers clauses and limitations, differing from the leave sent him from the King's own mouth.

VI. That the having the businesses of the Earl of Bristol in his own hands, and the Earl being commanded by the King to address himself in his occasions unto his Lordship, he would never deliver any message from the said Earl, without acquainting the said Duke, and receiving his directions, and in a noble manner of freeness, stuck not to send him word.

VII. That the Earl of Bristol having received from the Lord Conway twenty interrogatories in his late Majesty's name, drawn up by a commission of the Lords appointed to search into the proceedings and employments of the said Earl, in which search there was more than two months spent, divers of the said interrogatories involving felony and treason; and his Majesty having been pleased to assure the said Earl, both by message and letters, that upon satisfaction given to himself and the commissioners by his answers, he would presently put an end to the Earl of Bristol's business. The Earl of Bristol having so fully answered, as would admit of no reply; and that many of the commissioners declared themselves to be fully satisfied: The said Lord Conway, (being the Secretary in the commission, to whom it properly belonged to call the Lords to assemble) perceiving the Earl of Bristol was like to be cleared, never moved for any further meeting, neither have they ever been permitted to meet until this day, whereby the troubles of the Earl of Bristol have been kept on foot till this present, and the said Earl's imprisonment hath been enlarged twenty months. And by the artifices of the said Duke of Buckingham, and the said Lord Conway, (as shall be made appear) the said Earl hath been infernally involved and stalked into the troubles he is now in, which he doubteth not but your Lordships will judge to be a very considerable case.

VIII. That for a colour of keeping the Earl from his late Majesty's presence, it being pretended, after the answer to the twenty interrogatories, that there were some few questions more to be added, whereunto when he should have answered, his Majesty swore solemnly, that without any delay he should be admitted to his presence, and that within two or three days he should have the said questions sent unto him; the Lord Conway, notwithstanding he acknowledged under his hand, that he had received his Majesty's directions for the sending of the said Articles, and was often thereunto solicited on the behalf of the said Earl, would never send the said questions, and at last answered, That he had no more to do with the Earl's businesses.

IX. That the Earl of Bristol being set free by his late Majesty to come to London, to follow his own affairs as he pleased, and thereupon having his Writ of Parliament sent unto him, without any letter of prohibition; but the Earl of Bristol, out of his great desire to conform all his actions to that which he should understand would best please his Majesty, sent to know, whether his going or stay would be most agreeable unto his Majesty? Who was pleased to answer by a letter from his Lord Duke of Buckingham, That he took in very good part the said Earl's respect unto him; but wished him to make some excuse for the present: The which accordingly he did, and moved, That he might have a Letter under the King's hand to warrant his absence; but under colour of this Letter of leave, upon the Earl of Bristol's own motion and desire, the Lord Conway sent a Letter from his Majesty, absolutely forbidding his coming to Parliament, and therein likewise was inserted a clause, That the Earl should remain restrained as he was in the time of his late Majesty; and so thereby a colour of restraint under his Majesty's hand was gotten, which could never be procured in his late Majesty's time; whereby the Earl of Bristol hath been unduly restrained ever since, without being able to procure any redress, or to make the Lord Conway willing to understand his case, although he sent him all the Papers, whereby he might clearly see that the Earl was not under restraint in his late Majesty's time; but never other answer could be procured from him, but that he judged the said Earl to be under restraint, and that his liberty was expired by the late King's death, as is afore said.

X. That the Lord Conway, knowing that the match for the marrying of the King of Bohemia's eldest Son with the Emperor's Daughter, and being bred in the Emperor's Court, was allowed and propounded by his late Majesty: And that his Majesty, by his Letters unto his Son-in-law, declareth, That he thinketh it the fairest and clearest way for the accommodation of his affairs, and that he will take sufficient care for his breeding in true Religion. And notwithstanding that the said Earl received a copy of the said Letter by the said late King's order, with other Papers, setting down all that had been done in the said business, and his Majesty's assent thereunto from the Lord Conway himself; yet hath he suffered all to be charged, as a crime against the Earl of Bristol, both in the twentieth interrogatory, and in his Majesty's last Letter, that he should consent to the breeding of the young Prince in the Emperor's Court. And further, in the interrogatory he allegeth, it is an aggravation against the said Earl, That the breeding of the said Prince in the Emperor's Court, inferred to the perversion of his Religion, when he knew that the said breeding was never thought nor spoken of by the King, nor any other, but with that express clause and condition, That he should be bred in his own Religion, and have such tutors and servants as his Father should appoint.

XI. That the Lord Conway had been the cause of all the Earl of Bristol's troubles, by his dubious and intrapping dispatches, and inferring, That the said Earl hath failed in his directions, when it shall be made appear, that his dispatches contained no such directions as he hath alledged were given.

The House not being satisfied to commit the Earl to the Tower, let him remain where he was before, with the Gentleman-Usher; and further ordered, That the King's charge against the Earl of Bristol be first heard, and then the charge of the said Earl against the Duke; yet so, that the Earl's testimony against the Duke be not prevented, prejudiced, or impeached.

The day following, the Lord-Keeper delivered a message from the King to the House of Lords.

No. 60. Vol. II.

A Message from the King to the House of Lords.
 "THAT his Majesty taketh notice of the articles exhibited against the Duke of Buckingham by the Earl of Bristol; and he observeth, that many of them are such, as himself is able to say more of his own knowledge than any man, for the Duke's sincere carriage in them: That one of them, touching the narrative made in Parliament in the one and twentieth of King James, trencheth as far upon himself as the Duke; for that his Majesty went as far as the Duke in that declaration; and that all of them have been closed in the Earl's own breast now for these two years, contrary to his duty, if he had known any crime of that nature by the Duke; and now he vents it by way of recrimination against the Duke, whom he knows to be a principal witness to prove his Majesty's charge.
 "And therefore, that his Majesty gave them thanks, that they gave no way to the Earl of Bristol's unreasonable motion, of putting the Duke under the same restraint that they had put the Earl, thereby eluding what the Earl aimeth at, to alter their dutiful proceedings towards his Majesty: That thereby they had made his Majesty confident, that as they have, so they will put a difference between his Majesty's charge, against one that appeareth as a delinquent, and the recrimination of the Earl of Bristol against his Majesty's witness; and they will not equal them by a proceeding pari passu."

In the mean time, the King not being very sure of the Lords, endeavoured to take the Earl's cause out of the Upper-house, and to proceed by way of indictment in the King's Bench: But the Lords would not consent to it, for which they alledged several reasons, that were confirmed by the Judges, who declared, That a Peer of the Realm, impeached for Treason, was to be tried in Parliament.

The Upper-house being willing to secure the Earl of Bristol from being over-powered by the Duke of Buckingham's exorbitant authority, asked the Judges opinion upon the two following questions:

1. Whether the King could be a witness in case of Treason?

2. Admitting that he could, yet whether he might be so in the present case, i. e. when the King is the informer?

Before the Judges brought in their answer, this message and command came from the King to them, that in this general question they should not deliver any opinion, but if any point came in particular, they, upon mature deliberation, might give their advice.

About the middle of May, the Earl of Bristol gave in his answer to the articles brought against him; upon the delivering of which, he made the following speech.

The Earl of Bristol's Speech, by way of Introduction, before he gave in his Answer.

"I AM not inestimable upon what disadvantages I come to trial in this cause: For first, I am slain into his Majesty's heavy displeasure, and am to encounter with a potent adversary, highly in favour, and am accused for treason; for which all counsel and friends abandon me, as a man infected with the plague; I am become bound and under restraint; whereas a man who is to encounter for his life and honour, and with a strong adversary, had need to come upon equal terms.

"But as to the matter, I find myself charged with divers articles of High-Treason; but looking into them with the eyes of my best understanding, with the opinion also of my counsel lately aligned me, and taking them apart one article from another, I find not any thing in them like treason, or that hath so much as the shew or countenance of a fault, either in act or words; only by laying all things together, and by writing the wretts with a strained construction, directly contrary to the true sense and meaning of them, and the occasion whereupon they were spoken, it is informed and that by way of inference only, that the intent was evil, and the matter to prove the intent to be evil, depends upon two props, viz. ill-affection to Religion; and too much affection to Spain; which if I shall clear, the inference grounded upon these props, will fall of itself.

"Therefore I crave leave of your Lordships, before I give my answer to the charge, that I may give you an account of these two particulars; and I humbly beseech you that what I shall speak in my just defence, may not be conceived to proceed of vain ostentation.

"And first for Religion: I was in my childhood bred in the Protestant Religion, and rather after the stricter manner than otherwise. When I grew in years fit, I travelled into France, Italy, and Rome itself: In all which travels, I can produce some that I comforted withal, who will witness with me, that I ever constantly used the Religion I professed without the least prevail-

" cation, no man being able to charge me that so much as out of curiosity I ever was present at any of the exercises belonging to the Roman Religion, or did the least act of conformity to any their rites or ceremonies.

" Secondly, after my return home, I was received into the service of his late Majesty, of blessed memory, whom I served some years as a Gentleman of his Privy-Chamber, and Carver, in which time none of his Majesty's servants received the Holy Sacrament, frequented Sermons, and other exercises of our Religion more than I.

" Thirdly, in that time of my youth, not to avoid idleness, but out of affection to Religion, I translated that excellent book of our Faith, and great points of our Religion, written by Monsieur Moulins; which his late Majesty having sometimes after seen, approved so well, that he would needs have it printed; which accordingly was printed in the name of Mr. Sampford my Chaplain, to whom I gave the honour: But it was my own act, as Mr. Sampford will not deny, though to this Hour I never had before spoken it.

" Fourthly, about seven or eight and twenty years of my age, I was employed Ambassador into Spain, in that great business of the treaty of the marriage; and whereas others before me carried with them but one Chaplain, I had two, viz. Mr. Sampford and Mr. Biswel; and at my arrival at the Court of Spain, I caused it to be published, that such a day (God willing) I purposed to have a communion, to the end that such English as were in the town, might resort thither. Whereas the Duke de Lerma, and other the great Ministers of Spain, took offence, and told me, they might well perceive I brought no good affection to the business I came about, that would so publicly and avowedly in that Court, where never the like was done, proclaim there a Communion; and with high expressions persuaded me to decline it. Whereunto I answered, I came to do my Master's service, which I would heartily and effectually endeavour, but would not omit my service to God, no tho' by my Master commanded. And at the Communion there were present one hundred persons, some of them brothers, kinsmen, and near dependants upon some of their Lordships, whom I see there in my eye. This I did in Spain; the like I did in Germany, in the Emperor's Courts, in my ambassage thither.

" Fifthly, I had in my several employments into Spain and Germany, above five hundred persons of all qualities attending upon me, and never one perverted in Religion; my children carefully instructed and bred in the same Religion. I had constantly every Sabbath a sermon in my house; and Sacraments, and other exercises of our Religion frequented.

" Sixthly, a foul mouthed Shinew railed against our late King and Religion in Spain; how I caused that to be revenged by a near kinsman of my own, is well known.

" Seventhly, one of the English dying in the town of Madrid, of whose Religion there was some question made; and the King's Chaplains telling me, that they at the day of his death had been with him, and taken an account of his faith, and that he died a Protestant: I caused him to be brought home to my house, and there buried according to our rites; whereat much ado was made, and it was threatened, that the inquisitors and other officers, would come and fetch him out, and bury him after their manner: I stood upon it, and that it was the King of England's house, and openly protested, that whosoever should come thither with such intent, I would shoot at him with a piece; and exhorted all my People, that if such an attempt should be, they should rather, than suffer such a dishonour to our Religion, die with me in that quarrel, and hoped such English as were in the town would do the like.

" Eighthly, there having been a Monastery for English Jesuits founded and settled at Madrid before my coming thither, and the English arms set up, I laboured to suppress it, and having written thereof to the late King, his Majesty advised me not to run my head against the rock, for it was an impossible thing for me to do: Yet I undertook it, and it pleased God so to bless my endeavours, that I absolutely dissolved and overthrew it. For which the Bishop of Winchester, Montague, (now with God) wrote unto me by his Majesty's direction, a Letter of his Majesty's gracious acceptance of so great a service; telling me, besides the service I had done to the Church and Commonwealth, it should remain a trophy of Honour to me and my posterity for ever: And the King himself, with his own hand, wrote unto me, beginning his Letter, Good Fortune Digby, your good luck in your service well deserves that style.

" Ninthly, in all negotiations in Spain, in point of Religion, I ever straitened my instructions.

" Tenthly, the match with Spain was not moved by me; I ever advised a Protestant Match, and shewed

" many reasons both of conscience and state; but if with a Catholicick, then rather with Spain than France, so as good conditions might be made for Religion, as appears by a letter I wrote, and delivered to the Prince, at his first going upon the employment; for which I had like then to have been ruined for being a Puritan, as I am now for being a Papist, and all by one and the same hand.

" Eleventhly, and I appeal to the testimony of Dr. Mason and Dr. Wren, the King's Chaplains with me in Spain; and to Mr. Sampford, Mr. Biswel, and Mr. Frewin my own Chaplains there. And that such Papists as have been my antient acquaintance and friends, being men of worth, well known to many of their Lordships, may be examined upon oath, whether I have not in all places, as well in Spain as in England, and at all times upon fit occasions, avowed my self a Protestant, without the least prevarication? Or whether I did ever any the least act that was not suitable to the same profession? And that Mr. Frewin, Mr. Wake, my own Chaplains, may give their testimonies, whether in the time of several dangerous sicknesses, which I had of late years fallen into, I have not in the time of such my sicknesses (when no man can be supposed to dissemble with the world, being ready to leave it,) made before them a confession of my Faith, and made my peace with God, resolving to die as befitting a Protestant, and good Christian. This I tell your Lordships, was my Religion I was bred in, have ever professed and lived in, and was resolved by God's grace to die in; and yet was so unhappy, by reason of employment, to be diffidentful to many good men, that I have been suspected even by them, not well knowing me: And this hath been the rise the Duke hath now taken against me. Then for my love to Spain, I wonder from whence that opinion should grow, since I was there hated and shamed, as the man whom, of all others, they desired to have the least to do withal, having stood ever stricter in point of Religion, than by my instructions I might have done; as after the capitulation concluded on, they understood by some intelligence, which caused their hatred towards me.

" Sure I am, I shewed it not by the service I did them; for divers years together there was not a letter sent by that King to any other State, that the King my Master had not a copy of before, or by that time it came to the place whither it was directed. There was not any great action on foot, whereof I had not the private instructions, and sent them thither: not any expedition by sea or land, wherein I had not some ministers or intelligencers, that gave me from time to time advertisements of their actions, and most private intentions, whereof I advertised his Majesty from time to time. I used such industry, as to get all the Papers of that King's private cabinet into my hands; took copies and notes of such of them as I thought useful; and upon every of them set my private mark before they were conveyed back again, to the end, that if I should have had an occasion to have charged him with any thing mentioned in the same Papers, I might have let him see I knew it, by telling him in what Paper it was, and mark'd with such a mark.

" There was not a port in Spain, that I had not caused the depth of it to be sounded, not a fort whereof I knew not the strength, both for the garrison, munition, and other matters of advantage and disadvantage; insomuch as if it should please the King to appoint a Committee of the Lords to take an account of me, I should, by the stores I gathered there, and brought with me, make it appear, I was as useful a servant to his Majesty in a war, as in a peace. Whereas at his Majesty's coming out of Spain, the powers of the despotismies were to be deposited in some man's hands; and the Duke, upon pretence of doing me honour, but intending to break my neck by it, moved they might be left with me, and the King of Spain was contented; and so they were put into my hands, not as an Attorney only for the Prince: But the King of Spain having taken the substitution of them by his Secretary of State, entered in legal form; whereby that King was then become interested in them by their occupation, as well as the Prince by granting of them. And becoming the Infrumentum stipulatum, wherein they were both interested, they were deposited into my hands, as an indifferent person, trusted between the King of Spain and the Prince with a declaration of the trust. And now the Duke was returned out of Spain, he plotted my ruin, and put it in execution in this manner. He concealed that the powers were to expire at Christmas, and procured his Majesty to write a letter, (not a word command) but expressing a desire, that the said powers should not be till one of

"draw me into a dilemma, That if I proceeded in the match, this letter should, as now it is, have been enforced against me, as a breach of instructions: If I had not proceeded, then I had broken my trust between the Prince and King of Spain, overthrown the marriage so long fought and laboured, it being the main scope of my ambassage, contrary to expresse warrant, and that upon a letter I must needs know to be a mistake. And when I had written into England, to have a direct warrant in the point, the Duke then seeing that plot would not take, he dealt with divers great Lords, as was well known to some of their Lordships there present, to have me upon my arrival in England, committed to the Tower, before I should ever come to speak with the King; which the Spanish ambassador here in England, having gotten private notice of, gave advertisement thereof to that King; who thereupon foreseeing my danger, and consulting with his Council and Divines, what were fit for him in honour and conscience to do in that case, they resolved, That seeing my sufferings grew by being an honest man, and endeavouring to perform the trust reposed in me by that King as well as the Prince; That King was bound both in honour and conscience, not only to preserve me from ruin, but to make me a reparation for any loss I should sustain by occasion of the trust: Whereupon, at his departure going to Court to take his leave, the Conde Olivares told me, what was plotted against me in England; and in respect of the danger, by reason of the greatness of my adversary, persuaded me to stay there, and in his master's name made an offer, not in secret, but in the presence of Sir Walter Aston."

Rothworth, T. 1. p. 113.

Here the Earl of Bristol explained wherein those offers consisted, namely, in a blank signed by the King of Spain, wherein the Earl might set down his own conditions, both in point of title and fortune. But all this he refused, as well as a large sum of money offered by the King. Then the Earl concluded in the following manner.

"Upon what grounds and hope came I to encounter with those dangers? Not upon hope of my greatness in Court, and strength of friends there to boulder out an ill cause; no sure, my strength was too weak, and my adversaries too powerful. But I knew my conscience was clear, and my cause good, and trust in God Almighty. And to him now, and to their Lordships judgments, I recommend myself and my cause."

The Answer of the Earl of Bristol, to the Articles of Accusation brought against him by his Majesty's Attorney-General.

THE first Article he denieth; and because the matters contained in the said Article consist of several parts; viz. the loss of the said Palatinate, and the match with the said Lady of Spain, and of the several employments, as of one extraordinary ambassage to the Emperor, and another to the King of Spain, in the years 1621, 22, and 23. He humbly craves leave of this most honorable Court to separate the businesses, and distinguish the times.

And beginning with the Palatinate first, to give an account of his ambassage to the Emperor, and so to make as brief a deduction as he could of the whole carriage in that business, from the beginning of his employment, to the time he left it. In his ambassage to the Emperor, he propounded all things faithfully according to his instructions, and the answers which he returned to his late Majesty of blessed memory, were the very same, and no other, than such as were given by the Emperor under his hand and imperial seal; the which, according to his duty, he faithfully sent unto his said Majesty, and withal did honestly and truly advertise his said Majesty, what he understood and thought then upon the place; but was so far from giving to his Majesty any ill-grounded hopes in that behalf, that he wrote unto the Lords of the Council here in England from Vienna, 26 July 1624, in such sort as followeth.

I Am further to move your Lordships, that there may be a dispatch made presently into Spain to his Majesty's ambassador Mr. Cottington, that they deal effectually for the repairing and ripening of the business against my coming; that they use some plain and direct language, letting the Ministers there know, that the late letter sent by the King of Spain to the Emperor, was colder and more reserved than his Master had reason to expect. I shall conclude with telling your Lordships, That although I despair not of good success in that knotty business, yet I hope his Majesty and your Lordships lay not aside the care of all fitting preparations for a war, in case a peace cannot be honorably had. And amongst other things, I most earnestly commend unto your Lordships, by your Lordships unto his Majesty, the continuing yet abroad, for some small time, of Sir Robert Mansel's fleet upon the Coasts of Spain; which, in case his Majesty should be ill used, will prove the best argument we can use for the restitution of the Palatinate.

And this his advice, he saith, was wholly intended by his actions, by being the cause, as he returned homeward out of Germany, to bring down Count Mansfield, whereby the town of Frankendale was relieved, by supplying of his Majesty's army, when in great distress, with moneys and plate, to the value of ten thousand pounds merely out of his zeal and affection to the good of the King and his Children, having no warrant or order, but that his heart was ever really bent in effects more than in shews, to serve the King's Son-in-law and his cause, as by the discourse of this business will appear. And how acceptable these services were, will more appear, by the letters of the Queen of Bohemia, in these words following:

My Lord,
Having understood from Heidelberg, how you have shewed your affection to the King and me in all things, and in the help of money you have lent our Soldiers; I cannot let so great obligations pass, without giving many thanks for it by these lines, since I have no other means to shew my gratefulness unto you: Howsoever, assure your self, that I will never be forgetful of the testimonies you give me of your love, which I intreat you to continue, in doing the King and me all good offices you can to his Majesty. You have been an eye-witness of the miserable estate our Countries are in; I intreat you therefore to sollicit his Majesty for our help. You having given me an assurance of your affection; I intreat you now to shew it, in helping of us by your good endeavours to his Majesty, and you shall ever bind me to continue, as I am already,

Your very affectionate Friend,
ELIZABETH.

Which Letters were seconded with others about the same time, both from the King of Bohemia and Council of Heidelberg, to the same effect, and how much satisfaction his late Majesty received in that behalf, and touching that business, will plainly appear several ways, and particularly by his Speech in Parliament. And the said Earl likewise appealeth to both Houses of Parliament, to whom, by his late Majesty's order, he gave a just and true account of that employment, with what true zeal he proceeded; and how he pressed that single treaty, and promises no longer to be relied on, but that a fitting preparation for war might go along hand in hand with any treaty of accommodation. And, for a conclusion, among many of his late Majesty's approbations of his carriage in this employment, he humbly desired that a Letter of the Duke of Buckingham's under his own hand, bearing date the eleventh of October 1621, may be produced, being as followeth:

My Lord,
I Am exceeding glad that your Lordship hath carried your self so well in this employment, that his Majesty is infinitely pleased with your service you have done, for which he commanded me to give your Lordship thanks in his name, until he see you himself. You, of all men, have cause to commend his Majesty's choice of such a man, that unless your heart had gone with the business, you could never have brought it to so good a pass. Amongst other things, his Majesty liketh very well the care of clearing his honour, whereto he will advise further with your Lordship, at your next coming over. I hope you will not find your Negotiation with the Infanta of such difficulty as you seem to fear in your Letter, seeing my Brother Edward hath brought with him a Letter from his Majesty's Son-in-law, whereby he putteth himself solely to his Majesty's advice and pleasure for his submission, as you will perceive by the copy of the Letter itself, which I here send your Lordship; wherein, though there be many things impertinent, yet of that point you may make good use for the accomplishment of the business, wherein I have written to the Spanish Ambassador to use his means and credit likewise; which I assure myself he will effectually do, especially seeing the impediments are taken away by Count Mansfield's composition, and the conformity of his Majesty's Son-in-law to this submission. For the money your Lordship hath so seasonably laid forth, his Majesty will see you shall sustain no loss, holding it very unconscionable you should suffer by the care of his service; which you have shewed so much to his contentment, to the great joy of your Lordship's faithful servant,

Geo. Buckingham.

Having given this account of his employment with the Emperor, he humbly craveth leave to make it known, in what sort, before this his employment, he endeavoured to serve the Prince Palatine, and his cause, which will best appear by his Majesty's own testimony, upon the going of Sir Francis Netherfild to the Prince Palatine; at which time his Majesty being, out of his royal and just heart, delicious

desirous to do a faithful servant right, commanded Sir Francis Netherfield to let the Prince Palatine understand, how good a servant the said Earl had been unto him, and how active in his affairs, as will best appear by a dispatch of Sir Francis Netherfield, written all with his own hand to Sir George Calvert, dated in Prague, Aug. 11. 1620, and sent by his late Majesty to the said Earl for his comfort, being as followeth:

Right Honourable,

THAT you may be the better assured that I have neither forgotten nor neglected the commandments received from his Majesty by your honour; you will be pleased to have the patience to hear me report what I said to this King upon the delivery of my Lord Deputy's Letters to his Majesty; which was, That the King my Master, whose justice is so renowned over the world, did use to shew it in nothing more, than in vindicating his servants from wrongful opinions whereby he knew noble hearts more sensible, than of injuries done to their persons or fortunes; That out of his royal disposition, his Majesty having found my Lord Digby mistaken by some of his own people at home, by occasion of his being by him employed in the affairs with Spain, having thereupon received a jealousy, that the same noble Lord might be also misreported; hitherto his Majesty's hands in that respect gave me a particular commandment, to assure his Majesty, he had not a more truly affectionate servant in England: And for proof thereof, to let his Majesty understand, That whereas the Baron of Doncaster, now his Majesty's Ambassador for England, had, since his coming hither, obtained but three great loans for his Majesty's service; viz. the loan of money from the King of Denmark, the contribution in England of the City and Countreys, and the sending Ambassadors to the contrary parties, that my Lord Digby had been the first proposer of all these to the King my Master, before his Majesty's Ambassador, or any other of his Majesty's servants in England; although his Lordship were contented, that others, who were but set on, should carry away the thanks and prayers, because his Lordship, being known to be the first mover therein, might possibly weaken the credit he hath in Spain, and to render himself the more valuable to serve both his own Master and his Majesty; in which respect I humbly prayed his late Majesty to keep this to himself.

By which testimony it may appear, as the said Earl conceiveth, how he, the said Earl, bestowed himself before his ambassage, and in his said ambassage with his said late Majesty's approbation thereof. Now he humbly craved leave to give your Lordships account how he proceeded after his return from the Emperor's Court.

As soon as he came into England, he discovered unto his Majesty, and the Lords of the Council, in what manner he had left the forces in the Palatinate, and cited the present sending away of money; therein thirty thousand pounds was borrowed of Sir Peter Paul's, Sir Baptist Hicks, and Sir William Cortine, and presently sent unto the Palatinate, besides the ten thousand pounds which he lent, for which he paid the interest out of his purse for six months, having also given, not long before, five hundred pounds, by way of benevolence, to the service of the said Palatinate.

Now in the interim, betwixt his return from the English Coasts, which was in November 1621, and his going into Spain in May 1622, he first gave his account as aforesaid, of his ambassage to both Houses of Parliament, and moved them effectually, as was possible, for the supplying of his Majesty, and that the money might wholly be employed for the succour of the Palatinate.

The Parliament being dissolved, he solicited with great care and industry the settling of some course for the supplying of the Palatinate, and his Majesty was persuaded to maintain eight thousand foot, and sixteen hundred horse, under his own standard, and at his own purse, in the Palatinate, to establish a certain course for due payment of the said Army: The Lord Chichester was, upon the said Earl's motion, sent for out of Ireland, and the said Earl, by his Majesty's command, took order for his dispatch. In this estate the said Earl left his affairs at his departure towards Spain in May 1622, nothing doubting but that all things would have effectually and constantly been pursued, according to the order which was settled and resolved on at his departure.

At his arrival at the Court of Spain, he presently proceeded according to his instructions, engaging the business of the Palatinate as effectually as he could, and faithfully laboured and effected from time to time (as far as to the point of negotiation) all particulars that were given him in charge, as it will appear by his late Majesty's letter upon every particular occasion; and if by the accidents of war for that summer, the Marquis of Baden, the Count Mansfeld, and the Duke of Brunswick, received each of them an overthrow, (the ordering of whose affairs his Majesty so far complained of to his Son-in-law, as to give order for the withdrawing of his forces, as will appear by his Majesty's letters on the third of June 1622, and also by his letters unto Sir Horace Vere, and the Lord Chichester of the same date, if there was not a speedy redress it by any of those accidents those businesses have miscarried, the said Earl hopes he shall not be liable to the blame, it having no relation to him, or to his employment, having so far and so honestly, with his best affections, employed his care and utmost services in the businesses, as his Majesty was pleased, by many several letters upon several occasions, to signify his gracious acceptance of his service, as in his letters of November 24. 1622, written as followeth, viz.

Your dispatches are in all points so full, and in them we receive so good satisfaction, as in this we shall not need to enlarge any farther, but only tell you, we are well pleased with this diligent and discreet employment of your endeavours, and all that concerneth our service; so we are likewise with the whole proceedings of our Ambassador, Sir Walter Aston.

New Market,
Dec. 24. 1622

Thus we bid you heartily farewell.

And afterwards his Majesty was likewise pleased in his letters of January 8. 1623, a little before our gracious Sovereign Lord the King, then Prince, his coming into Spain; as followeth, Concerning that knotty and unfortunate affair of the Palatinate, to say the truths, as things stand, I know not what you could have done more than you have done already.

And whereas it is objected, the Palatinate should be lost by the hopes, he, the said Earl, gave, by his letters out of Spain, it is an objection of impossibility; but there was nothing left but Mannheim and Frankendale, when his first letters out of Spain could possibly come to his late Majesty's hands; for he did not begin to negotiate that business until August 1622, and about that time Heidelberg, and all but Mannheim and Frankendale was lost; and Mannheim he had saved by his industry, had it not been so suddenly delivered, as is by his Majesty acknowledged by letter of 24 November 1622, written thus; viz.

And howsoever the order given to the Infanta, for the relief of Mannheim, arrived too late, and after the town was yielded to Tilly; yet must we acknowledge it to be a good effect of your negotiation, and an argument of that King's sincere and sound intention.

And Frankendale being by the said Earl's means once saved, was again the second time saved merely by the said Earl's industry; and procuring a letter from the King of Spain, dated the 2d of February 1623. Whereupon followed the treaty of Sequestration, which hath since continued. And he, the said Earl, was so far from hindering success by any letter or counsel of his, that he was the solicitor, and in great part the procurer of most of the courses that had been sent thither, as is formerly set down. And when his Royal Majesty that now is, and the Duke of Buckingham arrived at the Court of Spain, around the business of the Palatinate in so fair a way, that the Spanish Ministers told them, the King should give his late Majesty a blank, in which we might frame our own conditions; and the same he confirmeth unto us now; and the like touching this blank was likewise acknowledged by the Duke of Buckingham, in his Speech in Parliament, after the return of his Majesty out of Spain. And it will appear by the testimony of Sir Walter Aston, and by his, and the said Earl's dispatches, that the said Earl wanted not industry and zeal in the business: Inasmuch as the last answer the said Earl procured herein from the King of Spain, was fuller than he the said Earl was ordered by his late Majesty's latest Letters to insist upon. So, as by that which hath been alleged, the said Earl hopeth your Lordships will be satisfied, not only that he wanted neither will nor industry, but that he hath, with all true zeal and affection, and with his own means, faithfully served their Majesties, and the Prince Palatine in this cause: And for assurance in that affair, he had all that could be between Christian Princes; and if in the said assurances there hath been any deceit, as by the said Articles is intimated, which he never knew nor believed, he referred it to God to punish their wickedness; for betwixt Princes there can be no greater tie, than their words, their hands and seals, all which he procured in that behalf; and both the said Earl, and Sir Walter Aston were so confident that the business would be ended to his late Majesty's satisfaction, that in a joint dispatch to his late Majesty of 24 November 1623, after his own Majesty's return into England, they wrote as followeth, viz.

We hope that your Majesty may, according to your desire signified to me the Earl of Bristol, by the letters of Octob. 8. give to your Majesty's Royal Daughter this Christmalls the comfortable news of the near expiring of her great troubles and sufferings, as unto the Prince your Son in the congratulation of being arrived to a most excellent Prince.

And having thus given your Lordships an account of his proceedings touching the Palatinate, he will, by your Lordships Lordships good favours, proceed to the other part of that charge concerning the marriage.

And first, touching his hopes and assurances, that he is charged to have given to his late Majesty, and his Ministers of State here in England, of the Spaniards real proceedings in the said match, when, he said, he knew he never meant it: He saith, he never gave any hopes of their real proceedings, but such, and the very same that were first given to him, without adding or diminishing; neither could he have done otherwise, either with honesty or safety. And he further saith, that the hopes he gave were not upon any intelligence; but as well in that of the match, as the other of the Palatinate, his advertisements were grounded upon all the assurances both of word and writing, that could possibly pass between Christians, as will be made evidently appear by his dispatch of 9 September 1623, which he humbly desires may be read, if the length of it may not displease. The substance being to shew all the engagements and promises of the King of Spain, that he really intended the match. And the causes why the Conde Olivares pretended to the Duke of Buckingham, that the match was not formerly meant, was only thereby to free himself from treating any longer with the said Earl, to the end that he might treat for larger conditions, in point of Religion with the said Duke: The said Conde Olivares taking advantage of having the person of his Majesty, then Prince, in his hands. And with this dispatch the said Earl acquainted his Majesty that now is, in Spain, before he sent it.

And by this dispatch the Earl doubted not, but that it will appear to this honourable Court, that whilst the treating of this business was in hand, he proceeded in that, not only with care and industry, but with some measure of vigilancy. And for clearing an objection that hath been alleged, that the match was never meant before the Duke's coming into Spain, nor after; the Earl craveth leave to set down some few reasons of many, which caused him to believe that the said match was, and hath been really meant, and that it was so conceived by both their Majesties, and the King of Spain, and their Ministers on both sides.

For 1st, The Duke of Buckingham certified his late Majesty, that the business of the marriage was brought to a happy conclusion; whereupon his late Majesty was pleased to give order to the Duke and Earl, to proceed in the business; which his said Majesty would not have treated till the said marriage was concluded, as will appear by a Letter of his said late Majesty, jointly to the Duke of Buckingham, and the said Earl, of the 23 July 1623.

2^{dly}, It will appear by Letters of the said Lord Conway to the Duke of Buckingham, bearing date September 4, 1623. That the said Duke had good assurance of the conclusion of the said match; and upon this confidence were all things put in due execution in England, as had been capitulated; and the Lord Conway and others faithfully agreed and settled all the points of immunity and liberty for the Roman Catholics, and for the use of their Religion, as was set down in their Declaration, August 9, 1623, hereafter mentioned in the answer to the fifth Article of this charge.

3^{dly}, The very day his now Majesty and the Duke of Buckingham departed from the Escorial in Spain, towards England, the said Duke solemnly swore to the Treaty of the said Marriage, and the furtherance of it all that should be in his power, upon the holy Evangelists, in the presence of the said Earl and Sir Walter Aston.

4^{thly}, The treaty of the said Marriage had been formerly signed, sealed, and solemnly sworn by the King of Spain: And when his Majesty, and that King took their leaves, he did solemnly, in the words of a King, faithfully and punctually protest to perform all that had been capitulated in the treaty of Marriage; and thereupon embraced his Majesty at his departure, and sent the very next day a Letter, written all with his own hand to his Majesty, vowing and protesting to make all good that he had capitulated or promised unto his Majesty at his departure the day before. So that if there were no true meaning on the part of Spain to make the Marriage, as by Mr. Attorney is pretended, yet certainly the Earl hath not been slightly deceived; neither can it be, at he conceiveth, any fault in him, since not only his late Majesty, but also his Majesty that now is, and the Duke of Buckingham, being then both upon the place, did confidently believe, and that upon other grounds than mis-informations, suggestions, and persuasions of the said Earl, that the Marriage was really intended: And to that effect, both his late Majesty of blessed memory, and his most excellent Majesty that now is, after his return into England, wrote unto him, the said Earl, several Letters, assuring him, that their intents and pleasures, were to have the said match proceeded in, and thereupon the proxies of his Majesty, then Prince, were again inrolled and sent unto the said Earl. So that the said Earl having so many and so great causes to be assured, that the match was really intended on both sides, he conceiveth it will be hard for Mr. Attorney to make good that part of his charge, wherein he affirmeth, that the Earl should know the contrary, or the assurance to be upon false grounds, as in the said Article is alleged.

II. To the second article, he directly denieth all the supposed offences wherewith he stands charged by the said article. And for a clear declaration and manifestation of the truth and manner of his proceedings, he saith,

First, As to the continuing the treaties upon generalities, that the temporal Articles were by agreements on both sides not to be treated or settled until such time as the articles of Religion were fully agreed on; for that it was held most proper and honourable for both sides, first, to see if the difficulty of Religion might be removed, before they passed to any further engagements. And the said articles of Religion, by reason of the Pope's new demands sent into England by Mr. Gage, were not signed nor condescended to by his late Majesty, nor his Majesty that now is, then Prince, till January 5, 1612, and were then sent away in post out of England to the said Earl by Mr. Simon Digby, who arrived with them at Madrid in Spain, about the 25th of the same month. But the Earl's care was such, to have no time spent in the settling of the temporal Articles, that before he would condescend so much as de bene esse unto the articles of Religion, that they should be sent back to Rome, he procured the King of Spain to promise, that within the time limited for procuring the Desponsories, which was by March or April following at the furthest, all temporal Articles should be settled and agreed, to the end that the Infanta might be delivered at the spring, as by the King of Spain his answer in writing was declared to be the King's intention; and accordingly Sir Walter Aston and the said Earl did not deal in general, but did most industriously labour to settle all in particular, viz. That the portion should be two millions, it appearing, that it was so agreed by the late King of Spain (1); that the dispensation coming, the Desponsories should be within forty days after; and that Don Duarte of Portugal should be the man that should attend the Infanta in the journey. And all other particulars necessary for the conclusion of the said treaties, were, by Sir Walter Aston and the said Earl, and the Spanish commissioners, drawn up into heads, in writing, and after many debates, they were consulted with that King; and 2 March 1623 fiat ut. the Conde Gondomar, and the Secretary Don Andreas de Prado, were appointed to come home to the house of the said Earl, to signify unto Sir Walter Aston and himself, as they did, that the King of Spain had declared his resolution in all the particulars, and given them order to come to a speedy conclusion with them in all things: And that King's answer to that conclusion, the Earl saw, and read, all written with the King of Spain's own hand.

On the seventh day of the said month of March 1623, the King's Majesty, then Prince, and the Duke of Buckingham, arrived at Madrid; and the Spaniards took new laws, and the negotiation was put into a new form. So that whereas it is objected against the Earl, that he entertained and continued the treaties so long upon generalities, he conceives it is not meant upon the spiritual Articles; for they were such as were sent from Rome into England, from thence they came to the Earl: And for the temporal Articles, they were not to be settled and treated till the articles of Religion were concluded. He conceiveth it cannot be alleged with any colour, that his Majesty was entertained with generalities, since the time that the said articles of Religion were brought unto the said Earl by Mr. Simon Digby, being about the 25th of January, there were but six weeks until March 7 following, when his Majesty, then Prince, arrived at Madrid; and in the interim, all the above-mentioned particulars were settled: And the time that hath been spent in this treaty, hath not been through his, the said Earl's, default, in continuing upon generalities, without pressing to particulars, but hath been caused, as well by difficulties which the business brought with it, as also with exterior accidents, viz. The wars of Bohemia, the death of two Popes, and the late King of Spain, without the least fault of the said Earl, as is acknowledged by the late King of blessed memory, in the said Earl's instructions, on the 14th of March 1621.

Neither could any delay therein be attributed to him the said Earl; for he was employed in those times into Germany and Flanders, and Sir Walter Aston and Sir Francis Cottington, for the space of three or four years, were resident in Spain; from whence the hopes they gave were upon all the discreet grounds that ministers can expect from a State: But the Earl resumed his business six months before his Majesty's coming into Spain; and he was so desirous to see his Majesty, then Prince, bestowed, that he pressed nothing so much, both to the King and Prince, as that the Prince might lose no more time, and rather to break the match with Spain, than suffer any further delays; as will appear by his dispatches from his first arrival at the Court of Spain, until his Majesty, then Prince, his coming. For in his letters of June 20, 1622, being the first he wrote after his first audience, he was so desirous that no time might be lost, that in them he craved leave of his Majesty, that in case he should find any delays in Spain, he might without expecting any order, take his leave, and come home.

Upon the return of Sir Francis Cottington, in September following, he wrote both to the King, and his Majesty then Prince. To the King, as followeth:

I shall presume to add to that which Mr. Cottington shall deliver unto your Majesty by word of mouth, of the present state of the match, what I conceive to be the right way to bring it to a speedy issue: That your Majesty will be pleased positively to declare, what you will do in point of Religion, and that you will appoint me a certain limited time, by which this King should procure the dispensation, or conclude the match without it; and in case there shall be any farther delay therein, that I may then declare your Majesty to be free and disengaged, to bestow the Prince in such sort as you shall judge most convenient.

And to the Prince, at the same time wrote in these subsequent words, viz.

That which will be necessary for his Majesty presently to do on his Majesty's part, is, to declare himself, how far he will be pleased to yield in point of Religion, as Mr. Cottington will approve unto your Highness: And that he set a prefixed time to break or conclude the match, either with the dispensation, or without the same. And for the rest, it may be left to my negotiation. But your Highness may be pleased to hasten his Majesty's resolution with all possible speed.

And the said Earl saith, that having received from his said late Majesty his resolution in point of Religion, and a limited time according to his desire, he was so precise and punctual therein, that although the making or breaking of the marriage depended upon it, he would not give one month's respite longer time for the procuring of the dispensation, until he had first acquainted his late Majesty therein, and received his directions under his own hand; as will appear by his Majesty's letters of October 25, 1622, as followeth:

Right trusty and well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor, we greet you heartily well. Whereas by your last Letter written to our Secretary, dated September 29, you are desirous to have our pleasure signified unto you under our own hand: whether we will be content or not to grant a month's time longer, for the coming of the dispensation from Rome, than we have already limited unto you, in case they shall there conclude all things else for our contentment, with a resolution to send the Infanta thither the next spring: we do hereby declare unto you, that in that case you shall not break with them for a month's longer delay. We also wish you not to trouble yourself with the rash censure of other men, in case your business should not succeed; resting in that full assurance of our justice and wisdom, that we will never judge a good and faithful servant by the effect of things so contingent and variable. And with this assurance we bid you heartily farewell.

And he further saith, That when he had agreed to the articles of Religion, and that a certain time was set for the coming of the dispensation, and a conclusion of the match, although he would bind himself to nothing, without his Majesty's approbation, yet for that no time might be lost, he agreed to the propositions, de bene esse, sent by Mr. Porter, December 10, 1622, to the end the articles might be immediately sent to Rome, without losing so much time as to hear first from England: And humbly moved, that in case his Majesty should like of the said articles, he would send his approbation directly to Rome for the gaining of time; which his Majesty was pleased to do. And at the same time he wrote both to his said late Majesty, and his Majesty then Prince, as followeth, viz. to his Majesty,

This is the true state of the business as it now standeth. If your Majesty approve of what is done, I hope it will be a happy and a short conclusion: If your Majesty think it not fit to allow and condescend to the said Articles, I have done the uttermost of my endeavours, and shall humbly persuade your Majesty not to lose a day longer in the Treaty; so much it importeth your Majesty and your Kingdoms that the Prince were bestowed.

And to the Prince, in letters of the like date, in this sort.

I have presumed to write to his Majesty, that which I think my duty to say to your Highness, That in case you shall not approve of what is now conditionally agreed, you permit not a day more to be lost in this Treaty: For it is of so great consequence that your Highness were bestowed, that it importeth as much that you will. But I hope his Majesty, and your Highness, will in such sort approve of this last agreement, as you will speedily bring this long Treaty to a happy conclusion. I am out of hope of bringing things to any better Terms; therefore I deal clearly with your Highness, and do not only most humbly persuade but on my knees beg it of you, that you either refuse to conclude this match as you may, or speedily to break it, and bestow yourself elsewhere; for no less than the happiness of your Kingdom, and the security of the King your Father, and yourself, depend upon it.

All which things being considered, the Earl most humbly submitteth himself to the judgment of that most high and honorable Court, whether the delays which accidents have brought forth in this business, can be attributed to his fault; since on the one side it will evidently appear to your Lordships, that he never moved his Majesty and the Prince to admit of delays, but rather to think of some other course; and it will on the other side appear by all the dispatches, that he pressed things with the Ministers of Spain to as speedy a conclusion, as the utmost terms of fair negotiation and good manners would bear. And whereas it is pretended, that the Spaniards should take occasion, by entreating the said Treaties, to abuse his said late Majesty (which he knoweth not) yet, he saith, he used all the vigilancy and industry that a careful Minister could do, and had from the Spaniards, all the assurances by oaths, words, and writings, which could be expected from Christians; the which, without adding or diminishing, he faithfully presented unto his said late Majesty; and his said late Majesty was pleased in those times, to conceive upon those assurances, that they dealt really with him: And he conceiveth that his Majesty that now is, then Prince, and the Duke of Buckingham, were pleased to write as much to the late King's Majesty, at their first coming into Spain, and that all which the Earl had written touching that employment, was there avowed by the Conde Olivares and Conde Gondomar, to the said Prince and Duke, at their arrival at Madrid; and he hopeth, that if that dispatch may be perused, it will as well appear and be adjudged, that he served his Majesty with some measure of vigilancy, as well as of fidelity.

III. To the third article the said Earl saith, That he did not either by words or by letters to his late Majesty or his Ministers, extol, or magnify the greatness and power of the King of Spain, nor represented to his late Majesty the supposed danger that might ensue unto him if a war should happen between him and the King of Spain, nor affirmed, nor insinuated the same, as in the said article is mentioned; but if he did at any time speak or write of the power and greatness of the King of Spain, or represent any danger to his said late Majesty that might ensue by entering into hostility with the said King of Spain, it was as a faithful Counsellor and servant to his Majesty, by way of his advice and opinion, which he ever delivered sincerely, faithfully and truly, according to the present occasion, and in no wise with such an intent as in the said articles is mentioned, nor to any other evil intent or purpose whatsoever.

But he hath been so far from dissuading his late Majesty to take arms, that he hath upon all just occasions advised, that all fitting preparations for war might be made, as beginning with the year 1621, from which time he is only charged, will appear by his Speech in Parliament presently after his return out of Germany; and that he hoped his Majesty would no longer rely upon single treaties, but make all fitting preparations for war; and that the Parliament would enable his Majesty thereunto; and by the care he took before his going again upon his embassy into Spain, that the establishment of an army under his Majesty's own standard of horse and foot, and under his own pay, might be settled and provided for; as likewise his advice to the Lords of the Council, that his Majesty might have a curb upon the King of Spain upon all occasions, by continuing of Sir Robert Mansel's fleet on the coasts of Spain, as will appear by his letter written from Vienna, 26 July 1621, mentioned in the answer to the first article. By all which it appeareth, that he laboured and endeavoured as much as in him lay, that his Majesty might be well prepared for any occasions of war that should happen. And he no way remembered to have discouraged, or to have spoken or written any thing, that might have been understood to have tended to the discouraging of his said late Majesty for the taking of arms, and entering into hostility with Spain, or for retreating of him and his forces, from attempting the invasions of his late Majesty's Dominions, or the Dominions of his late Majesty's confederates, friends or allies, as by the said articles is charged against him; neither remembereth that he had any cause so to do. But if he have in any kind spoken or written of Spain, or the power thereof, it may have been to his late Majesty, or to his Majesty that now is, by way of discourse, speaking of the boldness of the Spanish proceeding, of their ferious and deliberate debating of business before they resolve on them, of the constant pursuing of them when they are once resolved, wished that England and other Nations would therein imitate them: For he supposeth the right way to impeach their greatness was to grow as wise as they, and to beat them at their own weapons. But otherwise he is confident never to have been heard to speak or write any thing, that might have any terror or discouragement to his late Majesty or his chief Ministers, knowing that England well ordered, need to take little terror at the power of Spain, having almost in all attempts and enterprizes won honour upon them. And as for the preventing of dangers that might ensue upon a war, though he knew not what is aimed at in that particular: Yet he is most confident, out of the integrity of his own conscience, that he neither said, nor advised any thing but what befitted a faithful Counsellor and Ambassador, which was truly to deliver his opinion as he understood it upon the present occasion: And as for affirming that his Majesty's quiet should be disturbed, and he not be permitted to hawk or to hunt, he remembereth not what discourse he may have had, or written to any person, how fit it might be upon the being broiled in a great war, seriously to intend it, and make it our whole work. But as he is confident will it appear, that what discourse soever it might have been, it wanted not true zeal and affection which he hath ever born to the King's service, and he hopeth it will not be found to want due respect and reverence on his part, which he ought to shew to so gracious a master. Neither can it be conceived, that the considerations of hunting and fowling, should be considerations worthy so great and prudent a King, to withhold from a war for the good of Christendom, and his Kingdom, if he should have been justly provoked thereunto.

IV. To the fourth Article the said Earl saith, That he did not any thing contrary to his duty or allegiance, or contrary to the faith and duty of an Ambassador, as by this article is alleged; but did intend the service and honour of his late Majesty; and no corrupt and sinister ends of his own advancement, as by this article is so alleged. And as for the conference, which is pretended he should hold concerning the Treaty, that being told there was little probability that the said treaties would or could have good success, he should acknowledge as much; and yet said, he cared not what the success thereof might be, but that he would take care to have his instructions perfect, and to pursue them punctually, and would make his fortune thereby, or words to that effect; he doth not ever remember to have held such discourse. Though it be true, the time hath been many years since, when he thought the match very unlike to be effected, in regard unequal answers were given in Prince Henry's days, and of the unlikelihood of accommodating the differences of Religion; and saith further, That the reviving of the Treaty of the said match for his Majesty that now is, was not by his means, for he ever declared his opinion clearly, both to his late Majesty, and to his Majesty that now is, That in the first place, he wished and advised a Protestant match, but in the duty of a servant, understanding, that both their Majesties desired the match really with Spain, he did really and faithfully intend the service and honour of their Majesties, and effectually endeavoured to procure their ends. And it is very likely he might say, he would get his instructions perfect, and pursue them punctually, as he conceiveth was lawful and fit for him; but the latter part of this conference, that he should say he would make his fortune by it, or any other words to that effect, he was in Anno 1621, and ever since, of that rank and quality, both in regard of his employments, fortunes, and his Majesty's favour, that he assureth himself he did not, and dares answer so far for his discretion, that it was impossible for him to hold so mean and unworthy discourse.

V. To the fifth article he saith, That what is therein alleged, is so far from being so, that contrarily upon all occasions to the uttermost of his power, he did labour to prevent all the inconveniences in point of Religion, that might come by matching with a Prince of a different Religion, as well appeareth by the Paper of his opinion, that his Majesty should marry with a Lady of his own Religion, hereafter mentioned in his answer to the seventh article. And for further proof thereof, he saith, That in the whole treaty with Spain, he stood more strict in points of Religion, than by his instructions he needed to have done, as will appear by the testimony of Sir Walter Aston, and his dispatches of the twelfth of December 1622, and other dispatches, which he desireth may be read. And as for concealing or persuading to set at liberty the Priests or Jesuits, he utterly denieth to have done any such thing, as before he hath answered. Although it be true, that the ambassage in Spain be far different from the employment of other places, where there is a body of our reformed Religion, and where his Majesty hath kindred and allies; whereby his Majesty's Ministers may be informed of the necessary occurrences of State, without the helps of Priests or Jesuits. But in Spain there being none but Roman Catholics, nor any manner of correspondency or intelligence but by them, the Ambassadors must make use of all sorts of people, especially of Jesuits and Priests, and to that end Ambassadors sent thither have a large and particular Warrant under the King's hand, to treat and make use of Priests and Jesuits, and all other sorts of men, unless it be such as are proclaimed rebels. And divers times the Ministers employed in Spain, to gratify some whom there they employed for the King's service, have, as he believeth, at their particular suit, moved his Majesty to extend grace and favour to some particular friend and kinsman of his, being a Roman Catholic, and imprisoned in England; and that he remembereth to have happened to others, but doth not remember himself to have written to his late Majesty in that kind: And as concerning his advice and counsel, to set at liberty Jesuits and Priests, and the granting to the Papists a toleration, or the silencing of the Laws against them, he said, That his late Majesty was engaged by the treaty of Madrid 1617, in divers matters concerning Religion; likewise by promise to Conde Gondomar, and his letters to the King of Spain, April 1620, wherein he is pleased to promise some particulars in favour of Roman Catholics, as by the said letters will appear: And understanding the said Earl had sufficient warrant under the King's own hand, to assure the King of Spain, whatsoever was agreed in the said article, or in the said letters, his Majesty would sincerely perform; yet the said Earl was so cautious in that point, that when, for the conclusion of the match, the other articles of Religion being allowed, it was pressed by the Spanish Ministers, that a clause of convenience might be inserted, with protestation, That the form and way thereof should be wholly left to his Majesty's wisdom and clemency, and that his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects should acknowledge this grace to have come from the King's Majesty's mercy and goodness: Yet the said Earl would not condescend hereunto, de bene esse, as by his letters to Master Secretary Calvert, 8 October 1622, will appear, hereby to give his Majesty time to have recourse unto his second consultation, and to take it into consideration before he would engage or bind himself in this point: But his late Majesty, and his Majesty that now is, were pleased to condescend hereunto, by signing the said articles with their own hands, and likewise by writing their private letters of the 8th of January 1622, to that effect to the King of Spain, as by the said letters will appear. Neither did the said Earl, by letters or otherwise, ever counsel or persuade his late Majesty, to grant or allow unto the Papists or professors of the Romish Religion a free toleration, and silencing of the Laws made and standing in force against them; and when any such provision hath been offered to be made in Spain, he ever refused so much, as to give ear to it, or to suffer it to be propounded; although it be true, that he hath since seen a paper touching pardons, suspensions, and dispensations for the Roman Catholics, bearing date the 7th of August 1623, signed by the Lord Conway and others, which in effect is little less than a Toleration; which paper is that which followeth.

Salisbury, 7 August 1623.

The Declaration touching the Pardons, Suspensions, and Dispensations of the Roman Catholics.

This Declaration having been inserted, in the Reign of King James I, under the year 1623, there is, I think, no occasion of repeating it here.

But this declaration, the said Earl saith and affirmeth, was the effect of the Duke of Buckingham's negotiation, and treated and concluded by the Lord Conway, with the Spanish Ambassador here, whilst the Prince was in Spain; neither was his privacy or advice in it: For if he had known it, he should have protested against it. All which, together with the difference betwixt the conditions of Religion agreed at the treaty of Madrid, 12 Decemb. 1622, by the said Earl, and the said Sir Walter Aston, being by their Lordships considered, the said Earl doubteth not but that it will manifestly appear, whose endeavour it was to advance the Romish Religion, and the professors thereof; and judges the said Earl most unfortunate to be charged with an article of this kind.

VI. To the sixth article the Earl saith, That the assurances which he gave his late Majesty, and his Majesty that now is, concerning the treaties, were such, That it had been dishonesty and breach of his duty and trust for him to have held them back, being the same that were given him by the Emperor, and the King of Spain, and their Ministers, upon as great assurances as can pass between Ministers of Princes in the like case. And for the delays of Spain, they could never be so ill, and with so little colour complained of, as at the time of his Majesty's coming; for that a certain time was prefixed to the coming of the dispensation, viz. in April 1623, at the furthest, which was next month after the Prince's arrival at Madrid; the dispensations were to be within four days following, and the Infanta begin her journey into England twenty days after: So as three months patience longer would have shewed the issue of the business without putting of the person of the Prince, being her apparent to the Crown, in so eminent a hazard for the trying of an experiment. And it is an argument of great suspicion, because the Spaniards were suspected to have dealt with the Prince, to be trusted with the person of the Prince, to be put into their hands to try conclusions: But the truth is, though that were made the pretended ground, and the occasion of the journey, it was neither the assurances of the said Earl, nor the jealousies of Spain, but other motives that were the original cause of his Majesty's said journey, as shall be sufficiently made apparent in due time. And the said Earl having got an inkling of it by something that was let fall from the Conde Gondomar to that purpose, instantly dispatched away by Mr. Griffo to his late Majesty, to have his journey prevented; who upon the confines of France, met with his Majesty and the Duke of Buckingham on his journey towards Spain, and told them as much. So that although he confessed what is laid in the charge to be true, viz. That by the said journey the person of the Prince, the peace and safety of the Kingdom did undergo further danger, (at the remembrance thereof the hearts of all good subjects do tremble) yet the blame is due to the authors and advisers of the same journey, and not to the said Earl; and although it pleased God, to the exceeding great joy and comfort of the said Earl, and of all good men, to send his gracious Majesty home with safety, yet never was the person of any Prince, upon such grounds, exposed to so great an hazard; and in such cases, not the success, but the counsellors are considerable.

VII. To the seventh Article the said Earl saith, that he did not move or persuade his Majesty, then Prince, to change his Religion, neither in the manner in the said Article mentioned, nor in any other manner whatsoever: Neither doth he conceive, that the charge in itself as it is laid, will in any reasonable construction bear any such inference as is made therein; so as he conceiveth, he needeth not make any further or other answer thereunto. Yet that it may appear, that the manner he used to the same Prince was not traitorously, falsely, or cunningly, nor without ground, or to any such intent, as in the said Article is supposed. And to manifest unto this most high and honourable Court, how far he was from all such intention, he saith, that he doth acknowledge, that within few days after his Majesty's coming into Spain, whilst he had the great honour to have his Majesty lodged at his House, and to have so Royal a guest, finding by the Spanish Ministers, that there was a general opinion, that his Majesty's coming thither was with an intention to become a Roman Catholic; and the Conde Gondomar having that very morning pressed the Earl not to hinder so pious a work (as he termed it) of his Majesty's conversion, and seeming to be assured of the Duke of Buckingham's assistance therein, his Majesty being all alone in a withdrawing room in the said Earl's House, the said Earl kneeled unto him, and told him, that he had a business to impart unto him, which highly imported his Majesty to know, so that he might be assured his boldness therein might be pardoned; which his Majesty graciously promised. And thereupon the said Earl told his Majesty, that the general opinion of the Court was, that his Majesty's coming into Spain was with an intention to be a Roman Catholic, and there to declare it. And he confesseth, that at the same time, in regard of those things he had heard, he humbly besought his Majesty to deal freely with him as a servant, of whose fidelity he might be confident, or words to that effect: But he was so far from persuading his Majesty to be a Roman Catholic, that without respecting his Majesty's answer, he declared himself to be a Protestant, and so should always continue; yet he said, he should always serve his Majesty, and labour to advance his, and the King his Father's, affairs with as much fidelity and honesty, as any Catholic whatsoever: And his Majesty was pleased then to make unto the said Earl a full and clear declaration of his Religion, and of his constant resolution therein; and seemed to be much displeased, that any should have so unworthy an opinion of him, as to think he would for a wife, or any other earthly respect whatsoever, so much as waver in his Religion. Whereupon the said Earl besought his Majesty to pardon his boldness, and then intreated him not to suffer his business to be overturned, by permitting that conceit of his conversion any longer to remain in the Spaniards, nor to any thing that might give them hope therein, alledging, that it was impossible the marriage could be without a Dis-penfation; and so long as the Spaniards, who were to procure the Dispensation, should have hope of his Majesty's conversion, they would never content themselves with a part; to which they were tied by the Articles agreed upon with the said Earl and Sir Walter Allen. At which time his Majesty was pleased to approve of his opinion, and said, he would expect the Dispensation, and did thereupon afterwards send Mr. Andrews to Rome to hasten it; and the next day the said Earl dealt very roundly with the Conde Olives, and Gondomar, telling them it was a discourteous manner of proceedings, to press his Majesty to further conditions than were formerly agreed upon in point of Religion, and to make his conditions the worse for the great obligation he had put upon them, by putting himself into their hands; whereas they took such great offence, that they estranged themselves from him for a long time after. And that the said Earl did thus proceed with the said Conde, and that it was not a new-framed answer to satisfy present objections; but that which really and indeed passed, will really appear by his dispatches unto his late Majesty of blessed memory; and before his Majesty that now is, came out of Spain, they were there shewed unto his Majesty, bearing date the 9th of September 1623. So that although it be true, that he the said Earl did not dissuade his Majesty, for that there was no cause for it; yet without expecting his Majesty's answer, he first made a clear and true profession of his own Religion; and when his Majesty had declared to him his zeal and constancy, he humbly besought him, that the Spaniards might not for any respect be longer held in hopes of that point. And because point of Religion is that which all men of honour and honesty would chiefly desire to clear, especially having an imputation of that nature laid upon them, as the said Earl hath in the said article; he humbly beseecheth your Lordships, that he may not seem to digress from his charge; intending your Lordships satisfaction in that particular, not by the aforesaid verbal discourse only, which he professeth was in much zeal to Religion and dutiful care to the Prince in that kind, but by some written testimony of his former opinion both of the Match and Religion. When he was first employed into Spain for the treaty of his Marriage 1617, his late Majesty having commanded him to give an account thereof unto his Majesty that now is, he at his departure towards Spain, presumed to give unto his Majesty that now is, his opinion in writing signed with his own hand, to be kept as a testimony of future action, the copy whereof is this as followeth.

S I R,

THE opinion which I have ever presumed humbly to offer unto his Majesty concerning your Highness's marriage, hath been, that both in regard of conscience and satisfaction unto his Majesty's people and allies; likewise for the security and quiet of your Majesty's estates, your Highness might take for wife some Protestant Princess, although she neither were daughter to a King, nor had so ample a portion as might relieve the King's present necessities and wants; for then there might be many ways found to help the King's wants, either by some few years' truce, or by winning the affections of the People, to the lessening of his Majesty by way of Subsidies in Parliament, whereas contrariwise, if the number and power of the People should be increased, as undoubtedly they will be by your Highness's matching with any Catholic Princess, through the conversion which must be of necessity for the exercise of her Religion for herself and Family, within your Highness's Courts, and thereby by degrees these two different Religions shall grow to an equality of power; it will be great hazard and disquiet to the State, and not to be redressed without great danger, and courses of more violence than is usual for this State to put in practice. But in case his Majesty, out of his wisdom and consideration best known to himself, hold it fittest that your Highness's match with France, or Spain, or any other Catholic, either for that the present time affordeth no Protestant Princess, who is for years or blood putable for your Highness, or that can in any considerable measure by the portion, supply his Majesty's present wants, I then conceive that the match by which this State shall suffer least inconvenience and cumbers, and whereby his Majesty's necessities shall be most relieved, is with Spain, if such a match may be made with such conditions of Religion, as other Catholic Princess will contract themselves withoutal.

Thus much I thought fit humbly to present unto your Highness, for that I see my employment liable to the censure of many worthy persons, with whom though I concur in my opinions, yet I seem much to differ from them many ways; for that it is more proper to me to be true to my duty, and services, than by the declaring this, to please their satisfaction: Only to your Highness I thought fit to make this declaration, and shall be a justor to you for your favour, as you shall see me really labour to put this in effect. And his Majesty shall, either upon motion of Parliament, or any other proposition that can be made unto him, think fit to proceed with a Protestant Match, as I shall wish as well unto it as any man living, so I hope in such sort to manage the present business that I have in hand, that it shall rather much further, than any way cross or hinder it. But in case his Majesty shall not be drawn to any proposition for a Protestant Match, I then conceived, that your Highness both dath, and will approve, that I really and effectually labour to procure a Match for your Highness in Spain, upon such conditions, in point of Religion and Portion, as to his Majesty shall seem fit.

Besides which declaration of his opinion, he hath all the days of his life, and in all places, lived and allowed himself to be a Protestant, never having done any the least act that was not suitable to that profession: And in all his former employments, for the space of fourteen years, of more than five hundred persons of all qualities that attended on him, there was never one perverted in his Religion, saving two Irish footmen, who in Ireland had been bred Papists. And he humbly desired the testimony of Doctor Majon, and Doctor Wren, his Majesty's Chaplains, who were with his Majesty in Spain; and of Mr. Sampford, one of the Prebends of Canterbury, Mr. Boswell, Parson of St. Lawrence in London, and Mr. Frewen, Divinity-Reader in Magdalen College in Oxford, and now one of his Majesty's Chaplains, who were his Majesty's Chaplains in Spain; as well for the frequent use of the Sacrament, as constant profession and exercises of Religion, and the testimony of such Catholics as are known to have been his ancient acquaintance and friends, to examine them upon oath, whether publicly or privately, in Spain or in England, they had known him in any kind to make shew, or so much as to forbear, upon all occasions, to declare the Religion he professed. And that the said Mr. Frewen and Mr. Wake may be also examined, whether in extremity of several sicknesses, whereinto he hath of late years fallen, he hath not ever settled his conscience with them towards God, and made a confession of his Faith; resolving, as befitting a Protestant or good Christian.

VIII. To the eighth article the said Earl, That he did not at any time, or in any place, endeavour to persuade the Prince, touching his Religion, to become a Roman Catholic, and to be obedient to the usurped authority of Rome; neither did the said Earl, to that end, and purpose, or otherwise, use unto his Majesty, then Prince, the words in the article mentioned. But the said Earl acknowledged, That upon occasion of a Letter that came to his Majesty, then Prince, putting his Majesty in mind of the great actions of his royal progenitors in the Holy War, that the great Kings of those times did not only employ their forces, but in their persons went into the Holy Land; the Earl believeth, that by way of discourse only, and not otherwise, he may have said, That in regard of the difference in Religion, it was of more difficulty to undertake such great actions now, than in former ages; and it might well be intanced in the present treaty of the marriage, wherein the Pope's consent was to be obtained. And to this effect, and upon the like grounds, he is confident there was very many that have, nay, few of nearness about his late Majesty, that have not often heard his Majesty say, That he was the true martyr, that suffered more for his Religion than all the Princes of Christendom besides; infancing in divers particulars, but especially in this, That he could not match his Children with Kings of his own rank, without the Pope's leave.

But the said Earl saith, He never allegeded any such thing to any other purpose, than to shew, that only conscience, and love to truth, (in which regard Protestants suffered much) not any temporal respects, made men constant and zealous to the profession of our Religion. By which discourse he ever attributed much to the honour and security of the Protestant Religion; but never used it as an argument to persuade to the contrary, as in the accusation is insinuated.

Besides, he conceiveth, by way of answer thereunto, the said question may be asked, which his Majesty was pleased to ask of the Earl in the seventh article, viz. What the said Earl saw in his Majesty, that he should think him so unworthy, as to change his Religion for a wife, or any earthly respect whatsoever? So why should it be thought, that being more fit to undertake great actions in the world, (being a mere moral and temporal respect) should be an argument to persuade in conscience to religious and wife a Prince, and so well instructed as his Majesty is, as though the soul of a Christian Prince was to be wrought upon, in point of truth and belief, by temporal and worldly respects of conveniencies and greatness? It were necessary, for the proving, that the said Earl persuaded his Majesty touching Religion, to produce some arguments that he used out of Scripture, to satisfy him in point of conscience in some tenets of the Roman Church, or that he produced any conference with learned men for his satisfaction in point of Religion: Otherwise, the articles used in this against the said Earl, do (as he conceiveth) carry little strength to prove the charge of persuading his Majesty, either in regard of itself, or in regard of his Majesty's piety.

IX. To the ninth article, the said Earl saith, That there was a discourse in Spain of the way of accommodating the Prince Palatine his affairs; and by way of discourse it was moved, That the marriage of his eldest Son, with a Daughter of the Emperor, and his Son to be bred in the Emperor's Court, would be the fairest way for the pacifying of, and accommodating those businesses. And the Earl, by way of discourse, and not otherwise, did say, That he thought his late Majesty could not be adverse, either to the said match, or to the breeding of the Prince Palatine his Son with the Emperor; so as thereby, the whole patrimonial estate of the Prince Palatine, and the Dignity Electoral might be fully restored, and that his Son might be bred in his own Religion, and have such preceptors, and such a family, as his late Majesty and his Father, meaning the Prince Palatine, should appoint; and they to have free exercise of Religion: For so his late Majesty hath often declared himself to the said Earl, and wished him to lay hold on any occasion for the entertaining of any such proposition. And otherwise than so, and upon the terms aforesaid, and by that way of conference and discourse only, he delivered not any opinion to his Majesty, at his Majesty's being in Spain: For the said Earl is very confident, that his Majesty was returned out of Spain before any proposition was made for the said marriage, other than by way of discourse, as aforesaid; the same as the said Earl believeth, being first moved and debated on by way of proposition, between Mr. Secretary Calvert, and the Ambassador of the King of Spain, October 2. 1623. His late Majesty, upon a relation made unto him by a letter of Mr. Secretary Calvert, approved of the said proposition, and declared the same to be the only way, as he conceived, to accommodate with honour those great businesses: And wrote to that purpose to his Son-in-law the Prince Palatine, by his letters dated 9 November 1623, a copy of which he, together with Mr. Secretary Calvert's relation, and the Lord Conway, by his late Majesty's commandment, sent unto the said Earl, the tenor of which translated out of French, is as followeth.

We have thought good, that we may provide best and most soundly for your affairs, not only to procure, but also to assure your peace, were to cut up by the very roots that evil, which hath been settled in the heart of the Emperor, by the great displeasure and enmity he hath conceived against you. For the removing and quite extinguishing of which, it seemeth to us no better or more powerful means can be used, than a good alliance, which may be proposed by us, between your eldest Son, and the Daughter of the said Emperor, upon the assurance we have, we shall not be refused in this matter, if you on your part will give your consent. And for the more surety of the good success thereof, we are determined, before any such proposition be made to the Emperor, to interst the King of Spain with us in the business, who, we trust, will lend us his helping hand, as well for the effecting of it, and bringing it to a good conclusion, as in procuring likewise, that the condition be duly observed. Amongst which conditions, if it happen that the Emperor should demand, that your Son, during his minority, should be brought up in his Court, we shall tell you, that we, for our own part, see no reason why you should stick at it, upon such conditions as he might be tied unto, to wit, That the young Prince should have with him such Governor as you shall please to appoint him, although he be no Roman Catholic; and that neither he, nor any of his, should be any way forced in matter of their conscience. And our meaning is, so to order our proceeding in this treaty, that before your said Son be put into the hands of the Emperor, we will have a clear and certain assurance of an honourable, entire, and punctual restitution of all whatsoever belonging to you: As also we will take care to provide accordingly, as fully and exactly for the assurances requisite for the liberty of conscience, for him and his Domesticks, as they have done here with us, touching those that have been granted them for the Infanta. And therefore seeing there is no inconvenience at all, that may cause your averneses or backwardness in this business, which we for our parts think to be the best, shortest, and most honorable way that you can take, for the compassing of the entire restitution, and making your peace sure with the Emperor, we hope your opinion will concur with us therein, and shall intreat you, by the first, to send us your answer.

By which letters, after his Majesty's coming out of Spain, it appeareth to your Lordships, that there was no proposition of the marriage betwixt the Son of the Prince Palatine, and the Emperor's Daughter, when that letter was written; for therein his Majesty saith, he was determined to interst the King of Spain in the business, before any such proposition should be made to the Emperor. And it will also thereby appear, that his late Majesty's inclination was of the convenience thereof, which the said Earl hoped will acquit him, if by way of discourse only he declared what his Majesty's opinion was, which, with honesty he could not have concealed. And the said Earl saith, he doth not remember what answer Sir Walter Aston made upon that discourse which he then delivered, nor what replies the said Earl made; but sure he is, whatsoever the said Earl said, or what answer or reply never was made, as it was by way of discourse, and not otherwise, so it was according to that which he truly conceived to be the best and easiest way to accommodate the business and to be his Majesty's pleasure, (which the said Sir Walter Aston may be ignorant of, as he is confident that he was) and not out of any dissimulation to our Religion, or for any sinister respect or regard to the House of Austria, as by the said article is intimated: For he did conceive the breeding of the Prince Palatine's Son with the Emperor, having a Governor appointed by his late Majesty and his Father, and he and his Domesticks to have free use of their own Religion, to be a matter of impossibility, or such dangerous consequence in point of Religion, as to imply his conversion, as by the article it is intimated; well knowing that in the Emperor's Court, all Princes there, though his prisoners, and others his Counsellors and Servants about his person, and so great command in his armies, being avowed Protestants, have the free use of their Religion: And it is not to be supposed, the Son of the Prince Palatine, Grandchild to the King of Great-Britain, should be matched, and no care taken to capitulate for the use of his Religion, being ever granted to the meanest Prince that is bestowed. And his Majesty's special care in this point, is fully seen in the said letter.

X. To the tenth article he saith, That by comparing of this article of his too much forwardness, with the second article, whereby he is charged with continuing the Treaty upon generalities, without reducing them to certainties, and direct conclusions, your Lordships will perceive how impossible it was for him to avoid an exception. But for direct answer to the present charge, he saith he did not presumptuously, nor yet to his knowledge, break his instructions nor let a day at all for the Desponsories; but was therein merely passive, in admitting the day nominated by the King of Spain, according to the Capitulation before made: Nor did he presumptuously, wilfully, or willingly disobey any commandment or direction of his Majesty that now is, then Prince, which he could understand not to be countermanded, either by present or future instructions otherwise explained.

And for the better manifestation of the truth of his proceedings in, and concerning the same, he saith, That on the day of the departure of his Majesty, then Prince, from the Eleurial in Spain, his Highness delivered unto him, in presence of the Commissioners, his proxies powers, with publick Declaration, taken in writing by the Secretary, to the King of Spain, of the Prince his pleasure, and how the said Earl should use them, viz. That he should deliver them to the King of Spain, upon the coming of the dispensation cleared from Rome, according to that which hath been agreed, which was to be within ten days after the coming of the dispensation. And he further saith, That it is true, that the Prince afterwards by his letters sent by one Mr. Clark, commanded him the said Earl not to deliver the said proxies till he should have received security, that the Infanta, after her being betrothed, should not enter into any religious order, and that before he proceeded, viz. then Prince, such securities as should be offered, that he might judge whether it were sufficient or not.

Whereupon the said Earl, as became a faithful servant, presented unto his Majesty that now is, then Prince, such assurances as were offered unto him, for securing of that point, together with such reasons as he conceived were fit to be offered to their considerations; which gave unto his late Majesty, and his Majesty that now is, then Prince, such satisfaction, as they were pleased to dispatch a Post presently unto him, absolutely discharging him of that commandment, as by their several letters, dated October 8, 1623, will appear as followeth:

We have received your letters by Grifley, and the copy of them to our dear Son; and we cannot forbear to let you know our satisfaction, and humble advice to our Son: Whereupon, having fully deliberated with our self, and communicated with our dear Son, we have rejoiced, with the good liking of our Son, to rest upon that security in point of doubt, for the Infanta's taking a religious order, which you in your judgment shall think meet.

And by that other letter of his Majesty that now is, then Prince, as followeth, viz.

Your letter to the King and me, concerning that doubt I made, after I came from St. Lawrence, hath so justified us both, that we think it fit no longer to stick upon it, but leave it to your discretion to take what security you shall think fitting.

Whereby he was absolutely freed of that commandment, and being freed thereof, he then remained in order which his Majesty, then Prince, had left with him at his departure, which was to proceed according to the capitulations, and his Highness's declaration, when he delivered the said proxies unto him: And so he intended to have done, till by his Highness's letters, November 13, 1623, he was directly commanded the contrary, which commandment he directly and punctually obeyed.

And for such his intentions, till he was countermanded, he conceived he had not only sufficient warrant, but had highly offended if he had done otherwise. For first, for his proceedings to consummate the match he had warrant and instruction under his late Majesty's hand. Secondly, it was the main scope of his ambassage. Thirdly, he was enjoined by the King and Prince his Commission, under the Great-Seal. Fourthly, he had positive order under his Majesty's hand, by letters since. Fifthly, It was agreed by capitulation, that it should be within so many days after the coming of the dispensation. Sixthly, his late Majesty, and his Majesty that now is, then Prince, signified by their letters unto him, at the same time, when they discharged him of his commandment touching the Infanta's entering into Religion, that they intended to proceed in the marriage, as by his Majesty's letters, October 8, 1623, will appear. Seventhly, The proxies were to that end left in his hands, and after again renewed, after his Majesty's return into England. Eighthly, He had overthrown the marriage without order: For although Sir Walter Aston and himself used all possible means for the gaining of time, and deferring the Desponsories; yet the King of Spain caused it to be protested, That in case he the said Earl, should insist upon the deferring of the Desponsories, he would free himself from the Treaty by the said Earl's infringing of the capitulations: And in truth, although the King of Spain should have descended to have prolonged the Desponsories, until one of the days of Christmases, as by the letter was required; yet the Prince's proxies had been before that time expired, and he durst not, without a precise warrant, put such a scorn upon so noble a Lady, whom he then conceived was likely to have been the Prince his Wife, as to nominate a day of marriage when the proxies were out of date, and he was himself sworn to the Treaty. And lastly, he could not in honour and honesty, but endeavour to perform that publick trust reposed in him, when the proxies were deposited in his hands, with publick and legal declaration, with an instrument by a Secretary of State to the King of Spain, leading and directing the use of them, and the same being then Instrumentum stipulatum, wherein as well the King of Spain was interred by the acceptance of the substitution, as the Prince by granting of the proxies, he could not in honesty fail the publick trust, without clear and undoubted warrant; which as soon as he had, he obeyed. So as the case standing thus, the said Earl is very confident, that the supposed countermands, directions, and restrictions, when they should be perused and considered of, will appear to have been very slender and insufficient warrant against the aforesaid orders and reasons before specified: And is also as confident, That what is assured out of his, the said Earl's dispatches, will also appear to be misunderstood; and that if he had proceeded to the execution of the Desponsories, before he received direct and express commandment to the contrary by the aforesaid Letters, November 13, 1623, which he readily and punctually obeyed, he had not, under favour, broken his instructions, or deserved any blame for lack of assurance of the restitution of the Palatinate, and temporal articles.

And first, of the Palatinate, his said Majesty did not send to the said Earl express directions not to dispatch the desponsories, until a full conclusion were had of the other treaty of the Palatinate, together with that of the marriage, as by the said article is alleged; only his late Majesty, by the aforesaid letters of October 8, required the said Earl so to endeavour, that his Majesty might have the joy of both at Christmases. Whereas his instructions of May 14, 1621, were express, that he should not make the business of the Palatinate a condition of the marriage. And his late Majesty's letters of December 30, 1623, were fully to the same effect. Yet did the said Earl, according to what was intimated by the said letter of October 8, so carefully provide therein, as that before the proxies were to be executed, he had an absolute answer in the business of the Palatinate, the same should be really restored according to his late Majesty's desire; and the Comde Oliveres, both in his Majesty's name and in his own, desired the said Earl and Sir Walter Aston, that they would assure his Majesty of the real performance of the same, and intreated, if need were, they should engage their honour and life for it, as by their joint dispatches of November 23, 1623, will appear:

appear; and so much the said Sir Walter Aston and the said Earl agreed should be delivered to them in writing, before they would have delivered their proxies, and so the said Earl declared it; the which answer in writing should have been the same, which since was given them of January 8, 1623. And both Sir Walter Aston and the said Earl were confident therein, as they, by their said letters of November 23, wrote to his late Majesty as follows; viz.

That his Majesty might, according to his desire, signified to the said Earl, by his letters of October 8, Give, as well to his Majesty's daughter that Christmases, the comfortable news of the expiring of her great troubles and sufferings, as to his Son the Prince, the congratulation of being married to a most worthy and excellent Princess.

By which it will evidently appear, he meant not to leave the business of the Palatinate loose, when he intended to proceed to the marriage; but he confessed, that he was ever of opinion, that the best pawn and assurance his late Majesty could have of the real proceeding of the Palatinate, was, that they proceeded really to the effecting of the match; and of the same opinion was his late Majesty also, and the Lords Commissioners here in England, as appeareth by his instructions, dated March 14, 1621, which opinion still continued in them, as appeareth by his late Majesty's letters of January 7, 1622. And as for the temporal articles, the said Earl faith, when the desponsories were formerly appointed to have been, as he remembereth on Friday, August 29, before the departure of his Majesty, then Prince, out of Spain, which was only hindered by the not coming of the dispensation, the Prince appointed him and Sir Walter Aston to meet with the Spanish commissioners, and they drew up the heads of the temporal articles, wherewith the Prince and the Duke of Buckingham were acquainted; and in case the dispensation had come, and the desponsories being performed on that day, there had been no other provision made for them before the marriage; but presently, upon the Prince his departure, he, the said Earl, caused them to be drawn into form, and sent them to his late Majesty, September 27, 1623, desiring to understand his Majesty's pleasure with all speed, especially if he disapproved any thing in them; but never received notice of any dislike thereof, until the aforesaid letters of November 13, 1623, which put off the desponsories. So as it appeareth, the said Earl was so far from breaking his instructions, or from having any intention to have proceeded to the execution of the desponsories, before his Majesty and the Prince were satisfied of this point of the Infanta entering into Religion, or before convenient assurance, as well for the restitution of the Palatinate, as performances of the temporal articles, that he deserveth, as he conceiveth under favour, no blame, so much as in intention; but if he had erred in intention only, (as he did not) the same being never reduced into act, the fault (as he conceiveth) was removed by his obedience before the intention was put into execution: For so it is in cases towards God. And as to the matter of aggravation against him, that he appointed to forth a time for the desponsories, as that without extraordinary diligence the Prince had been bound, he thereto faith, as he said before, that he set no day at all thereunto, nor could defer it after the dispensation came from Rome, without a direct breach of the match so long laboured in, and so much desired; yet he and Sir Walter Aston having used all possible industry to discover how the motion of altering the match would be taken; and finding an absolute resolution in the King of Spain to proceed punctually, and to require the proxies according to the capitulation, within ten days after the coming of the dispensation; and that time also getting advertisement from Rome, that the dispensation was granted, and would presently be there; he, the said Earl, to the end, in so great a cause, he might have a clear and undoubted understanding of his late Majesty's pleasure, sent a dispatch of November 13, with all diligence unto his Majesty, letting his Majesty know, that it could not be possible for him to protract the marriage above four days, unless he should hazard the breaking, for which he had no warrant.

But that this was now no new resolution, nor the King so straitened in time, as by the said article is pretended, will appear by the said Earl's dispatch of September 28, 1623. In which, upon scruple that was then made of the Infanta's entering into Religion, he wrote to the same effect, viz. That if the dispensation should come, he knew no means how to detain the Proxies above twenty or twenty four days. So that although no difficulty happened until the midst of November 1623, yet it was foreseen, that it must of necessity happen whenever the dispensation should come; and then was warning of two months given thereof; viz. from September 24, until November 29, which was the time appointed for the desponsories.

So as he most humbly submits himself unto your Lordships, which of the two ways was the safer or dutifulle for him to take; whether upon inferences and conjectures, to have overthrown so great a business; or, on the other side, first, to have presented unto his Majesty the truth and sincerity as he did, the true estate of his affairs, with his humble opinion therein, with an intimation, that if his Majesty should resolve to break the match, that for the said Earl his honest discharge of the publick trust reposed in him, when the proxies were deposited in his hands, and for his sufficient warrant in so great a cause, his Majesty would be graciously pleased to give clear and express order, (which he had not) and in the interim, whilst his Majesty might take into consideration the great inconveniencies that might ensue, the said inconveniencies might be suspended, and the business kept upon fair terms, that his Majesty might have his way and choice clear and unfoiled before him.

And as to the evil consequences which are pretended would have followed, if the said Earl had proceeded to the consummation of the match, before he had express order and warrant to the contrary; he supposed his Majesty should speedily have seen the marriage, which he so long sought to have effected; that the Prince should have had a worthy Lady whom he loved; that the portion was much greater than ever was given in money in Christendom; that the King of Spain had engaged himself for restitution of the Palatinate; for which the said Earl conceived a Daughter of Spain, and two millions, had been no ill pawn; besides many other additions of advantage to the Crown of England: Whereas on the contrary side, he foresaw that the Prince would be kept a year longer unmarried, a thing that so highly concerneth these Kingdoms; he doubteth, that the recovery of the Palatinate from the Emperor, and Duke of Bavaria, by force, would prove a great difficulty, and that Christendom was like to fall into a general combustion: So that desiring that his Majesty should have obtained his ends, and have had the honour and happiness, not only to have given peace, plenty, and increase, unto his own Subjects and Crowns, but to have propounded the greatest differences that had been these many years in Christendom: And by his piety and wisdom, to have prevented the shedding of so much Christian blood, as he feared would ensue, if these businesses were disordered. These reasons, he confessed, and the zeal unto his Majesty's service, made him so earnestly desire the effecting of this business, and cannot but think himself an unfortunate man, (his Majesty's affairs being so near settling to his Majesty's content, as he conceiveth they were, and hoping to have been to his Majesty, not only a faithful servant, but a successful servant) to see the whole estate of his affairs turned upside down, without any the least fault of his; and yet he, the only Minister on the English and Spanish side, that remained under disgrace.

XI. To the eleventh Article the said Earl faith, that the Article is grounded upon a petition by him preferred to this honourable House, supposed to be scandalous; which your Lordships (as he conceiveth) according to the customs and privileges of the House of Peers, would have been pleased first to have adjudged to have been, either for matter appearing in itself, or upon hearing the said Earl, for it the matter appearing in the petition itself be not to be excepted unto, it cannot, as he conceiveth, by collateral accidents, be taken for a scandal, till it be examined and found false. For a plain and direct answer thereto he faith, that the said petition is such, as will not warrant any such inference, as by the said Article is inferred. And that he hoped to justify the contents of the said petition in such sort, as shall not displease his Majesty; nor deserve that expression which is used in the charge; but contrarily what he hath said, or shall say therein in his defence, shall in all things tend to the honour and service of his Majesty, by reducing into his memory divers circumstances, and laying before him the passages of divers particulars, which by undue practices have been either concealed from his Majesty, or mis-related unto him.

“Having thus offered to this high and honourable Court, such proofs and reasons as he hoped shall, in your Lordships wisdom and justice, clearly acquit him of any capital crime, or wilful offence; if it shall appear, that out of errors of judgment, too much ferventness of zeal to his Majesty's service, or the ignorance of the Laws of this Realm, (wherewith he hath not been able to be so well acquainted as he ought, by reason of foreign employments by the space of many years) or by any other ways or means he hath fallen into the danger of the Laws for any thing pardoned in the general Pardon, made in the Parliament holden at Westminster, Anno Viceimo Primo Regni Imp. Jacobi Angliæ, &c. of blessed memory, he humbly prayeth allowance of the Pardons, and the benefit thereof, (with this clause, that he doth and will aver, that he is none of the persons excepted out of the same) although he is very confident, he shall not need the help of any Pardon, having received many

“Significavit.”

"significations, as well from his Majesty's own mouth, that he had never offended his Majesty, as lately, by several letters of the Lord Conway, that he might rest in the security he was in, and sit still, and should be no further questioned. But he hopes your Lordships will not only find him so far from blame, but that he hath served his late Majesty of blessed memory, and his most gracious Son, the King's Majesty that now is, with that fidelity, care, and industry, that your Lordships will take course, as you, in your wisdoms, shall think fit, not only for upholding the honour and reputation of a Peer in this Realm, after so many employments, but likewise become humble and earnest suitors to his Majesty on his behalf (which he humbly prayeth) that he may be restored to his Majesty's good favour, which, above all worldly things, he most desireth."

This defense of the Earl of Bristol seemed to me worthy to be transmitted to posterity, in a Language more generally known than the English. Truth is visible throughout: the whole is perfectly coherent: nothing appears disguised, and the Earl's innocence is so clearly seen, as to be almost beyond doubt. But on the other hand, there appears a furious persecution against this Lord, from those who must have been convinced of his innocence. In this persecution is seen the extreme weakness of James I. who, contrary to his own knowledge, not only permitted the Earl of Bristol to be oppressed, who had served him very faithfully, but also was induced to tell the Parliament, in 1624, two things equally distant from the truth. The first, that when the Prince and Duke of Buckingham came to Madrid, they found the affair with which the Earl of Bristol was charged, as untouched, as if it had never been mentioned before. And yet, he had himself signed the Articles of the Treaty, and nothing was wanting but the Pope's Dispensation to celebrate the marriage, as manifestly appears in the Earl of Bristol's answer. The second, that the affair upon which he consulted the Parliament, namely, whether he should break the Treaties with Spain, was yet Res integra, though these Treaties had been entirely broken two months before. But Charles the first's prejudice against the Earl of Bristol is so surprising, that after having seen the Earl's defense, one can hardly believe, a Prince, so judicious in other respects, could be induced to dictate to his Attorney-General, an accusation so full of calumnies against a Lord, whom certainly he could not think guilty, since no man knew more of the affair than himself. This is a character which does not redound to his honour. He would have been more excusable, if he had caused the Duke of Buckingham to act alone, whose reputation ought not to have been more dear to him than his own. In short, we see in the Earl of Bristol's defense, a clear and full explication of what passed in Spain, in the negotiation of the two Treaties for the marriage, and for the restitution of the Palatinates, which is the principal subject of the Reign of James I. The Earl's defense undeniably shows also, what all the good writers affirm, that the Duke of Buckingham's narrative to the Parliament in 1624, was all false. And therefore I thought, this narrative of the Duke's would not be ill placed after the Earl of Bristol's defense, that the Reader, by comparing the one with the other, may be satisfied with his own eyes, how unworthily King James, the Prince his Son, and the Duke of Buckingham, acted with the Parliament, in order to cause them to advise a rupture with Spain, on which advice King Charles afterwards so strenuously insisted.

THE Duke in his narration, observed six distinct and several parts. I. The motives of the Prince's journey to Spain. II. The treaty of the marriage set on foot in Spain, severally and by itself. III. The treaty of the marriage and restitution, united together by a reciprocal subordination. IV. The Prince's return from Spain. V. His Majesty's subsequent proceedings in both Treaties, since the return. VI. The stating of the question, super totam materiam, wherein both the Houses were to offer to his Majesty, their advice and counsel.

ARTICLE I.

The Motives of the Prince's Journey to Spain.

The negotiation of Sir Richard Weston Chancellor of the Exchequer, with the Archduchess of Bruffels, ministered unto his Majesty the first occasion of jealousy, and made a kind of discovery of the Spaniards indirect dealing with this State.

After the Duke had spoken these few words, there was read a letter of the third of October 1622, from the King to the Earl of Bristol, wherein Bristol was required to let the King of Spain know, how sensible King James was of the Emperor's proceeding towards him; and that he should demand of the King of Spain a promise, under hand and seal, that Heidelberg should be delivered within seventy days after audience, and the like for Mannheim and Frankendale, if they be taken; and if this be denied, to press to have leave to march through the King of Spain's territories with an army, for the recovering of his Children's patrimony; and that the King of Spain should assist us with his forces.

Then the Duke desired the Houses to take for truth whatever he should say, granted and attested by the Prince's presence; and shewed, that this Letter was not put home to the utmost by the Earl of Bristol. Hereupon a dispatch was sent away to my Lord of Bristol, expressly commanding him to press his directions more home than yet he had done, and in case he should be denied or delayed by the King of Spain, then to take his leave and come away: This was not so fully exacted by my Lord of Bristol.

Porter, that carried these letters, was commanded not to stay above ten days, who after he had been there some four or five days, and saw nothing towards a dispatch, went himself to the Conde Olivares, (having been his creature) and desired him that he would speed his dispatch. Olivares asked him what he would have? Who replied, no more than what had been formerly promised, that in case the Emperor should deny the restitution of the Palatinates, the King of Spain should assist our King by arms to recover it, or else give way to our forces to march thither through his country. Olivares replied, that this was a preposterous demand; what, to assist with arms against the King's uncle, and the Catholic League! Porter speaking to him of the marriage of our Prince with the Infanta of Spain, he told him, that he understood not a word of it (2).

Porter acquainted Bristol herewith: he said, he would call Olivares to an account, if he held this language with him, and would make him understand, that an Earl of England was as good a man, as a Conde of Spain. But sending for Porter the next morning, he changed his resolution, and concluded to carry the business more calmly, and said, the Conde was so reserved, because he was shy and dainty to report those mysteries with that freedom to him, who was not qualified as a public Minister. The Conde was angry with Porter for communicating what he said to Bristol. Mr. Porter returned with a dispatch fraught with generalities, and without any one particular or certainty at all, made his relation to the Prince's Highness; who thereupon took his resolution to go in person to Spain, and gave himself these reasons for the enterprise.

He saw his Father's negotiation plainly deluded; matters of Religion gained upon, and extorted (3); his Sister's cause more and more desperate; and that this was the way to put things off or on; and that in this particular, delay was worse than a plain denial; and that according to the usual proverb, A desperate disease must have a desperate Remedy (4).

Hereupon the King commanded the Duke to accompany his Highness in his journey.

ARTICLE II.

The Treaty of the Marriage severed, and by it self.

When the Prince had arrived at Madrid, the Conde gave him a visit; magnified exceedingly the Prince's journey; amplified the obligations his Highness had put upon that King; and said, that now without all peradventure, it must be a match, and we must part and divide the whole world betwixt us.

The next day the Conde taking the Duke into his coach, and Mr. Porter for his interpreter, falling into discourse of the match, he said unto the Duke, let us dispatch this match out of hand, and strike it up without the Pope: The Duke answered, he liked the manner very well, but desired to understand the means. The means, quoth the Conde, is very easy; it is but the conversion of the Prince; which we cannot conceive but his Highness intended upon his resolution for this journey.

(1) This Narrative has been collated with the Record in Rymer, Tom. 17. p. 556, &c. by means whereof, several mistakes that were in Rishworth, are rectified.

(2) The Marriage had been now six years negotiating at Madrid. There were some Articles signed, which Gregory XV. had sent back with his answers. Either these or Conde Olivares, or Porter, or the Duke of Buckingham, did not speak the truth. Rymer.

(3) These matters became much worse after the Prince was in Spain. Rymer.

(4) All these Reasons are extremely weak. For supposing them to be true, they only prove at most the necessity of a Rupture with Spain, but not of the Prince's journey thither. Rymer.

The Duke answered forthwith, that with freedom they came thither, and with freedom they would return again: they were no jurglers, neither came they to Spain to make new bargains (1): that the Prince was settled in his Religion; his conscience was troubled with no scruples in that kind: If they struck any more upon that string, they would mar all the harmony. Then said the Conde, there is no way but to fend to Rome to hasten the dispensation; to which the Duke assented. Hereupon the Conde wrote his Letter to the Cardinal Ludovico the Pope's nephew; which being shewed to the Duke, seemed to him to be very heavy; the Duke therefore desired to quicken it with this postscript, That now the Prince being arrived, must not be sent back without a wife; That delay to a suitor is a kind of refusal; that clogging instructions would amount to a denial, and new conditions, to an absolute breach. The Conde fell into choler, and said directly it could not be done. This the Prince affirmed to be acted in his presence: But the Earl of Bristol made a more benign construction thereof, the Duke a right down conclusion, that this people never intended either match or restitution; and so wished his Highness fairly at home again: However the messenger was dispatched to Rome.

Four or five days after his Highness was placed to see his Mistress in her passage through the streets, as she made her visits from church to church: But pressing for access, he was delayed, but at last obtained a visit; but a very strange one. He was not suffered to speak unto her, but as they had set it down in words and syllables in writing, saying, they were no astrologers, and could not foresee the event of this marriage: And therefore they resolved to admit him as a Prince only, and not as a suitor. But the Conde valued this up with a complement, That if the dispensation were once returned, he should lye with her even that very night; nay, have her he should upon any terms. If he could not be qualified to enjoy her as a wife, yet he should have her as a mistress.

Soon after, riding in a coach, it was urged by the Conde, That the Infanta was of a tender conscience, and if she should come into England, and find the Prince an enemy to her Religion, it would quite dishearten her. His Highness consented to hear her upon this subject, because he was as like to convert her, as she was to pervert him. A conference with Divines was pressed upon his Highness, which he refused, and said, If after disputation with them, they should not prevail against a young man, they would remain much disgusted, and ill-affected to the whole negotiation; this kind of importunity was still used towards the Prince, till the return of the dispensation.

Six weeks after the Prince's arrival came the dispensation; but his Highness understood from Rome, by Mr. Gage, that the dispensation was returned, much clogged in matter and manner, especially with the annexed new condition. The King of Spain, before the receiving of the dispensation, was to take an oath to fee all the articles performed; whereupon faculty was issued, really performed, or else to make war, in case of any failure, upon the King of England.

His Highness signified his resolution unto them, that he neither could nor would add or alter any thing of the first articles sent to England.

A Junta of Divines are appointed to meet and consider, whether the King might safely take the oath. By this time the Prince had gone through all the articles, sitting in person with the Committee; only leaving three undecided, That of the Church, that of the Nurse, and that of the education of the Children; which his Highness reserved till he should speak with the King. Then said the Conde, Now business is in a better way than ever it was, a match, and without more ado she was his wife.

But the next day came Gondomar, and spake unto the Prince of the same match, as of a new thing, and told him plainly, That unless his Highness came to all the conditions of the dispensation as they were sent from Rome, clearly and entirely, nothing would be done; for they had no power to remove or alter a word of false Latin. Whereupon his Highness was justly distasted, and offered to break. Then they pressed the Prince, that he would be pleased to stay twenty days, until the King of Spain might receive an answer from England. The Prince resolved to stay, upon condition that Sir Francis Cottington might be dispatched away within two days, and some messenger that might overtake him with the articles that should be sent after, as soon as ever they could be made ready: But the two days of their hammering spun out to twenty; at the end thereof they brought them with new additions.

The articles being at last sent to England, the Junta of Divines delivered their opinions, that the Infanta could not be sent over before the spring; at which his Highness was offended, but the Conde prevailed with him to stay, until their Ambassador should certify out of England, that the articles were assented unto by King James, and put in execution, and then the Lady should go with the Prince.

The Bishop of Segovia was pleased to say to the Duke, That he had heard something of the estate of our Kingdom, and had received it from good hands; that our King could not make a Toleration without a rebellion, and he easily believed it; because the King of Spain is not able, in his Dominions, to effect the like enterprise, without incurring the like danger; therefore he concluded, it was unsafe to fend the Lady thither at this time, because we having granted as much in effect as a Toleration, it was very probable she should be welcomed with a rising and rebellion. To which the Duke replied, That if the favours which the King his Master had exhibited to his Catholics, at the mediation of that King, and the advice of that very Committee, of which that Bishop was one, be of so dangerous a consequence; it seems their Lordships, who gave the advice for that article, though they pretended Religion, intended plain and open rebellion. But you must know, quoth the Duke, if his Highness had been of my Lord Bishop's opinion, That these connivances had amounted to a Toleration; he had never accepted of these articles to have gained any alliance: For what was agreed unto, was but a temporary suspension of penal Laws, but no Toleration; for that could not be done, but by consent of Parliament. Then Gondomar hereupon said, that for his part, he did not hold it fit to fend the Infanta thither, before the articles be perfectly put in execution. And Gondomar privately infused to the Prince his Highness, being incensed against the Duke, That the Duke was in heart (as he said all his kindred were) a Roman Catholic; and he said to a Jesuit of great account and zeal in those parts, That the Duke was a most obstinate, perverse, and refractory Puritan.

About this time it was reported, that the Prince intended to steal away; whereupon they laid wait to intercept him: Hereupon the Duke was sent to tell them, That although they had stolen thither out of love, they would never steal thence out of fear.

About this time the Prince sent a message to his Father, That if he should receive any advertisement, that he was detained by that State as a prisoner, he would be pleased, for his sake, never to think upon him any longer as a Son, but reflect upon the good of his Sister, and the safety of his own Kingdoms.

ARTICLE III.

The Treaty of the Match and Restitution reciprocally subordinated.

It is fit to observe this passage, which is the hinge whereupon all his Highness's subsequent actions are turned and moved. He had never staid a sevennight longer in Spain; he had never left any proxy with Bristol; he had never taken any oath at the Escorial; or so much as ever written a letter of complement to the Lady; but that he had still before his eyes, as his cynosure (2), the promise made by the Conde, for the restitution of the Palatinate.

To hasten the delivery of the Lady, the Duke presented unto the Conde, how his Master was now in years; the Prince his only Son; and he would suffer in honour and reputation, to return home without his wife. The Conde consented hereunto, and desired the Prince would name a day for his departure.

This news came to the Infanta, who seemed to be apprehensive of the Prince's going away, and prevailed with his Highness to return this complement unto her, That rather than he would give her Alteza any disgust, he would stay for seven years.

By this time Sir Francis Cottington is arrived with all things perfected by the King, and letters from the Ambassadors of good satisfaction, and a command from the King to his Highness, to make his return within one month.

Now began the Conde to enter into the treaty for the restitution of the Palatinate, saying, The Lady should by no means go to England, before that business was accommodated. And it was projected, That there should be a restitution of the Land to the Prince Palatine, upon a condition of marriage with the Emperor's Daughter, and that he should be bred in the Emperor's Court (3). The Prince demanded of the Conde, whether, in case the Emperor proved refractory, the King his Master would assist him with arms, to reduce him to reasonable terms? The Conde answered negatively (4), because they had a maxim of State, that the King of Spain must never fight against the

(1) They however made new terms. Rapin.

(3) It appears by the Earl of Bristol's defence, which is confirmed by a Letter from King James, that this proposal was not actually made till after the Prince's departure from Madrid. Rapin.

Emperor;

Emperor; for they would not employ their forces against the House of Austria.

Hereupon his Highness made his protestation to the Conde: Look to it, Sir, for if you hold your self to that, there is an end of all; for without this you may not rely upon either marriage or friendship.

By this time the Prince is grown cheap and vulgar in the Court of Spain, so that they will scarce bestow a visit upon him, and the Conde came very seldom to him: and two letters came to the Duke's hands, which shewed, that all that the Conde did, was nothing but flatteries and lightness; notwithstanding, he seemed at this time to be in a good humour, and told the Duke, That now certainly it must be a match, and the devil could not break it: The Duke replied, He thought so, and the match had need be very firm and strong, it had been seven years in foadering. The Conde denied it, and said plainly, It had not been really intended seven months; and said, I will fetch that out of my desk, that shall assure you thereof; and so produced two letters; the first was written with the King of Spain's own hand, dated the fifth of November 1622; and the other from the Conde Olivares, of the eighth of November 1622, being an answer to that letter (1).

These Letters having been inserted in the History of King James I, page 219, there is no need of repeating them here over again

ARTICLE IV.

The Prince's return from Spain.

And now the Prince returning for England, being engaged to leave his proxy, did deposit the same in the hands of the Earl of Bristol, who was to keep it, and use it as his procurator; that is, as he should receive his Highness's directions from time to time: His order for the present was, (said the Duke) That if the confirmation came from Rome clear and entire (2), (which it did not) then within so many days he should deliver it to the King of Spain.

The second direction sent to him, was by a letter which his Highness sent him between his departure from the Escorial, and coming to the Sea-side, to this effect: That for fear a Monastery should rob him of his wife, he should stay the delivery of the powers until the doubts were cleared; and that his Highness would send him in the premises some further directions: Here because my Lord of Bristol in his letter of the first of November 1623, doth press so vehemently the Prince his Highness concerning this proxy, and the Prince vowed openly before both Houses (3), that he had never by oath or honour engaged himself not to revoke the powers more than by the clause, De non revocanda Procurazione, inserted in the instrument itself, and that he conceived the clause to be matter of form; and although essentially of no binding power, yet usually thrust into every such instrument; and that the Civilians do hold, That it is lawful by the civil and canon Law, for any man to revoke his proxy of marriage, notwithstanding it hath the clause, De non revocanda Procurazione inserted in it: Therefore as to this point the Duke concluded, That the Earl of Bristol in charging this matter so highly on the Prince, had much forgot himself (4).

ARTICLE V.

The subsequent Proceedings of his Majesty in both the Treaties, since the return of his Highness.

The Prince, by the mercy of God, came to Royston, and made his relation to the King of all that had passed. His Majesty was glad, and told him, That he had acted well the part of a Son; and now the part of a Father must come upon the stage, which was to provide with all circumspection, That his only Son should not be married with a portion of tears to his only daughter. And therefore his Majesty commanded by an express dispatch, the stay of the proxy in the Earl of Bristol's hands, until he had some better assurance of the restitution of the Palatinate.

Then was read his Majesty's letter to the Earl of Bristol, dated the 8th of October 1623, wherein the Earl of Bristol was required by the King, so to endeavour, that he might have the joy of both Treaties at Christmas; namely, those about the marriage, and the restitution of the Palatinate. This the Duke would have had lookt upon as a positive order, not to deliver up the procurator, till the restitution of the Palatinate was actually promised; concerning which matter, see the Earl of Bristol's answer to the tenth Article of his accusation.

After that the Duke went on in the following manner: You would perceive that by this dispatch, Bristol would lay hold on all hints and emergent occasions, to put off the Desponsories without this required assurance by arms first obtained; but the truth is, he did not so.

For (1st, the confirmation came from Rome, clogged and mangled; and instead of challenging thereupon, he labours with no small strength of wit, to hide and palliate the same (5).

2. In the temporal Articles the portion was altered, from six hundred thousand pounds in ready cash, to some eighty thousand pounds in money, and a few jewels, and a pension of twenty thousand pounds per Annum. Instead of quarrelling with this main alteration, he seems to approve and applaud the payment (6).

3. For the assurance of restitution of the Palatinate, the main foundation, both of match and friendship, he is so far from providing for it before, (which was the method prescribed by the King) that he leaves it to be mediated by the Infanta after the marriage.

Lastly, Instead of putting off the contract, as any man in the world (upon the dispatch from Royston) would have done, he comes to prefix a precise day for the Desponsories.

Now from this rash fixing of the day for the Desponsories in Spain, which was controlled again by an express (7), from hence issued an unnecessary discourtesy put upon the King, and in a manner upon the Infanta, by the Earl of Bristol: From that proceeded a greater affront put upon the Prince, the taking away the title La Princesa from the Infanta, and the debarring of our Ambassadors from any further access to her person.

Then was produced an answer of the King of Spain, to the memorial of the English Ambassador, implying a refusal to assist by arms for the recovery of the Palatinate, in case the Emperor consented not to a restitution.

ARTICLE VI.

The stating of the Question, super totam materiam.

This question the Duke stated after this manner: Whether this being the full effect and product of all the negotiation, which I have opened unto you, be sufficient super totam materiam, for his Majesty to rely upon with any safety; as well for the marriage of his only Son, as for the relief of his only Daughter? Or, that these treaties set aside, his Majesty were best to trust to his own strength, and to stand upon his own feet? So the Duke ended with this conclusion, that if the bringing us from darkness to light, did deserve any thanks, we owe it, and must wholly ascribe it to the Prince his Highness.

It is needless, I think, to make upon this narrative, reflections which may occur to every Reader, after having seen the Earl of Bristol's defense. I shall content my self therefore with observing, how little proper this narrative was to afford sufficient information to the two Houses of Parliament, to enable them, upon good grounds, to form their resolutions concerning the question proposed to them by the King. And yet upon this alone it was that they resolved to advise the King to break with Spain, and this hasty advice was the principal cause of the differences afterwards between Charles I, and his Parliaments.

(1) The Earl of Bristol pretended, these Letters were written with no other intent but to get the Negotiation out of his hands, because the Court of Spain was in hopes of obtaining better Conditions from the Duke of Buckingham. Rapin.

(2) It is very doubtful, whether this Condition was inserted in the Prince's Declaration. Rapin.

(3) At six months after. Rapin.

(4) See the Earl of Bristol's Defense, Article X. Rapin.

(5) This could not be true. For the Dispensation did not come from Rome till the beginning of December 1623, and the King's absolute Order not to deliver the Dispensation, was dated November 23. Therefore the Earl of Bristol had not time to write to England, to palliate the defects of the Dispensation, supposing it to have had any. Rapin.

(6) This must be misrepresented: For if the Earl of Bristol had been guilty of such prevarication, the King would not have failed to bring it as an Article of Accusation against him, which alone would have been sufficient to condemn him. Rapin.

(7) It was the Prince himself, and the Duke, who had agreed with the King of Spain on the day the Marriage should be solemnized, viz. Ten days after the coming of the Dispensation, which the Earl of Bristol altered not. Rapin.

Considerations on the Authors who have writ the History of CHARLES I.

THE Civil War between Charles I. and the Parliament, gave birth to two parties, who contended for victory till the battle of Nazby. By this battle, the Parliament acquired a superiority, which enabled them to hold the King's party, or the Cavaliers, in a sort of slavery, from which they were not delivered till 1660, by the Restoration of Charles II. After the Restoration, the Royalists in their turn became so superior, that the other Party durst no longer hold up their heads. This continued till the end of the reign of James II, during the space of twenty-seven or twenty-eight years. In one or other of these two intervals were penned most of the works, wherein the authors undertake to give an exact account of the troubles of England, in the reign of Charles I. with the grounds and causes of the same. From the conclusion of the war, to the Restoration of Charles II, the friends of the Parliament had free scope to write and publish whatever they pleased, whilst the King's Adherents durst not set their names to their writings. In this interval, were published numberless polemical writings, with such animosity, so many reproaches and invectives, that it is not easy for a man, who is in search after truth, to discern, in all these writings, the proofs which may have some solidity, and separate them from the presumptions, false consequences, artful suppositions, and invectives, wherewith they abound.

One of the most considerable writings of those days was Eikon Basilike, or the King's Portraiture, published in 1649. It can hardly be doubted, that Charles I. was himself the author (1). He undertakes in this work to vindicate himself upon all the Articles laid to his charge. It is properly an abstract of the reasons he had before published in several papers printed by his order, or addressed to both Houses of Parliament. I have not quoted this book in the History of his Reign, because it contains nothing with regard to the facts or proofs, but what is more fully expressed in the King's messages, answers, and declarations. An answer was published to this book, pretending to show, the King had not spoken with sincerity; and presently after appeared a reply to this answer. This Treatise has been highly esteemed, because it contains all the principal arguments in favour of the King. It may be easily presumed, the King forgot nothing material, since no man could know his affairs better than himself. Accordingly, this book has served for foundation to whatever has been since writ in his favour.

Another very considerable work, published a little after the death of Oliver Cromwell, and dedicated to his Son Richard whilst Protector, was Rushworth's Collections. This work may very justly be considered as a continuation of Rymer's Fœdera, of which I have made great use in this History. It is a collection of all that passed with respect to the publick affairs, from the year 1618, to the death of Charles I, not by way of narration, but affording materials to compose a regular History. It contains all the transactions at Court and in the Parliament; the King's Proclamations upon sandy matters; his Speeches to both Houses, and those that were made by his order; the Addresses or Petitions presented to the King by the Parliament; his Majesty's answers; the Petitions presented to both Houses; the Speeches in the House of Commons, as well as in the Courts of Justice; the votes or resolves of the two Houses, and their conferences upon divers subjects; the King's messages to the Parliament, with the answers; the impeachments of the Commons brought before the Lords against several illustrious persons; the answers of the Parties accused; the Sentences; the Petitions of the Commons and both Houses to the King, concerning Religion, Tunnage and Poundage, the affairs of the Militia, breaches of Privileges, the affair of Hull; the King's answers and his several messages upon these affairs; the King's and the Parliament's Manifestos; all the events of the War; the accounts of the skirmishes, sieges and battles; the negotiations for Peace; a great number of Papers, which give a perfect knowledge of the differences between the King and his Scotch Subjects, and of those between the Army and Parliament, with the negotiations between the King and both Houses, after his Majesty's imprisonment; the violence exercised by the army upon the Parliament; the King's condemnation and death. These materials are the more valuable, as the author draws no consequence from what he relates, and very seldom endeavours to prejudice his Reader by reasonings. So that every man is free to make what use of them he thinks fit, according to his own principles. I shall speak a little more fully of these collections hereafter.

From the Restoration of Charles II. to the end of his reign, two other works were published upon the same subject, I mean, upon the reign of Charles I. and a third was composed at the same time, though published later.

The first is entitled, The Annals of King James and King Charles I. It is said to be composed by Dr. Franklin, who has not thought fit to put his name to it. He begins his Annals at the year 1612, and continues them through the rest of the Reign of James I; and from the death of that Prince to the year 1642, during the first eighteen years of the reign of Charles I.

The second, published in 1682, was composed by John Nalson Doctor in Law. It is entitled, An impartial Collection of the great affairs of State, from the beginning of the Scotch Rebellion to the murder of King Charles I. This collection begins only at the year 1639, and though probably the author intended to continue it to King Charles's death, as appears by the title, he left it imperfect, and brought it no lower than January 1641-2, in two volumes in folio.

The third is, The History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England, written by the Earl of Clarendon. This History was penned before Nalson's, though it appeared not till Queen Ann's reign. It begins properly with the Parliament of November the 3d, 1640, the whole first book being a sort of Introduction, where the author gives a general account of what passed from the last years of James I, to that Parliament. This History reaches to the Restoration of Charles II, in 1660.

These three last works were composed in the reign of Charles II, at a time when that Prince had carried the Royal authority much higher than the King his Father had ever done: at a time when those who had been adherents of the Long Parliament, or were in the same Principles, were cruelly persecuted, and when it was more dangerous to be a Presbyterian than an Atheist.

I shall not speak here of many less considerable writings, most of which ascribe to the King an unlimited power, and consequently represent the last war of the Parliament against Charles I. as the blackest and most evident rebellion.

Whoever intends to write the History of the reign of Charles I. must take his materials from some one of the works I have mentioned, or from all. For this reason I think myself obliged to speak a little more fully of them, to the end it may not be thought strange that I have not adopted without examination whatever they contain. Was there among the English some good neutral Historian, it would be he that should be taken for guide: but I know not any. He therefore that undertakes to write at this time the History of Charles I, must endeavour to discover the truth in even the most partial Historians, and be extremely careful to avoid the continual snares they lay for their Readers, to favour the cause they maintain. One must know what was their design in writing, what system they followed, and the artifices they used to engage in their principles such as make but few reflections in reading a History, and are apt to be easily drawn into the prejudices of the Historian. I shall begin with Rushworth, who was the first writer.

There is no Historian that can appear at first sight more impartial than he that contents himself with furnishing materials for a History, without drawing any consequences himself, and without reasoning upon the Papers he exhibits, either for or against what they contain. It is however certain, that even in this he may show very great partiality, as for instance, in giving forged Papers, in curtailing or altering those that are true, in giving such only as may be advantageous to the Party he would favour. Rushworth, who was most certainly a friend to the Parliament, Clerk-Assistant to the House of Commons, and Secretary to General Fairfax, is accused of three things

(1) This seems to be so without sufficient ground, for whoever reads what Dr. Walter and Toland in his Antiquary, have published on this subject, must be inclined to say, that the King could not possibly be the Author. Indeed it is almost demonstrable, that both Bohn and Gravel wrote that Treatise. See on a late occasion Dr. Walter, and Gravel, and also Ludlow, and Baker's Life of Oliver Cromwell, and on the other side, Dr. Hollingsworth, Mr. W. H. H. H., &c.

by the contrary party. 'Tis pretended, 1. That he has given false Papers. 2. That he has curtailed others, under colour of abridging them. 3. That he has affected to give all those that are favorable to the Parliament, and to omit several which might serve to show the King's innocence. 4. Lastly, that not declaring, from whence he received his materials, we have only his authority for what he relates. This is a general accusation, which, were it well proved upon any important and decisive facts, is sufficient to shake the credit of the collector. The Reader will judge, whether this charge is made good with regard to the particular cases on which he is accused, and whether these cases are of such a nature, that they ought to determine the disinterested to neglect the generality of his Collections. I shall take these particular accusations from Nalson's Introduction, wherein his chief aim was to discredit Rushworth, and perwade his Readers that they ought not to believe any thing he advances. 'Tis very likely, Nalson has forgot nothing upon this subject. I shall begin with the false Papers he accuses Rushworth of inferring in his Collections.

The first Paper forged by Rushworth, according to Nalson, is a Speech of King James to the Parliament, the 30th of January 1620. Instead of giving this Speech entire, Rushworth infers only an abstract. And therefore Nalson takes care to print the true Speech, and Rushworth's abstract in separate columns, that they may be more easily compared. He adds, that the whole Speech was communicated by William Sancroft Archbishop of Canterbury. Upon comparing Rushworth's abstract with the entire Speech, there appears but one material passage which could give occasion to charge Rushworth with unfaithfulness. And that is where 'tis said in the Speech, A Parliament is an Assembly composed of a Head and a Body, the Monarch is the Head, and the three Estates the Body. Whereas it is said in the abstract, the Parliament is a thing composed of a Head and a Body, the Monarch and the two Estates. This induces Nalson to exclaim against Rushworth, for reducing by his own authority the three Estates, namely, the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons, to two Estates, meaning thereby, that the House of Peers made but one Estate.

This question was debated with great warmth, when the exclusion of the Bishops out of the Upper-House was in agitation. For if the Bishops were one of the three Estates of Parliament, it was evident they could not be excluded without altering the constitution. But this opinion was not generally received. The Commons pretended, that the Bishops with the Peers made but one Estate. Nalson pretends therefore, that Rushworth to countenance the Commons opinion, and justify the exclusion of the Bishops, makes King James say what he did not. To prove this, besides the whole Speech, communicated by the Archbishop of Canterbury, he alleges several things to show, there have always been three Estates acknowledged in the Parliament besides the King. He answers the objection drawn from Charles the first's confession, after the exclusion of the Bishops, that himself was one of the three Estates of Parliament, and concludes that James I. could not speak in his Speech of two, but of three Estates.

A second instance of Rushworth's unfaithfulness is, that he gives only an abstract of a Letter to the King from an unknown hand, tending to show, that the Parliament attacked the King himself, in attacking the Duke of Buckingham. This charge conflicts wholly in the Supposition that Rushworth abridged this Letter to hinder his Readers from perceiving all its force.

The third instance of Rushworth's unfaithfulness, is, that he has published in his Appendix a scandalous Paper, called, A Proposition for his Majesty's service to bridle the impudence of Parliaments. 'Tis true Rushworth says, this Paper was questioned in the Star-Chamber. But Nalson pretends, this is not sufficient to excuse Rushworth, who, he says, ought to have shown upon what grounds it was questioned, which he does himself very largely.

A fourth instance of Rushworth's unfaithfulness, is, that he infers in his Collections, a pretended letter of Archbishop Abbot to James I. to dissuade him from granting a Toleration to the Papists, when he was upon the point of concluding the Prince his Son's marriage with the Spanish Infanta. Nalson says upon this subject, that the Archbishop being then out of favour, and having nothing to do with the management of counsels, could have no other foundation, but either his own conjecture, or the common rumour, both equally liable to deceive and to be deceived. He does not positively say however, that the Letter is forged, but contents himself with insinuating it, because Rushworth not having said how he came by the letter, the credit of it rests solely upon his fidelity.

But the fifth and most crying unfaithfulness of Rushworth, according to Nalson, are the private articles of Prince Charles's marriage with the Infanta of Spain. He pretends they are all forged, on purpose to blacken the King and Princes, by intimating that their design was to refore the Catholic Religion in England, and alledges several arguments to prove the forgery.

1. It is not probable, the King and Prince should promise what they knew was not in their power to perform, considering the strength and constitution of the English Laws against Popery, and that the English nation would never have suffered it. This is not one of the most convincing arguments.

2. The Parliament never taxed Charles I. with these private articles, not even in the declaration, where they collected all the reasons which could justify their resolution of not presenting any more addresses to his Majesty. This is a much stronger argument than the former.

3. In the Memoirs of Deagant it is said, the King of France hearing of King James's death, says to the Archbishop of Ambrun, All our hopes of England are lost. Which shows, that Charles had no intention to refore the Catholic Religion. One would think Nalson should not have alleged this reason, which, in clearing this Prince, casts a great blemish on James I.

4. He says, Rushworth, by insinuating that Charles I. intended to refore the Catholic Religion, contradicts himself, since he tells us in another place, that the Prince being in Spain, remained steadfast in his Religion, what endeavours soever were used to seduce him.

5. Rushworth produces no other authority for the truth of these private articles, but his own, and, in all appearance, the French Mercury is his author.

The sixth instance of unfaithfulness laid by Nalson to Rushworth's charge, is, the Pope's letter to the Prince when in Spain, and the Prince's answer. 1. Because it was a thing of mere ceremony. 2. In his circumstances it was no more than what common prudence and policy obliged him to, in order to get out of the King of Spain's hands. This excuse shows Nalson was not thoroughly convinced of the forgery of these letters. He insinuates, however, that they might be counterfeit, by reason Rushworth alleges no other authority than his own. It is true, he says the copies of these letters were preferred by some who were then at Madrid, but names no body. This made Nalson believe, Rushworth took the letters out of the French Mercury.

I come now to the charge against Rushworth, of inferring in his Collections only what was advantageous to the Parliament, omitting whatever was favorable to the King. Nalson gives three instances in three particular cases.

The first is, that in the affair of imprisoning the Members of Parliament, several of the Judges gave their opinions, to show that the King's conduct was not against Law. Nalson says, Rushworth is contented to mention the Speeches of two Judges, namely, Whitelock's and Doderige's, which were in favour of the King, and to say that Hide and James delivered their opinions to the same purpose. This charge therefore consists, in that Rushworth, after giving the Speeches of two of the Judges, thought not proper to insert those of the rest who were for the King upon the same principles. But Nalson pretends, he should likewise have given Hide's and James's Speeches, and does it himself. Indeed Rushworth may be guilty of some partiality in omitting the two last, if it be true that they are stronger, and better supported than the others, of which I cannot judge.

The second case is, that Rushworth, speaking of Serjeant Apley's Speech in the House of Lords, says, he advanced the following proposition, for which he was committed to custody, and afterwards recanted: That the Lords must allow the King to govern by acts of State, otherwise he is a King without a Council, or a Council without power. Nalson makes it a crime in Rushworth, not to have given Apley's whole discourse, which would have shown that the Serjeant's fault was rather stemming the popular tide, than any other offence; that is, according to Nalson, Apley very justly maintained this maxim, that the King must be allowed to govern by acts of State. Such a charge can do no great injury to Rushworth.

The third case relates to the famous Sir Edward Coke, who, when Judge, was of opinion, that if the Privy Council commit a man, he is not liable by any Court of Justice. But afterwards, being turned out of his office, and chosen Member of Parliament, he maintained the contrary opinion. Nalson accuses Rushworth of concealing this change in Coke, by castrating and abridging his Speeches, for fear his Readers should perceive that Coke, who was odious to the Court, acted out of revenge, in maintaining an opinion contrary to his assertion when Judge.

This is all Rushworth has been charged with. But I question whether the equitable and disinterested will be convinced, that these particular accusations ought to make him forfeit all his credit. His work is in eight volumes in folio.

folio, and contains so great a number of facts, votes, public speeches, and papers of all kinds, that it would be a sort of miracle, to meet with nothing to censure. Nevertheless, all possible endeavours have been used to discredit him; by general charges of partiality, unfaithfulness, and infidelity. And it was this that induced me to say what I have said, and to give the world the most candid account, to which I have been obliged to particular cases.

It is however very certain, that Rushworth's aim and design, was to give the world a true and impartial account of the King's conduct, and to favour the Parliament's cause. But Rushworth's intention signifies nothing, to the knowledge of a man may safely make use of his Collections. The only question is, whether his Papers are true or false. If they are true, however injurious they be to the King's cause, whoever will write an impartial History of this reign, is obliged to resist them for that reason. This is so true, that I have been forced to make use of these Papers (1), and take them for granted, because otherwise it would be impossible to compile the History of this Reign, which consists only of the Materials furnished by Rushworth. Had he begun his Collections no higher than with the affairs of the Parliament, of November the 3d 1640, the King's friends would doubtless have readily forgiven him. But the Papers of the twenty foregoing years are too hard of digestion, because they ill agree with the hypothesis of the royal party, of which I shall speak presently, and too clumsy discovery, that Charles I. designed to introduce arbitrary power, and consequently, the long Parliament had strong reasons to hinder the entire execution of such a design.

I do not see therefore any reason for rejecting the Papers inserted by Rushworth in his Collections, especially as both Parties have equally made use of them; though in a very different manner. Some produce them in favour of the Parliament, and others, to support the King's cause. But even in this, both have owned, they were not only useful, but absolutely necessary. If there are any passages combated as forged, they are very few; and it is strange, that after so many exclamations against Rushworth's concealments and omissions, there appear in the writings of the King's favorites, so few material Papers, that are not in his Collections.

I proceed now to those who writ in vindication of the King's cause, as Franklin, Nelson, and the Earl of Clarendon, omitting the other authors of less note, to avoid being tedious.

These, in compiling the History of this reign, have formed two Systems, directly contrary to those of the friends of the Parliament, though they have made use of Rushworth's materials. As these books were composed at a time when the regal authority was higher than ever, they have not scrupled to build upon the supposition of the King's having an absolute power. Though they use not the word, there is hardly a page in their writings where this principle is not maintained or supposed. Hence it follows, that on the Parliament's side, the civil War was a manifest rebellion. So, the proceedings of the Parliament which some represent as absolutely necessary for the preservation of the Government, are accounted by others as rebellions and treasons, and tending to the subversion of the constitution of the State, without any necessity of discovering the facts.

The second System of the King's party is no less contrary to that of the favorites of the Parliament. These last pretend, that the Parliament being sufficiently convinced by undeniable proofs, of the King's design to establish arbitrary power, and alter the Constitution, thought themselves obliged to use their utmost endeavours to prevent the execution of that project. This was their System. The King's Adherents form another entirely different. They call the King's pretended efforts to establish an arbitrary Government, a chimera, affirming what was termed absolute power, was precisely what the Laws allowed the King. Indeed this was the principle of James I. Charles I. Charles II. and James II. Consequently, they pretended, that to hinder the King from exercising such a power, was opposing the Laws of the Land. But as it evidently appeared in the reign of Charles I. that the Parliament and the people were not of this opinion, it was necessary to give some place to the friends of the King, who contented in the State of that Reign. This, and the like efforts, and the like, which with the assistance of the King's court, were the basis and foundation of the arbitrary power, and the like, the opposition, King Charles I. and his party, did from the people's belief, that the King's power was the bounds of his power, but from a passion for power, to alter the constitution of the State. That for the persons, authors of this project, saw the King's design upon that head, and judged there was no other way to execute it, than by ruining the King, and depriving him of his prerogatives. That to this end, they introduced into the mouth of the Parliament and Nation, groundless suspicions and jealousies, which they took care to cherish by all imaginable means. They came at length to an entire breach, and a war which proved so fatal to the King, and more than any other cause, his Predecessors, on the side of the Church of England.

The main in these two Systems is, not matter, contains the whole truth. The Parliament's System ascribes all the proceedings of both Houses, solely to the design of redressing past grievances, and preventing an arbitrary Government. 'Tis however certain, that several Members of both Houses joined, with that design, the alteration of the Government of the Church, which could not be done but by the King's consent. The System of the Royalists has the same fault; it is impossible to the Parliament but one single view, namely, to alter the government of the Church, and counting as nothing the design to prevent the establishing of absolute Power, they pretend it was only a contrivance, or excuse, to arrive with more ease to the principal end, which was to establish Presbyterian Government.

After having thus shown these two different Systems, I think it needless to explain particularly, in what manner Franklin, Nelson, and the Earl of Clarendon, apply theirs to the facts agreed on by all. I shall content myself with observing, that they miss no occasion to combat the principles of the Parliament, or to impute to them, motives entirely different from those they pretended to act by. Herein their aim was to hinder their Readers from being prepossessed with a belief, that the Parliament intended the good of their Country, or had any other views than those they ascribe to them.

It is easy to perceive by what has been said, how the Historians of the Reign of Charles I. may be different, nay, contrary, according as the authors have closely followed one or other of these two Systems. And this is what has actually happened. The Historians of the two Parties, though founded upon the same facts, are so opposite to one another, that a Reader, who is not very attentive, or wants leisure to examine what is proposed to him, knows not where he is, when he sees this disagreement.

For my part, who am not engaged in either of the parties, and aim only at truth, I don't think my self obliged blindly to follow one or other of the two Systems; but have established a third, composed of both, by supplying their defects. I leave it to the Reader to judge, whether it be sufficiently coherent, to give him a distinct knowledge of the affairs of this Reign. If I sometimes seem to incline to one side, it is because I have no reason to swerve from the truth, and am persuaded, that the King and the Parliament were both very much in the wrong, though not always, nor on the same occasions.

This has induced me to cite, throughout the History of this Reign, scarce any author but Rushworth, though no Reign has more writers. My reason was, because Rushworth has formed no System, but contented himself with furnishing materials common to both parties, and of which both have made great use. But though I have carefully read and collected the works of Franklin, Nelson, and the Earl of Clarendon, I did not think proper to quote them, because they scarce let facts or paper pass, without applying it to their System, which is not always agreeable to mine. It would therefore very much embarrass the Reader, to quote, in proof of what I advance, facts or papers that are always followed with reasonings, often directly contrary to my System. I thought proper to say thus much in justification of the manner in which I have composed the History of this Reign (2).

(1) As particularly Nelson himself, and Franklin; the main of whose Collections is taken out of Rushworth.

(2) It does not appear that Rapin ever saw Whitlock's Memorials, of which, doubtless, he would have made great use, since they contain many things that are of great use to us, in giving us a more precise and accurate view of the reign of Charles I. than as a Book for his Memory and private use, he had not any temptations to pervert, nor can be well suspected of a design to favour a Party. His Book is useful, as Whitlock's is useful, and the Party more likely to follow the truth, than the truth to follow any one side in King Charles I. Whitlock's Memorials, containing a full and true account of the English affairs, as they came out of the King's mouth, and as they were passed from the beginning of the reign of Charles I. to the death of Charles I. though it is much the Author upon the stage during all the time of action, that the particulars of his Diary go very far towards a perfect History of those times.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK XX.

The Second Part of the Reign of CHARLES I.

1640.
Nov. 3.
State of the King's Affairs.

HE King's affairs, at the meeting of the Parliament, were in a very ill situation. Instead of subduing the Scots, as he flattered himself, he had the mortification to see them enter England, force the passage of the Tyne, defeat a considerable body of his army, and render themselves masters of Newcastle. Moreover, he saw his own troops not very ready to serve him. They consisted, for the most part, of soldiers lifted against their wills, in the several Counties, and prejudiced, like the rest of the nation, against the Government. Besides, the valour of the Scots being magnified by those who had been routed, and by the King's private enemies, inspired the English troops with some terror. Moreover, the King wanted money to pay them. His whole resource was the two hundred thousand pounds borrowed of the city of London, till it should please the Parliament to furnish him with the necessary supplies. But he could hardly expect that the Parliament would be favorable to him. It was universally believed, he had called it against his inclination, and because he could find no other way to free himself from his present circumstances. What had passed in the four Parliaments held since the beginning of his reign, the dissolutions of these Parliaments, with heat and animosity, the imprisonment of their Members, the discontinuance of Parliaments for twelve years, the taxes imposed by the King's sole authority during that space, the monopolies upon all sorts of goods and commodities, the decay of trade; the open protection granted by the King to the Papists and Arminians, the severities exercised upon the Presbyterians, the innovations in Religion, the almost universal suspicion of a design to introduce Popery, the excessive authority usurped by the Council and Star-Chamber, the corruption of the Judges, in a word, the principles of arbitrary Power asserted by the Court, bred a general discontent. The King was not ignorant of it, and till now had disregarded it. But he began to dread the consequences, when he saw himself upon the point of being exposed to the ill humour of a new Parliament, who, probably, would not lose the opportunity of labouring the redress of grievances, which the former Parliaments had in vain demanded. Nevertheless, he was so prejudiced and exasperated against the Scots, that he still hoped the new Parliament would look upon their entrance into England as an invasion, as a war made, not upon the King, but the Kingdom, and would furnish the means to drive them into their country, and chastise their audaciousness. But it was not long before he perceived his hopes were ill grounded.

The Parliament met the 3d of November, according to the King's writs. There had never been a more numerous assembly, very few Members being absent (1). Every one looked upon this as the fairest opportunity that could possibly offer, to cure the evils of the Kingdom; and all the Members, except such as were entirely devoted to the King, were ready to contribute to the restoring of the Government to its true and antient constitution. Accordingly this was what the People expected. On the first day, the King made the following Speech to both Houses.

My Lords,

THE knowledge I had of the desires of my Scottish Subjects, was the cause of my calling the last assembly of Parliament: wherein had I been believed, I sincerely think that things had not fallen out as now we see. But it is no wonder, that men are so slow to believe that so great a sedition should be raised on so little ground. But now, my Lords and Gentlemen, the honour and safety of this Kingdom lying so near at

(1) Dr. Welwood affirms, That no Age ever produced greater Men than those that sat in this Parliament Admirer, p. 42.

"I stake, I am resolved to put my self freely and clearly on the love and affection of my English Subjects, as of these of my Lords that did wait on me at York, very well remember I there declared.

"Therefore, my Lords, I shall not mention my own interest, or that support I might justly expect from you, till the common safety be secured; though I must tell you, I am not ashamed to say, those charges I have been at have been merely for the security and good of this Kingdom; though the success hath not been answerable to my desires: Therefore I shall only desire you to consider the best way both for the safety and security of this Kingdom; wherein there are two parts chiefly considerable. First, the chafing out of Rebels (1). And secondly, that other, in satisfying your just grievances, wherein I promise you to concur so heartily and clearly with you, that all the world may see my intentions have ever been and shall be to make this a glorious and flourishing Kingdom. There are only two things that I shall mention to you: The one is to tell you, that the loan of money which I lately had from the city of London, wherein the Lords that waited on me at York assisted me, will only maintain my army for two months, from the beginning of that time it was granted. Now, my Lords and Gentlemen, I leave it to your considerations, what dishonour and mischief it might be, in case for want of money my army be disbanded before the rebels be put out of this Kingdom. Secondly, the securing against the Calamities the northern people endure at this time, and so long as the treaty is on foot: And in this, I say, not only they, but all this Kingdom will suffer the harm: Therefore I leave this also to your consideration, for the ordering of those great affairs, whereof you are to treat at this Time. I am so confident of your love to me, and that your care is for the honour and safety of the Kingdom, that I shall freely and willingly leave to you where to begin. Only this, that you may the better know the state of all the affairs, I have commanded my Lord-Keeper to give you a short and free account of those things that have happened in this interim, with this protestation, that if this account be not satisfactory as it ought to be, I shall, whensoever you desire, give you a full and perfect account of every particular. One thing more I desire of you, as one of the greatest means to make this a happy Parliament, that you on your parts, as I on mine, lay aside all suspicion one of another; for, as I promised my Lords at York, it shall not be my fault, if this be not a happy and good Parliament."

After the King had done speaking, the Lord-Keeper Finch made his Speech. He began with encomiums of the King and Queen, and then endeavoured to persuade the two Houses, that the calling of the Parliament was wholly owing to his Majesty, who had resolved it, before he received any Petition on that subject (2). After that, he strove to show, though in a very general manner, that the Scots had violated the late treaty, and the King, against his will, taken arms by the unanimous advice of his Council, to reduce them to obedience. He concluded with informing both Houses, of what had passed as well in the beginning of the war as in the conferences at Rippon.

The Commons being returned to their House, chose for Speaker William Lenthall a Benchet of Lincoln's-Inn, who was proposed by Sir Henry Vane Secretary of State (3). This choice being approved by the King, they appointed, according to custom, a committee to examine all questions that might arise about elections, returns, or other Privileges of the House. Then it was resolved, that a Committee of the whole House should meet on certain days of the week, for these five principal heads, namely, for Religion, Grievances, Courts of Justice, Trade, and Ireland. These were the articles which chiefly occasioned the Nation's complaints and murmurs, and the Commons thereby evidently discovered their intentions.

As from the 3d of November 1640, to the 25th of August 1642, the History of this Reign wholly consists of Parliamentary transactions, I think it necessary before all things to give a description of this Parliament, and of the different Parties into which it was divided. It will afterwards be more easy to perceive the motives of its ads and resolves, and withal, the true grounds of the Civil War that afflicted England.

First, it is certain there was hardly a Member of either House but what was disposed to procure the redress of the grievances so long complained of. These grievances were so manifest, that it was almost impossible, without subverting the constitution of the Government, to find plausible reasons to justify the King's and the Ministry's conduct, during the fifteen foregoing years. They were of such a nature, that no man was free from them, not even those who served for instruments to impose them on the people, though they were in great measure indemnified some other way. In short, they were of such consequence, that admitting the principles whereon they were founded, the necessary result was a total subversion of the Government; and an arbitrary Power unknown to the English for many ages. It may therefore be affirmed, that from the very beginning of this Parliament, the general sentiment of both Houses was, that the present opportunity of applying proper remedies to the evils of the Kingdom was not to be neglected.

But the Members were divided upon a principal point, which however flowed from the general disposition. Some were of opinion, that after all the grievances were redressed, the Government should be restored to its natural state, such as it was before the reigns of James and Charles, without any additions or alterations. Others, on the contrary, thought, that after the redress of grievances it would be necessary to use some effectual method, to put it out of the King's power ever to invade the liberties of the People, and the Privileges of the Parliament. But these carefully concealed their intentions, lest they should give occasion to the others to suspect a design to alter the established Government, and cause them to oppose even the most reasonable things, out of fear of the consequences. They hoped to find or start in time opportunities enough to inspire the whole Nation with a distrust of the King; and by that means to accomplish their ends.

Such being the general disposition of the Parliament, it is evident, the entrance of the Scots into England was to be deemed a very considerable advantage, granted to the English by Providence, to hinder the King from breaking the measures which might be taken against him. The King was under an absolute necessity to maintain an army for his defence against the Scots, without having for that purpose other means than the assistance of the Parliament. For the times being changed, the imposing of arbitrary taxes could not be practised any longer, upon which, probably, he had depended in the beginning of the war, since, in a month after taking the field, he was destitute of money to pay his troops. So, it was the Parliament's interest to keep the King in this necessity, that he might not be able to oppose the resolutions of the two Houses. It is not therefore to be thought strange, that the Parliament did not much attend to what the King most desired, namely, to be enabled to drive the Scots out of the Kingdom, since, on the contrary, the presence of the Scots gave the two Houses a superiority they were unwilling to lose.

The sentiments of the Parliament were also very various with respect to Religion. There were in the Houses rigid Episcopals, who believed Bishops essential to Religion, and that without them there was no lawful Ordination, nor consequently any valid administration of the Sacraments. Of this number were the Bishops, and almost all the King's party. There were moderate Episcopals, who being sincerely attached to the Church of England, had however different ideas of Episcopacy. They had a veneration for Episcopal Government, as being very ancient in the Church, and what they most liked. But though they had no design to alter it, they did not think it, however, so absolutely necessary, but that Religion might well subsist under any other kind of Government. This was the prevailing opinion, and espoused by a majority in both Houses. Wherefore it may be said, that in the beginning of this Parliament, the Members in general had no intention to attack the government of the Church, established in England since the Reformation.

But there was in the two Houses another party more powerful by the ability of their Leaders than by their number. I mean that of the Presbyterians, who were divided also into moderate and rigid. The former had no other view, than to obtain some liberty and security against persecution. The latter were of a different stamp. They considered Episcopal Government as repugnant to the word of God, and the jurisdiction of the Bishops as a real tyranny. These were the particular objects of the hatred of the King, Ministry, Bishops, and most of the Clergy, because their principles tended to the utter ruin of the Church of England. For that reason, they believed there was no safety for them, but in an entire change of Episcopal into Presbyterian Government. But they easily perceived, that to attain their ends, the King was to be disabled to oppose them, knowing, that as long as it was in his power, he would never consent to this change. Their number was however so inconsiderable, that they would have made no figure in the Parliament, had they not been supported by the Scots, whose aid they could not be without. Moreover, among these rigid Presbyterians, lay concealed a certain set of men, known afterwards by the name of Independents, who held concerning civil, as well as ecclesiastical, Government, uncommon opinions, which they took care not to explain, till they found occasion to publish them. They were contented for some years, to conceal themselves among the rigid Presbyterians, in order, at a proper time, to accomplish their designs more effectually. It was the particular interest of these men to manage, that the government of the State should be changed, rather overthrown, well knowing their party could never subsist but in anarchy. And therefore, without discovering their intentions, they improved all occasions to sow and cherish discord between the King and the Parliament. The whole Presbyterian party was directed by the heads of the Rigids and Independents, men of great parts, who, without discovering themselves more than was necessary, seemed to confine their designs to the redress of grievances, which was the general aim of the Parliament, and wherein almost all were united. They found a double advantage in this conduct. First, they removed all suspicion of their intending to change the government of Church or State, and without preventing the union of the other Members, who would not have failed to unite, in order to oppose such a change. The second advantage was, that by being solely intent at first upon the redress of grievances, they had frequent occasions of exclaiming against the King's former administration, and fomenting the Parliament's distrust and jealousy of him. For it was by that chiefly they hoped to be able to execute their projects.

(1) That is, the Scots. Some exception being taken at the King's calling them Rebels, he explained and justified that expression in a Speech to the Lords, November 5. See Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 17. Wentworth, p. 58.

(2) And yet the Lord Clerendon ascribes the calling the Parliament to the advice of the great Council of Peers at York. Rapin.

(3) The Lord Clerendon says, the King designed Sir Thomas Gardiner, Recorder of London, to be speaker. But he could not get himself elected for London, nor any other Burrough. And so we see, if it be true as Wentworth says, that such a spirit of opposition to the Court proceedings, was in the Hearts and Actions of most of the People, that very few of that Party had the favour to be chosen Members of this Parliament. Clerendon; Tom. 1. p. 15. Wentworth, p. 37.

Such being the disposition of the Parliament, it is easy to perceive the reason why the Commons were so intent at first upon the redress of grievances, as well publick as private. A great number of Petitions upon that subject were presented to them, within a few days after their meeting. Many Members were likewise charged with the like Petitions from their Burroughs and Shires, and several very mortifying Speeches to the King and his Ministers were made in the House (1). Of all these Speeches, I shall insert only one, wherein are enumerated all the publick grievances, of which the People thought to have reason to complain. It is that of Mr. Pym, Member of Parliament for Tavistock in the County of Devon (2).

Mr. Speaker,

TO redress grievances will not hinder, but further the service of the King: To take away the weights, does as much advantage motion, as to add weights.

I shall, 1. instance several heads of those grievances we labour under. 2. Demonstrate them to be as hurtful to the King, as to the People. 3. That the remedies will prove equally good to both of them.

The King can do no wrong; the Law casts all mis-carriages upon the Ministers: Thus the influence of heaven conveyeth vigour into subinary creatures; but the malignity of all epidemical diseases, proceedeth from the ill-affected qualities of the earth or air.

There are a threefold sort of grievances: 1. Some against the privilege of Parliament: 2. Others to the prejudice of Religion: 3. Some against the liberty of the Subject. For the first, the Members are free from arrests; to have liberty of Speech; a legislative, judiciary, and conciliatory Power; being the same to the body politic, as the faculties of the soul to a man.

These privileges have been broken: 1. In restraining the Members from speaking. 2. In forbidding the Speaker to put a question; both of these practised in the last Parliament. 3. By imprisoning divers Members for matters done in Parliament. 4. By proceedings against them for the same in the inferior Courts. 5. Enjoining them to give security for their good behaviour, and continuing them in prison, even to the death. 6. In abrupt dissolutions of Parliament: the great grievance; like the execution of a man, without being heard: It receives a being by the summons, and a civil death by dissolution; not only thereby to die, but to be made intestates, incapable of making their wills, the good acts that they were about.

The second is, encouragement of Popery: 1. By suspension of Laws against them: Now it is certain, there can be no security from Papists, but in their disability; their principles are incompatible with any other Religion; Laws will not restrain them, nor Oaths: for the Pope dispenseth with both; and his command adds them against the realm in spirituals and temporals, in ordine ad Spiritualia. Henry the Third, and Henry the Fourth of France, were no Protestants, yet were murdered because they tolerated Reformation. 2. By allowing them places of trust and honour in the Commonwealth. 3. Their free resort to London, and to the Court; to communicate their counsels and designs, diving into the secrets of State. 4. That as they have a congregation of Cardinals at Rome, for advancing the Pope's authority in England; so have they a Nuncio here, for the execution thereof.

Then as to Innovations of Religion introduced 1. Maintenance of popish Tenets, in books, sermons, and disputations. 2. Practice of popish Ceremonies countenanced and enjoined, as altars, images, crucifixes, bowings, &c. These I may in some respect compare to the dry bones in Ezekiel, which first came together, then sinews and flesh came upon them, afterwards the skin covered them, and then breath and life was put into them, so first the form, then the spirit and life of Popery was to come amongst us. 3. Preferment of persons popishly affected. 4. The discouragements of Protestants, by over-rigid prosecutions of the scrupulous for things indifferent: No vice made so great as Inconformity; by punishing without law, for not reading the Book for Sunday recreations; for not removing the Communion-table otherwise; for not coming to the Rails to receive the Communion; for preaching on the Lord's-day in the afternoon; for Catechising otherwise than as in the short Catechism in the Common-Prayer-Book. 5. By encroachment of ecclesiastical Jurisdiction; particularly, 1. In fining and imprisoning without law. 2. Challenging their jurisdiction to be appropriated to their order Jure divino. 3. Contriving and publishing new articles of visitation, new Canons; and the boldness of Bishops, and their subordinate officers and officials.

As to the third sort of grievances, I shall observe rather the order of time when they were added, than the consequence; but when we come to the cure, it will be best to begin with the most important.

There is first, Tunnage and Poundage, and the late new book of Rates taken by prerogative, without grant of Parliament; from whence these inconveniences follow: 1. Mens goods are seized, their suits kept. 2. Misemployment of the sums of money imposed; for though intended for the guard of the Seas, they are disposed to other uses, and a new tax raised for the same purpose. 3. The burthen excessive, trade hindered, home-commodities abated, and foreign inbanded; by which means the stock of the Kingdom is diminished, especially inportable to the poor planters in America, by the tax upon Tobacco.

There is Composition for Knighthood; which though it refers to a former custom, yet upon the same grounds, the King may renew it by a new fine, immolate multiplication of distress and issues, and enforce them to compound with the commissioners. An inundation of Monopolies undertaken by Papists, and full of mischief. 1st. By impeding the goodness, and hindering the price of Salt, Soap, Beers, Coals, &c. 2dly, under colour of which, trade was restrained to a few hands. 3dly, Many persons thereupon illegally imprisoned.

But the great and unparalleled grievance is the Ship-Money, being aggravated, not supported by the judgment, which is not grounded upon Law, custom, precedent or authority: It being improper for a case of necessity; and abounding in variety of mischief. As 1st, The general extent to all persons, all times, and the Subject left remediless. 2dly, The arbitrary proportion without limits. 3dly, Imposed by writ, and disposed by instructions. Improper, for the office of a Sheriff in the Inland Counties, and inconvenient for the inhabitants; without rule or suitable means for the levying or managing of it.

The enlargements of Forests, beyond the bounds of the Statutes, 27 and 28 Edw. 1. which perambulations then were the cause of that famous Charta de Foresta; And now reviving these old questions, new disputes may follow, and particular obliquities we may already observe, and surreptitious proceedings, as in Exfix; yet

(1) Arthur Capel (afterwards Lord Capel) presented a Petition for Justification, Sir John Puckering & W^m West, Sir John C^t & W^m West, Sir Philip Mordaunt for Wiltshire, Sir Francis Seymour for Wilt, (the names afterwards for the King Henry Bishops, and Ferdinand L^{ts} of the Abbey, Sir Edmund Mansfield for North, Sir Thomas Barrington for Essex, William Piers for the See, Sir Guy Palmer for Buckingham, &c.)

(2) Pym by mistake has inserted in his History Mr. Pym's Speech, which he spoke the 17th of Apr. 1621. I find it in Reynolds's 1. 1. p. 24. Wherefore the Translator has inserted the true Speech, as it is found in Reynolds's 1. 1. p. 24.

1640. "that verdict was entered in other Counties, and a judgment upon the matter after three or four hundred years quiet possession of the Subject, who thereupon is forced to compound for great fines.

"The felling of nufance: The King as a father of the Commonwealth, is to take care of the publick commodities and advantages of the Subjects, as rivers, highways, and common-fewers, by ordinary writs, Ad quod damnum: But now by a course extrajudicial, by enforcing compositions: so then, if really it be a nufance that is compounded for, 'tis an hurt to the People; if no nufance, then 'tis a grand prejudice to the party.

"The Commission for Buildings about London, was presented as a grievance in the time of King James; now much more increased, and much more prejudicial.

"The commission for Depopulations began some few years since; by both these commissions, the Subject is restrained from disposing of his own; demolishing their houses, punishing and fining their persons for that, for which they are still liable by law; for the King cannot licence a nufance; and although these are nufances, yet it is of ill consequence to be compounded for, and make a precedent for Kings to licence such things as are nufances indeed.

"Military charges ought not to be laid upon the People by warrant of the King's hand, nor by letters of the Council-table, nor by order of the Lords Lieutenants of Counties, nor their deputies. It began to be practised as a loan for supply of Coat and Conduct Money in Queen Elizabeth's time, with promise to be re-paid it, as appears by a Constat-warrant in the Exchequer, and certain payments: But now a-days never re-paid. The first particular brought into a Tax was, the Muster-Master's Wages; which being but for a small sum, was generally digested: Yet in the last Parliament, it was designed to be remedied. But now there follows pressing of men against their wills, or to find others. 2dly, Provisions for publick magazines for powder, spades, and pickaxes. 3dly, Salary of officers, cart-horses, carts, and such like.

"The extrajudicial declarations of Judges without hearing of counsel or argument: A teeming grievance, productive of many others.

"Monopolies countenanced by the Council-table, and the clause in their patents of monopolies, commanding the Justices of Peace to assist them; whereby the great abilities of that honourable Board, receive a stain by such matters of so mean a report in the estimation of the law, so ill in the apprehension of the People.

"The High-Court of Star-Chamber, called in the Parliament Rolls Magnum Concilium, to which the Parliaments were wont to refer such matters as they had not time to determine: A court erected against oppression, a court of councils, and a court of justice, now an instrument of erecting and defending monopolies, to set a face of publick good on things pernicious.

"That great and most eminent power of the King in Edicts and Proclamations, called Leges Temporis, used heretofore to encounter with sudden and unexpected danger, till the Great Council of the King could be called, hath of late been exercised for injoining and maintaining monopolies. But the last and greatest grievance leads us a step higher, even as high as heaven, as the throne of God, his word and truth. The ambitious and corrupt Clergy, preaching down the laws of God, and liberties of the Kingdom; pretending divine authority and absolute power in the King, to do what he will with us; and this preaching is the highway to preferment; as one Manwaring sentenced in the former Parliament for this doctrine, then a Doctor, is now become a Bishop. The intermission of Parliaments contrary to the statute, whereby they are to be called once a Year, is the main cause of all these and other mischiefs, to which Parliaments give remedy.

"These grievances are as well hurtful to the King as to the Subjects, by interrupting their communion; they have need of his general pardon, and to be secured from Projectors and Informers: to be freed from obnoxious laws, and from the subtle devices of such who seek to straiten the Prerogative to their own private advantage, and the publick hurt; and the King hath need of them for Counsel, for support. Queen Elizabeth's victorious attempts, were for the most part carried on upon the Subjects purses, and not upon her own; though the honour and profit were hers. These discontentments at "home diminish the King's Reputation abroad; and disadvantage his treaties, and weaken his party beyond sea; by encouraging Popery; by forcing the Subjects to leave the Kingdom, to the prejudice of the King's customs and subsidies. As for instance, divers Clothiers forced away, who set up their manufacture abroad to the hurt of the Kingdom.

"The King hath received upon the monopoly of Wines, thirty thousand pounds per Ann. The vintner pays forty shillings per tun, which comes to ninety thousand pounds; the price upon the Subject by retail is increased two-pence a quart, which comes to eight pounds a tun, and so forty five thousand tun brought in yearly, amounts to three hundred sixty thousand pounds; which is three hundred and thirty thousand pounds lost to the Kingdom, above the King's receipt.

"Now the remedies, and removing these grievances, consist of two main branches, in declaring the Law where 'tis doubtful, and in providing for the execution of the Law where it is clear. But these I refer to a further time, and for the present advise speedily to desire a conference with the Lords touching grievances; and always to humble our selves for God's assistance."

As Mr. Pym, who spoke this Speech, was one of the leading men in the House of Commons, he was extremely applauded, and the more, that in giving a summary of all the publick grievances, he had not used any disrespectful terms against the King or his Ministers. This Speech was followed with another by Sir Benjamin Rudyard, who to intimate that there was a settled design to introduce Popery and arbitrary Power into England, expressed himself after this manner:

They have so brought it to pass, that under the name of Expressions Puritans, all our Religion is branded; and under a few hard words against Jesuits, all Popery is countenanced. Whosoever squares his actions by any rule either divine or human, he is a Puritan; whosoever would be governed by the King's Laws, he is a Puritan; he that will not do whatsoever other men would have him do, he is a Puritan: their great work, their master-piece, now, is to make all those of the Religion, to be the suspected party of the Kingdom.

These Speeches were seconded with so great a Number of Complaints and Petitions concerning grievances both publick and private, that the House was divided into above forty Committees upon this single article, according to the different nature of the complaints. But before the particular examination of these grievances was begun, the Commons thought fit to desire the concurrence of the Lords to move the King, that he would be pleased to appoint a Fast, which met with no opposition either from the Lords or the King (1). Then they appointed a Committee to examine what number of Papists were in and about London, and how they were armed. As the King [by a message] had acquainted them with his design to publish a Proclamation against Recufants, this Committee was empowered to examine the same after the publication, and see how it was executed.

Two days after, on the 9th of November, the House going upon the grievances, the Lord Digby, son of the Earl of Bristol, made on that subject a Speech, which he concluded with this motion, That a select Committee may State of the Kingdom. be appointed to draw out of all that has been complained of, such a Remonstrance as may be a faithful and lively representation to his Majesty of the deplorable estate of the Kingdom (2). Very probably, this motion had been resolved among the Leaders, because they were apprehensive of the King's opposing the redress of grievances, and because in that case it was requisite to show the People the necessity of this redress, by informing them wherein consisted the grievances of the Nation. The Lord Digby's motion being approved, the House appointed a Committee of twenty-four to prepare the Remonstrance. But because the King showed greater condescension than was expected, this Remonstrance was not drawn till above a year after, and upon another occasion.

[Sir John Culpeper] one of the Members who had spoken upon the grievances, having chiefly insisted on monopolies, it was voted, that all such Members as directly or indirectly had any share in, or benefit from, any project or monopoly, should be disabled to sit in the House, and that Mr. Speaker should issue out writs to chuse others in their room. There were afterwards four expelled the House upon that account (3).

During the four or five first days, the House of Commons was almost wholly employed in receiving Petitions and Complaints, as well from private persons, as from boroughs and shires. Amongst the private Petitions, the most remarkable were those of Eastwick, Burton, Pryn (1), Lilburn, Leighon, Jennings, Smart (2). These men complained of the exorbitant pains and penalties inflicted on them by the Star-Chamber and High-Commission. As I intend not to dwell upon the affairs of private persons, I shall only say, that within the space of about a year, the Commons found time to examine all these sentences one after another, and to punish the Members of the Star-Chamber, who had given their votes, by condemning them to pay all the costs and damages to the parties. The reparations to Eastwick, Pryn, and Burton, were fixed to above four thousand pounds each (3). All the other complaints of private persons, whether against the Courts of Justice, or the Star Chamber and High-Commission, or certain Bishops and Deans, who laboured more than the rest, to introduce innovations in Religion, were heard. The Commons took a pleasure to mortify in their turn, those who had stretched the Prerogative Royal, in persecuting the Puritans, or rather such as did not bear the yoke patiently, who were confounded, under that name, with the Presbyterians.

If the Commons endeavoured to do justice to private persons, who had suffered any injury during the first fifteen years of this Reign, it may well be imagined, they neglected not to redress the grievances of the whole Nation. This was their principal business during the first year of their Session. Though the Parliament was composed of several parties, who had not all the same views, they were, however, united with respect to the redress of grievances. Even those Members who were most devoted to the King, durst not oppose the general sentiment, some because they thought the thing just, others, not to lose their labour, and for fear of rendering themselves too suspected.

Among those who had most contributed to the publick mischief, the Archbishop of Canterbury was considered as one of the chief and most worthy of punishment, as being author of the innovations in the Church, promoter of the war with Scotland, persecutor of the Presbyterians, and head of the Arminians. The Earl of Strafford was likewise of this number, because he had so entirely devoted himself to the King, that in his two great offices of President of the Court of York, and Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, he had no other view than to stretch the Prerogative Royal, and increase the King's revenues. His proud and haughty carriage had no less offended the publick than his actions, whereby he strove to establish an arbitrary power. He was accused of advising the King to transport his Irish army into England, to subdue the opposers of his will. Though he was highly in the King's favour, he had nevertheless made himself many enemies at Court, and in the Kingdom, who earnestly sought occasions to ruin him. The Lord Keeper Fineh, was looked upon also as a pernicious Counsellor, wholly devoted to the King, and ready for any attempt, to establish a despotick Government. It was not doubted, but he was the man that had corrupted the Judges in the business of Ship-Money. Sir Francis Windbank, Secretary of State, was reckoned the patron of the Catholics, and it was by his means that the condemned Priests and Jesuits escaped one way or other the sentence passed upon them. In short, the Judges of the realm had rendered themselves extremely odious to the People, as well by the judgment they had given in Mr. Hampden's affair, as by numberless other acts of injustice to private persons. These were the principal authors of the grievances, whom the Commons intended to bring to exemplary punishment.

The Earl of Strafford was the first on whom the storm fell. The 11th of November, eight days after the opening of the Parliament, Mr. Pym, having desired, and obtained his desire of the Commons, that the doors of the House might be lock-

(1) See an account of the severe punishment of these three Persons above, p. 402. Note (2). They were now, by order of Parliament, brought from their several places of Confinement to London. Pryn and Burton landing at the same time, viz. November 28, at Southampton, were received with extraordinary demonstrations of respect, and had their Charges bore, and liberal presents given them. This Method and Ceremony kept them Company all their Journey, and to maintain their respect, upon their approach to London, that they were carried into the City by above ten thousand persons, with Boughs and Flowers in their hands.

(2) Leighon a Physician, Father of Dr. Leighon Archbishop of Glasgow, for writing a Book called Sion's Plea against Prelacy, (wherein he advised the Parliament to kill all the Bishops, by smiting them under the fifth rib, and raised against the Queen, calling her a Consort and Adulteress), was thrown into a new Prison, fined ten thousand pounds, hood in the Pillory twice, having one ear cut off, one Nostril slit, and one Cheek fired, with thirty six Lashes each time. Whitelock, p. 45. — Alexander Jennings of Buckinghamshire, for refusing to pay Ship-Money, was imprisoned in the Fleet, by Warrant of the Council, without any Cause expressed, and the Court of King's Bench had refused to discharge or bail him when brought thither by Habash Corps. — Peter Smart Canon of Durham, having in 1628, printed two Sermons against Innovations in the Church of Durham, by Dr. Cyffin, was by the High Commission of York deprived of his Prebend and Living, fined 500*l*. and imprisoned many years. Raffsworth.

(3) Nalson pretends, that the Sentence in the Star-Chamber against Burton was not only just, but that he deserved even death, if he had not had to do with the most meritorious of Kings. Rapin.

(4) Mr. Pym, Mr. Arden, Mr. St. John, the Lord Digby, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir Walter Earl, and Mr. Hampden. Raffsworth, Tom. 4. p. 43. Whitelock says, it was considered at York, whether the Earl should repair to the House, or continue in the North with the Army. The Earl humbly desired his Majesty to excuse his going to the Parliament, alleging, He should not be able to do him any service there, but rather be a means to hinder his Affairs, and besides, in case they should fall upon a him, he being at a distance, might the better retire from danger, &c. The King, notwithstanding all he could say, insisted upon the Earl's coming up to Parliament, and told him, As he was King of England, he was able to secure him from any danger, and the Parliament should not touch the bare of his head. So in obedience to the King's Commands, the Earl came to London, but not, as Rapin says, the same day he was impeached, but a few days before, Whitelock, p. 37. The Lord Clarendon says, it was believed he came to the House that day, to accuse the Lord Say, and some others, or having induced the Scots to invade the Kingdom. Vol. 1. p. 139. Heylin's Observ. p. 211.

(5) Sir Francis Windbank had been Lord's Chaplain, and was by his recommendation, made Secretary on June 25, 1632. Lord's Diary. In his Letter to the Earl of Portland are these words, What I am guilty of none know so well as I myself, whom I have served faithfully, diligently, painfully, and with as true and loyal a heart, according to my poor abilities, as any other subject ever. Nalson, Tom. 1. p. 624.

ed, and the outward room cleared of strangers, informed them, that there were several complaints against the Earl of Strafford, which afforded good ground to accuse him of High-Treason. Upon this information, the House immediately appointed a Committee of seven (4), who withdrawing into another room, and conferring together, reported, presently after, that it was their opinion, there was just cause to impeach the Earl of Strafford. Then Mr. Pym was ordered to go to the House of Lords, and accuse the Earl of High-Treason, in the name of all the Commons. He had orders likewise to tell the Lords, that in due time the Commons would produce the articles of accusation, and in the mean time, desired the accused might be put into safe custody. The Earl of Strafford was that very day come from the army, and had taken his place in the House of Lords. Before his departure from the army, he had received notice that there was a design to attack him. But whether through pride, or a belief that having done nothing without the King's warrant, he was secure, he slighted the advice, and would be present in the Parliament. Indeed, some months before, the King's protection was more than sufficient to screen him from all danger. But the face of affairs was altered, and it is strange a person of so great a genius, and so good sense, could imagine the King was able to protect him in such a juncture (5). However this be, upon the Commons impeachment, the Lords committed him to the custody of the Black-Rod, and some days after sent him to the Tower. As this affair was prolonged till May the next year, I shall not speak of it, till I come to the time of this famous trial, and shall continue to relate, without interruption, what concerns the redress of grievances, and the punishment or accusation of their authors.

Secretary Windbank was attacked next. Several Petitions were presented against him to the House, whereof he was Member, complaining, that as Secretary of State, he had issued out warrants under his own hand, for the discharge of prosecutions against Priests, and for their release out of prison. All these Petitions tended to show, that he lost no opportunity to countenance the Papists, and gloried in being reckoned their patron. I do not know whether he professed the Roman Catholic Religion. Be this as it will, he was summoned several times to come to the House, and answer what was laid to his charge. But he believed it more proper to avoid the impending storm, and withdrew into France. When he was out of danger, he sent the Earl of Pembroke, Lord-Chamberlain, a letter, lamenting his misfortune, and intimating, that if he was guilty, it was only for having served the King faithfully, and obeyed his orders (6).

The Convocation, their Canons, Oath, and the Tax they had laid upon the Clergy to aid the King in his war with Scotland, were next taken into consideration by the House. This affair was debated with great warmth. Several Members made, on this occasion, Speeches, tending to show, the King could not, by his authority, turn the Convocation into a Synod. They alleged for reason, that the Clergy who composed it, could act but as members of the Convocation, because to act as Members of a Synod, they ought to have been elected by the People, and it did not belong to the King to make this election as he pleased. That the Convocation or Synod had not power to make Canons for the whole Nation, without the consent of the People themselves, nor consequently without the intervention of the Parliament. That most of the Canons were unjust in themselves, and tended to increase the Clergy's power, to the prejudice of the King's authority, and the People's liberties. That by these Canons the Convocation assumed a power above the Parliament. That the Oath they had imposed was strange, doubtful, contrary to the privileges of the Parliament, and the rights of the People, and obliged men to swear as necessary, things that were al-

1640. terrible, without any danger to Religion. For instance, supposing it true, that Bishops are Jure Divino, which the Church of England never acknowledged (1), it could not be dissolved, because Bishops, Deans, and Archdeacons, are of divine or apostolical institution, and yet people were made to swear, never to consent to the altering of the government of the Church by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c. That by this oath, the representatives of the Nation would be so tied up, that though the Parliament should have power to alter the government of the Church, they could not even debate upon that subject, by reason of their oath. Upon these and many other reasons, which I omit, to avoid tediousness, the Commons voted unanimously, 1. That the Clergy of England convened in a Convocation or Synod, or otherwise, have no power to make any Constitutions, Canons, or Acts whatsoever, in matters of Doctrine or Discipline, or otherwise, to bind the Clergy or Laity of the land, without common consent in Parliament. 2. That the Canons treated upon by the late Convocation, do contain matters contrary to the King's prerogative, to the fundamental Laws and Statutes of the realm, to the rights of Parliament, to the property and liberty of the Subject, tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence (2).

Immediately after these resolutions, the House appointed a Committee of thirty six, to examine, who were the chief promoters of these Canons, and how they had been executed: to consider how far, in particular, the Archbishop of Canterbury had been concerned, in the great design of subverting the Laws of the Land and Religion: and to draw up a charge against him and such others, as should appear guilty of the same crime. The Scottish Commissioners who were sent to London to continue the treaty, begun at Rippon, were, as I said, in good understanding with the leading Members of the Commons, and in all appearance, had been informed of the design to prosecute the Archbishop. And therefore, to make the blow fall the heavier on this Prelate, by joining their complaints with those of the Commons, they presented next day to the Lords, a charge against him, to this effect:

"That he was the cause of all the troubles in Scotland, and the author and urger of introducing into Scotland the book of Canons, and the Liturgy, as appeared by fourteen letters which they offered to produce: That the Scottish Prelates having sent him a book of Canons, written upon the one side only, with the other side blank, he had made several interlinings, and filled up the blank pages with several directions; which changes and supplements were taken from the Romish Rituals, that varied from the book of England: That they were contrary to the King's intentions, who in his large declarations had professed, That all the variations in the Scottish service from that of England, should be only in such things as the Scottish humours would better comply with. But that the Archbishop had no regard to this. On the contrary, the Scottish Prelates having petitioned the suppression of some of the English Ceremonies, as the Cross in Baptism, the Ring in Marriage, and some other things, he was so far from consenting, that he had added several others: That in the order of the administration of the Communion in the book of England, he had made several alterations, which plainly showed his design of introducing Popery into Scotland: That he had kindled war between the King and the Scots; and been one of the chief causes of breaking the last Pacification, and renewing the war: That he had inserted into the divine service a prayer against their Nation, by name of traitorous subjects, having cast off all obedience to their anointed Sovereign, and coming in a rebellious manner to invade England; that shame might cover their faces as enemies to God and the King."

I have very much abridged these articles, which are very particular: but what is here said, suffices to show their design.

On the morrow, Sir Harbottle Grimston made in the House a Speech against the Archbishop, pretending to show,

(1) The words of Mr. Nathaniel Fiene's Speech are, "Whether Bishops be Jure Divino, we know is a dispute among the Papists, and never did any Protestant hold it but of late years. But that Archbishops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c. should be Jure Divino, I do not know that ever any Christian held it as before, and yet he that takes this Oath must swear it." Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 109.—Sir Edward Dering began his Speech about the Canons, to this effect: "The Pope (say they) has a Triple Crown, answerable thereto he pretends to a threefold Law: The first is, jus divinum, and this he would have you think to be the Coronet next his head, that which secures his power. The second is, jus humanum, Constantine's Donation, the gift of indulgent Princes, Temporal Power: this is his middle Crown: Out of these two the Pope frames his third Crown himself, and sets it upon the top: that is, jus canonicum, the Canon Law, of more use to his Popishness than both the other.—Just so our Prelates from the pretended Divinity of their Episcopacy, and from the Temporal Power granted by our Princes, would now obtrude a new Canon Law upon us." He concludes with saying, "No Canon can bind the Laity, where we have no voice of our own, nor choice of the Clergy Persons who do bind them, nor assent in the Satisfaction of them after they are framed: Quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus tractari debet." Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 104.—Mr. Bayly, in his Speech, affirmed, that the Clergy who had held the late Synod, were fallen into a Premunure upon that account. Diurn. Occur. p. 3.

(2) It was voted likewise, Nemine Contradictore, that the several Grants of the Benevolence or Contribution granted to his most excellent Majesty by the Clergy in their late Convocation, are contrary to the Laws, and ought not to bind the Clergy. Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 112.—Some pretend these votes were very unjust; if so, it is strange no one Member should oppose them. The Lord Clarendon freely owns, that the Canons were unwarrantable, even in a more favorable Season. Tom. 1. p. 162. Rapin.

(3) John Bancroft Bishop of Oxford was possessed with such fear of this Parliament, that he died about this time with little or no sickness. The other Bishops here spoken of, were, John Bridges Bishop of Chester, Matthew Wren Bishop of Ely, and William Pierce Bishop of Bath and Wells.

that all those who were concerned in the evils of the State, as the Earl of Strafford, the Bishops of Chester, Oxford (3), Ely, Bath and Wells, had been raised by his means, and that there was not a single grievance but what flowed from him. Whereupon the Commons impeached [by Mr. Denzil Hollis] the Archbishop of High-Treason, and the Lords committed him to the custody of the Gentleman-Usher. Some time after he was sent to the Tower.

Then, the Commons sent a message to the Lords, to let them know, they had received informations of a very high nature against Matthew Wren Bishop of Ely; and having heard that he intended to make an escape out of the Kingdom, they desired them to think of some way to prevent it. Whereupon, the Lords ordered the Bishop to give ten thousand pounds bail for his forth-coming, to which he consented.

Of those whom the Commons considered as the chief authors of the publick grievances, there remained only the Lord-Keeper Finch, and the Judges. The first was declared a traitor by a vote of the House of Commons, notwithstanding the [eloquent] Speech he was permitted to make at the Bar of the House in his vindication. But before he was accused in form, he fled into Holland. However, he was impeached afterwards, though absent. Presently after his flight, the King made Sir Edward Littleton Lord-Keeper.

In fine, the Commons sent word to the Lords, that they had received informations against three Judges, Sir John Bramston, Lord Chief-Justice of the King's Bench; Sir John Humphrey Davenport, Lord Chief-Baron; and Justice Crawley (4); and desired the House, that they might put in good security for their appearance. Whereupon, the Lords obliged these three Judges, each, to give ten thousand pounds bail. The other Judges were also accused afterwards.

Thus they who were considered by the Commons as the principal authors of the publick grievances, were disabled not only to continue to advise the King, but also to escape punishment, except the Lord Finch and Sir Francis Windbank, who saved their persons, by leaving their estates in England. I shall not stay to speak of many others of an inferior rank, who were variously punished, whether for exercising monopolies, or inventing means to raise the King money, whether for introducing or countenancing innovations in Religion, or lastly, for prevaricating in the exercise of their offices.

Whilst the Commons were employed in securing those, they intended to punish, they also prepared whatever was necessary to free the nation from all their grievances. The same method was used to this end, as had been employed against the persons. That is, Petitions from all quarters were presented to the House upon Grievances. These Petitions being read, several Speeches were made in the House, to show how prejudicial these grievances were to the Publick; and the principles which gave them birth, were particularly insisted on, as being directly contrary to the Constitution, and tending to the subversion of the Government. Whereupon, it was voted that such a thing was illegal, and ordered that a Bill should be prepared to abolish it. This was the subject of divers acts, which were presented to the King for the Royal assent from the 3d of November 1640, to the 10th of August 1641. The principal were these:

An Act for a Triennial Parliament: That is, to ordain that a Parliament should be held, at least every three years, though the King should neglect to call it, in order to prevent the inconveniences arising from a too-long intermission of Parliaments.

An Act to abolish the Star-Chamber and High-Commission.

An Act to reduce the Forests to the same state as under Edward I.

An Act to repeal the Statutes made in the reign of Edward II. concerning Knighthood.

An Act to permit any Subject to make Salt-petre and Gun-powder throughout the Kingdom.

An Act to abolish Ship-money (5).

The necessity of these Acts was so manifest, that the King must have either consented to them, or plainly declared he would govern with an absolute power. But he was not so unwise as to oppose them in his present circumstances. An illustrious Historian makes no scruple to say, that these Acts will be acknowledged by an incorrupt Posterity, to be everlasting monuments of the King's fatherly affection to his People; and such an obligation of repose and trust from his Majesty in the hearts of his Subjects, that no expressions of duty and confidence from them could have been more than a sufficient return on their parts. The King himself afterwards would frequently have had these concessions to be considered as Acts of pure grace, for which the Publick ought to have been thankful. But unhappily for him, neither Parliament nor People believed them to be the effect of his justice or affection to them, but rather of the necessity he was under, of giving his assent.

Besides these Acts, the Commons passed many general Votes upon several other articles. Indeed, these Votes are not considered, as Laws, neither do the Judges proceed by them in their determinations. Nevertheless, such is their effect, that few persons are so hardy as to act directly contrary to these decisions of the Commons, since it is in some measure to oppose the sentiment of the People whom they represent. Besides, an action directly contrary to a vote of the House, is liable to be questioned, when least expected, and draws upon the actor the indignation of the House, who have but too many opportunities to make him feel the effects of their resentment.

The design of the Commons was not only to stop the evil by means of these Votes, but also to terrify all those who had been concerned in the grievances, in order to take from the King all hopes of support in his People. For after the House had voted, for instance, that such a monopoly was illegal, if any person concerned in that monopoly, behaved in a manner disagreeable to the Commons, or appeared too much attached to the King, an accusation against him was the certain consequence of such a behaviour. By that means, the King's most devoted friends chose rather to relinquish his interest than be liable to a charge, from which, they plainly saw, it was not in the King's power to secure them. This had very clearly appeared by the great examples of the Earl of Stratford, Archbishop Laud, Lord-Keeper Finch, and Secretary Windebank, after whom no private person could hope for any protection from the King. Thus the Commons rendered themselves so formidable at the very beginning of the Parliament, that the King was suddenly deserted by all, without having other refuge than to consent to whatever was proposed by the Parliament. He hoped however, that when all the grievances were redressed, he should be, if not in the same state he had been for fifteen years, at least in the natural state of a King of England, according to the Laws and the Constitution of the Government. But it will hereafter appear, how much he was mistaken in his conjecture. His former administration had made too deep impressions in the minds of his Subjects, for the majority ever to believe, he would for the future be contented with the power allowed him by the Law. This distrust was the immediate cause of the war between the King and the Parliament. But it is not yet time to descend to these particulars.

The Commons used also another expedient to make themselves feared. As there were many people who, in conformity to the intentions of the Court, had been concerned in the monopolies, or countenanced the innovations, or been subservient to introduce and support the occasion of any grievance, the Commons, upon the Petitions presented to them against these men, sent for them to London, and examining them by a Committee, declared them Delinquents. As much as to say, that according to the opinion of the House, they were guilty of faults or offences for which they deserved to be prosecuted and punished according to law. This word Delinquent, was very much in use during this Parliament. Thus, a great number of those who had been most noted for their adherence to the maxims of the Court, or the principles of the Archbishop, were voted Delinquents, and thereby kept in awe by the Commons, who according as they behaved well or ill to them, could prosecute or leave them unmolested. But the number of those who were declared Delinquents was nothing in comparison of such as had reason to fear the like declaration, upon the least Petition against them. From hence there followed an unanimous approbation of whatever was done by the House; some consenting because they thought the things just, and others out of fear of chastisement. This was then rendered the redress of grievances very easy to the Commons, and would have made it impracticable for the King to oppose it, though he should have had such a thought. The King reaped at least this advantage from his consent to the redress of grievances, that he gave occasion to many to believe he sincerely concurred in that work. But his enemies drew from thence a very different consequence. They said, as the Parliament's measures were so well laid, that it would have been in vain for the King to oppose them, he was not to be thanked for a consent, to which necessity forced him, since, whilst it was in his power to hinder the redress of grievances, he had always refused to hearken to the instant desires of his Parliaments.

I am now to warn my Readers, that we are come to a time wherein they must be very much upon the guard with respect to the partiality of the Historians, each of whom does his utmost to prejudice his Readers in favour of either of the King, or the Parliament. This partiality consists not so much in disguising the facts, (wherein both parties are agreed,) as in the principles they establish. Those for the King, exalt, as high as possible, the Prerogative Royal. Nay some stretch it even to a sort of despotick power, as we have seen instances in the writings and sermons of Sibthorp, Montague, Manwaring, mentioned in the first part of this reign. According to this principle, they think and maintain, that the Parliament's aim was not to reforest the Government to its natural state, as was pretended, but rather to overturn the Constitution both of Church and State. That therefore the objects were so much magnified, by aggravating some acts of authority done by the King, as tending to subvert the Government, though they might have been justified by the Prerogative Royal, if any but the Commons had been judges. But though they manifestly declared themselves parties against the King, they however made themselves judges, voting such and such actions of the King, to be contrary to the laws. Nothing shows more plainly, according to these men, the Parliament's secret design to overthrow the Government, nor a stronger proof of it can be desired than the experience of what afterwards happened, when the Government of the State and Church were actually changed.

The favorers of the Parliament say, that without examining the extent of the Prerogative Royal, it may at least be affirmed, that it cannot be contrary to the laws: that if the King has his Prerogatives, the Parliament have their Privileges, and the People their Liberties, which the Prerogative cannot invade without destroying the constitution of the government, which consists in a happy mixture of the rights of King and People. That, before this Parliament, the King had manifestly stretched his Prerogative to the prejudice of the nation's rights, which the most attached to his interests did not dare to deny. That this being the case, nothing was more just, nothing more necessary, than to restore the Government to its natural state. That it is therefore preposterous to have recourse to a secret design of subverting the Church and State, since the necessity of redressing the grievances is undeniably evident: That supposing it true, that the Commons used sundry artifices to render themselves formidable, and more easily accomplish their design, namely, the redress of grievances, these artifices were not blameable, considering how impracticable the former Parliaments had found it to execute the same design.

I am persuaded, that most of the Readers for whom I write this History, such, I mean, as are not Englishmen, would not require of me a particular account of all that passed in the House of Commons, concerning the redress of grievances. It would be too tedious a work, which, after all, would inform them of nothing more material than what has hitherto been said. Nevertheless, for the satisfaction of those who are unacquainted with the manner of Parliamentary proceedings, I shall give here a brief relation of what was done with regard to Ship-money, the grievance most complained of, and by that will be seen the method taken with respect to the rest.

During the first whole month of this Session, scarce a Rushworth's day passed, but the House received Petitions from divers Counties, concerning grievances, amongst which, that of Ship-money was never forgotten. At last, on the 7th of October, the day appointed to debate upon that affair, the Lord Falkland (1), afterwards Secretary of State, made the following Speech to the House.

Mr. Speaker,

I Rejoice very much to see this day; and the want I hath not lain in my affection but my lungs, if to all that hath been said, I have not been as loud with my voice as any man in the House; yet truly my opinion is, we have yet done nothing, if we do no more; I

(1) There are Lords who are not Peers, as all the Sons of a Duke and Marquis, and the eldest Son of an Earl, who may be chosen Members of Parliament, as may also Irish and Scottish Peers. The Viscount Falkland was a Scottish Peer, and Member for Newport in the Isle of Wight. Essex.

"shall add what I humbly conceive ought to be added, as soon as I have said something with reference to him that says it.

"I will first desire the forgiveness of the House, if I ought I say seem to intrench upon another's profession, and enter upon the work of another robe. Since I have been intrusted by the report of a learned Committee, and confirmed by the uncontradicted rule of the House; since I shall nothing of this kind, but in order to something further, and, (which moves me most to venture my opinion, and to expect your pardon) since I am confident, that History alone is sufficient to shew this judgment contrary to our laws, and Logick alone sufficient to prove it destructive to our property, which every free and noble person values more than his profession. I will not profess I know my self, but all those who know me, know that my natural disposition is to decline from severity, much more from cruelty. That I have no particular provocation from their persons, and have particular obligations to their calling, against whom I am to speak; and though I have not so much knowledge in Law, yet far more than I have use for; so I hope it will be believed, that only publick interest hath extorted this from me, and that which I would not say, if I conceived it not so true, and so necessary, that no undigested meat can lie heavier upon the stomach, than this unaid would have lain upon my conscience. Mr. Speaker, the constitution of this Commonwealth hath established, or rather endeavoured to establish to us the security of our goods, and the security of those Laws which would secure us and our goods, by appointing for us Judges so settled, so sworn, that there can be no oppression, but they of necessity must be accessory; since if they neither deny, nor delay us justice, which neither for the great nor little Seal they ought to do, the greatest persons in this Kingdom cannot continue the least violence upon the meanest; but this security, Mr. Speaker, hath been almost our ruin, for it hath been turned, or rather turned itself into a battery against us: And those persons who should have been as dogs to defend the sheep, have been as wolves to worry them. These Judges, Mr. Speaker, to instance not them only, but their greatest crime, have delivered an opinion and judgment in an extrajudicial manner, that is, such as came not within their cognizance, they being Judges, and neither Philosophers nor Politicians; in which, when that which they would have so absolute and evident takes place, the Law of the land ceases, and that of general reason and equity, by which particular Laws at first were framed, returns to his throne and government, where salus populi becomes not only supreme, but salus lex, at which, and to which end, whatsoever should dispense with the King to make use of any money, dispenses with us, to make use of his, and one another's. In this judgment they contradicted both many and learned acts, and declarations of Parliament; and those in this very case, in this very reign, so that for them they needed to have consulted with no other record, but with their memories.

"2. They have contradicted apparent evidences, by supposing mighty and imminent dangers in the most serene, quiet, and halcyon days, that could possibly be imagined, a few contemptible pyrates being our most formidable enemies, and there being neither Prince nor State, with whom we had not either alliance, or amity, or both.

"3. They contradicted the Writ itself, by supposing that supposed danger to be so sudden, that it would not stay for a Parliament, which required but forty days stay; and the Writ being in no such haste, but being content to stay forty days seven times over.

"Mr. Speaker, it seemed generally strange, that they saw not the Law, which all men else saw, but themselves; yet though this begot the more general wonder, three other particulars begot the more general indignation. The first of all the reasons for this judgment was such, That there needed not any from the adverse party to help them to convert those few, who before had not the least suspicion of the legality of that most illegal Writ, there being fewer that approved of the judgment, than there were that judged it legal, for I am confident they did not that themselves.

"Secondly, when they had allowed to the King the sole power in necessity, the sole judgment of necessity, and by that enabled him to take both from us, what he would, when he would, and how he would, they yet continued to persuade us, that they had left us our Liberties and Properties.

"The third and last is, and which I confess moved most, that by the transformation of us from the state of free Subjects (a good phrase, Mr. Speaker, under Dr. Hajlin's favour) into that of Villains, they disabuse us No. 61. Vol. II,

"by legal and voluntary supplies to express our affections to his Majesty, and by that to cherish him to us, that is, by Parliaments. Mr. Speaker, the cause of all the miseries we have suffered, and the cause of all our jealousies we have had, that we should yet suffer, is, that a most excellent Prince hath been most infinitely abused by his Judges, telling him, that by policy he might do what he pleased; with the first of these we are now to deal, which may be a leading to the rest. And since in providing of these Laws, upon which these men have trampled, our ancestors have shewn their utmost care and wisdom for our undoubted security, words having done nothings, and yet they have done all that words can do, we must now be forced to think of abolishing of our grievances, and of taking away this judgment, and these Judges together, and of regulating their successors by their exemplary punishment.

"I will not speak much; I will only say we have accused a great person of High-Treason, for intending to subvert our fundamental Laws, and to introduce arbitrary Government; which we suppose he meant to do, we are sure these have done it, there being no Law more fundamental than that they have already subverted, and no Government more absolute, than that they have really introduced.

"Mr. Speaker, not only the severe punishment, but the sudden removal of these men, will have a sudden effect in one very considerable consideration, we only accuse, and the House of Lords condemn; in which condemnation they usually receive advice (though not direction) from the Judges; and I leave it to every man to imagine, how prejudicial to us, that is, to the Commonwealth, and how partial to their fellow malefactors, the advice of such Judges is like to be. How undoubtedly for their own sakes, they will think it may conduce to their power, that every action be judged to be a less fault, and every person to be less faulty, than in justice they ought to do: Amongst these, Mr. Speaker, there is one I must not lose in the crowd, whom I doubt not but we shall find, when we examine the rest of them, with what hopes they have been tempted, by what fears they have been assayed, and by what, and by whose importunity they have been pursued, before they consented to what they did; I doubt not, I say, but we shall find him to have been a most admirable Solicitor, but a most abominable Judge; he it is, who not only gave away with his breath, what our ancestors had purchased for us by so large an expence of their time, their care, their treasure, and their blood; and employed his industry, as great as his injustice, to persuade others to join with him in that deed of gift: But strove to root up those Liberties which they had cut down, and to make our grievances immortal, and our slavery irreparable, least any part of our posterity might want occasion to curse him; he declared that power to be so inherent to the Crown, as that it was not in the power even of Parliaments to divide them.

"I have heard, Mr. Speaker, and I think here that common fame is ground enough for this House to accuse upon; and then undoubtedly there is enough to be accused upon in this House; he hath reported this so generally, that I expect not that you shall bid me name him whom you all know, nor do I look to tell you news, when I tell you it is my Lord-Keeper; but this I think fit to put you in mind of, that his place admits him to his Majesty, and trusts him with his Majesty's conscience; and how pernicious every moment must be, which gives him means to infuse such unjust opinions of this House, as are expressed in a libel, rather than a declaration, of which many believe him to be the principal Secretary, and the other puts the most vast and unlimited power of the Chancery into his hands, the safest of which will be dangerous: For my part, I think no man secure, that he shall think himself worth any thing when he rises, whilst all our estates are in his breast, who hath sacrificed his Country to his ambition, whilst he who hath prostrated his own conscience, hath the keeping of the King's, and he who hath undone us already by wholesale, hath a power left in him by retail.

"Mr. Speaker, in the beginning of the Parliament he told us, and I am confident every man here believes it before he told it, and never the more for his telling, though a sorry witness is a good testimony against himself, that his Majesty never required any thing from any of his Ministers but justice and integrity. Against which, if any of them have transgress'd, upon their heads, and that deservedly, it all ought to fall; it was full and truly said, but he hath in this saying pronounced his own condemnation; we shall be more partial to him than he is to himself, if we be slow to pursue it. It is therefore my just and humble motion, that we may

1640. "may chuse a select Committee to draw up his and their charge, and to examine their carriage in this particular. "to make use of it in the charge, and if he shall be found guilty of tampering with Judges against the publick security, who thought tampering with witnesses in a private cause worthy of so great a fine (1), if he should be found to have gone before the rest to this judgment, and to have gone beyond the rest in this judgment, that in the punishment of it, the justice of this House may not deny him the due honour both to precede and exceed the rest."

After this Speech, the affair of Ship-money having been debated, it was resolved upon the question nemine contradicente.

1. That the charge imposed upon the Subjects for the providing and furnishing of Ships, and the assessments for raising of money for that purpose, commonly called Ship-money, are against the laws of the realm, the Subjects right of property, and contrary to former resolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

2. That the extrajudicial opinions of the Judges published in the Star-Chamber, and enrolled in the Courts of Westminster in these words, ----- in the whole, and in every part of them, are against the laws of the realm, the Subjects right of property, and contrary to former resolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

3. That the writ following ----- and the other writs commonly called the Ship-Writs, are against the Laws of the realm, the right of Property, and the liberty of the Subjects, and contrary to former resolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

After these resolutions, the House appointed a Committee of sixteen, at the head of whom was the Lord Falkland, to go forthwith to the several Judges, to know in what manner, and by whom they were solicited or threatened to give their extrajudicial opinion concerning Ship-money. It was ordered, that every one of the Judges should be examined at the same time by two of the Committee, and be told what had been voted in the House concerning Ship-money, and that the Committee should ask such questions as they should think material, to the execution of this order.

Next day, the House ordered that the Committee appointed to consider of the Property of the Subjects in their Goods, should take into consideration some way of seeing the entering upon record, the King's several commissions for Loans and Excise, and the resolutions of former Parliaments thereon, and the addition that was offered by the Lords to the Petition of right, with the resolution of the House; and also the resolutions of the questions proposed in the House concerning Ship-Money, that they might remain fair to posterity.

It was also referred to the same Committee to make a preparation of the vote passed about Ship-money, to be sent to the Lords; to draw up a charge against the Lord Finch, and the rest of the Judges that gave their opinion upon that tax; and likewise to take into consideration their extrajudicial opinions and the judgments in the case of Ship money; to inquire of the several denials of Habeas Corpus, and prohibitions, their extrajudicial Proceedings and opinions concerning ecclesiastical Jurisdictions, and the Court of Admiralty; their denial of legal and ordinary proceedings in cases of Justice, and the binding of the whole Kingdom by any one man's particular case. The same Committee had power to send for parties, witnesses, papers, records, or any thing else that might conduce to this business, and were to present the state of the whole matter to the House.

On the other hand, the 26th of February 1640-41, the Lords ordered to be brought to their House the record in the Exchequer of the Judgment in Mr. Hampden's case, and also the Rolls in the Star-Chamber and other Courts, wherein the extrajudicial opinions of the Judges were entered, and caused them to be annulled in their presence. They ordered moreover, that a copy of what they had done should be delivered to the Judges to be published at the Assizes in every county within their circuits, and that an Act of Parliament should be prepared concerning this matter.

All this produced at length, charges against the Lord-Ship-Money Keeper, and each of the Judges, with an Act to abolish Ship-money, to which the King gave the royal assent the 7th of August 1641.

Much the same method was taken with regard to the other grievances, and in the end, there was not one, public or private, but what was redressed within the nine first months of this session.

I intend not to include in these grievances, those concerning Religion. Besides that these were not generally acknowledged for grievances, this matter requires a more particular explication of what passed in the Parliament. 1642. I shall therefore show in the first place, the disposition of the Parliament, with respect to Religion, and then relate what passed concerning this subject.

Since the beginning of the reign of James I. the Bishops had rendered themselves much more powerful than before. The opposition of the Presbyterians, who never ceased to exclaim against the Hierarchy, which they were not in condition to overthrow it, had greatly contributed to the increase of the Episcopical power. Their impetuous zeal caused the King to think it proper to humble them, least in the end they should occasion some disturbance in the Church, and the Bishops were charged with the care of executing this resolution. The endeavours to reduce them to obedience, served only to inflame the evil. Instead of trying to convince them by arguments, they were treated without moderation, and, if I may venture to say it, without charity. It was resolved at any rate to compel them to conform to the Church of England, not only in things considered as necessary, but also in others regarded by most people as indifferent. Moreover, divers ceremonies were added to the Divine Service, which many persons well affected to the Church thought too near allied to Popery. William Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, was the principal author of these Ceremonies, as well before, as after, he was Archbishop. His chief aim was to mortify the Puritans. But in proceeding too briskly or rather too rigorously, he gave them room to accuse him that his design was to favour Popery, on pretence of forcing the Puritans to conform to the worship of the Church of England. No man was ever more wedded to ceremonies, and the more he was reproached with it, the more he urged them as necessary. This chiefly gave occasion to the Puritans, and even to some Church of England men to suspect he had a design to introduce the Romish Religion; this extreme attachment to ceremonies seeming to them as a means whereby he intended to compass his ends. As for Arminianism, all agree that Laud was not only Arminian, but also head of that party in England, from the time he was received into favour by King James I. through the Duke of Buckingham's means. As the knowledge of what passed in the reign of James I. may be of great service to the understanding the affairs of Religion, which I have undertaken to explain, I shall briefly relate what I think most necessary, though mentioned before in King James's reign.

When the disputes concerning grace arose in Holland, James I. espoused the opposite party to Arminius, and used even threats to oblige the States of Holland to condemn Vorstius his successor. After that, he sent Bishops and Divines to the synod of Dort, to strengthen the Contraremonstrants. Mean while the Arminians in England were forced to lie dormant, because the Court was not their friend. Laud, then only a private Doctor in the University of Oxford, had yet no credit, though shortly after the Duke of Buckingham procured him the Bishoprick of St. David's in Wales. At the same time King James was vigorously pushing his design to stretch the Prerogative royal, to which he met with great opposition, chiefly from the Puritans, who concerning Grace were directly contrary to the Arminians. For this reason the King and Duke thought fit to care for and support the Arminians, in order to oppose them to the Puritans, the King's grand aim being to weaken that party, which was always ready to obstruct the execution of his designs. From that time the Arminian party became powerful. The heads were Neil Bishop of Winchester, and Laud Bishop of St. David's, who found means to gain the King's confidence, and to have the disposal of the Church preferments. They improved this advantage to strengthen their party, by promoting to the Benefices such as were most averse to the Calvinists, for so they began now to be called who embraced Calvin's opinion concerning Grace, whether Presbyterians or Church of England men. There were therefore three principal causes of the animosity of the Court and its friends, against the Presbyterians.

The first was, that they rejected the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy.

The second, that they were entirely against the King's design to stretch his Prerogative, knowing the more power he had, the more they should be persecuted.

The third, that they were all Calvinists as to the notions of Grace. Though the King had not, perhaps, altered his opinion concerning that point, he deserted however the Calvinists, because they were in other respects, for the most part, Presbyterians and Puritans. From that time the Court and their agents counted among the Puritans, those who refused to conform to the Church of England; all the Calvinists Presbyterians or others; all who

1. This was a fine of 1000*l*. which William Bishop of Lincoln was condemned to pay for tampering with a Witness. See also p. 364.

1640. opposed the King's designs with regard to the Prerogative; and they were all, under the name of Puritans, equally obnoxious to the hatred of the King and his Ministers. So, by this policy, many people who had no inclination for Presbyterianism, were made to become Puritans. At least, they were forced to join with the Puritan-party, to hinder the Court, on pretence of destroying Puritanism, from establishing by degrees an arbitrary Power, which would have been fatal to the whole Nation. For the King pretended, his will could be opposed but upon puritanical principles.

The reign of Charles I. was still more violent in this respect, than that of James, as has been shown in the first part. Laud being made Bishop of London, and afterwards, Archbishop of Canterbury, and one of the King's prime Ministers, used all his industry and credit to humble the Puritan-party, that is, not only the Presbyterians, but also the Calvinists, and such who would not patiently bear the yoke of servitude. Matthew Wren Bishop of Norwich, and afterwards of Ely, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, Cosins Prebendary of Durham (1), being all of the same principles, seconded him in this design. And as if the difference between the Church of England and Presbytery, had not been sufficiently marked, they added to the worship sundry innovations, and represented as absolutely necessary, things indifferent, which Religion might well have dispensed with. Hence pretences were found to persecute the Puritans, by reckoning among that party, all whom the Court was pleased to call by that name.

The wisest part of the Nation had long since perceived the King's and the Court's policy, and their artifices to pave the way to arbitrary power. But it had not been possible to avoid the effects of it, because the King had dissolved the Parliaments, the moment they were bent to examine the Grievances. Thus the regal power had gained ground by degrees, no one being in a capacity to hinder its progress. But as soon as the King's affairs had taken a new turn, by the entrance of the Scots into England, and the taking of Newcastle, and when the King saw himself under an absolute necessity of calling a Parliament, most of the Members resolved not to lose the opportunity of abolishing the persecution, introduced under the specious pretence of stopping the progress of Puritanism, but in reality for the better advancement of arbitrary power. Above all, the House of Commons considered the innovations, and the rigour wherewith people were made to observe them, as so many artifices of the Court-party, for the more easy attainment of their end. It must not therefore be thought strange, if most of the Members being united with regard to the Grievances, were so likewise for the abolishing of innovations, and punishing the authors, as having served for instruments to the King in the execution of designs, wherein Religion was not solely concerned. This is what produced the charges against the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Ely, Bath and Wells, and against Cosins, besides the brand of Delinquents given by the Commons to a great number of Ministers and others, who had countenanced the innovations.

Most of the Members, as I said, were united as to this point, because there was not one but what considered it as a branch of the design to subject the Realm to the King's will and pleasure. But among this great number, there were real Presbyterians, who had more extensive views, and thought, no doubt, of altering the Government of the Church, on pretence of the ill use, the Bishops had made of their power. These, though not very numerous in the Parliament, were supported by a great party in the Kingdom, and particularly by the Scots, whose assistance was then absolutely necessary. But they took care not to discover their intentions. They were contented at first to join with those who only intended the redress of Grievances, and to restore the Government to its natural state. They hoped, as it happened indeed, that the strict examination of the grievances and innovations, would convince most of the Members of the necessity to abolish the Hierarchy, of which the Court had made so great use in the execution of their designs. They proposed to show on all occasions, that it was almost impossible to restore the Civil Government, whilst the King had in the Clergy of the Church of England, a support capable of raising insuperable obstacles to the reformation of the Government. For this reason, on all occasions, the Leaders of the Presbyterians were the most forward to speak against the Grievances. They aggravated chiefly those that concerned the innovations in Religion, which they openly ascribed to the design of introducing the Romish Religion. All this was done with a view to cast upon the Hierarchy, and the Bishops in general, the faults and ill conduct of some particular persons.

The other Members who were of the Church of England, though very opposite to the King, saw what was the intention of the Presbyterians. But they were kept in awe by the fear of losing the assistance of the Scots, who supported this party, and rendered it very considerable. Wherefore they durst not displease the Presbyterian-party, for fear of causing in the Parliament a division, which must be fatal to the common cause, and consequently very advantageous to the King. Besides, the men I am speaking of, did not believe the Hierarchy to be absolutely necessary to the Church, or that Religion could not subsist without Bishops. Only the rigid Episcopalians, and the King's party were of this opinion, but they made not a majority. Those therefore who had only in view the reformation of the State, and not that of the Church, could not however, without great inconveniencies, help having some concession for the Presbyterians, for the reasons just mentioned. Perhaps they had no other view in their policy, than to gain time, till the Civil Grievances were redressed, without any design to go farther. But they had to deal with very able heads, who artfully led them beyond their first resolutions.

On the other hand, the Bishops perfectly knew the intention of the Presbyterians, and that in lessening the King's power, their design was to render him unable to oppose the change they were meditating. Wherefore they adhered the more firmly to the King's interest, and often, by the number of their Voices, so managed it, that the Upper House voted directly contrary to the resolutions of the Lower. But thereby they procured the Presbyterians a considerable advantage. For these last took occasion from thence, to represent how advantageous it was for the King to have at his devotion so great a number of Voices among the Lords, and consequently, how impossible it would be to succeed in the intended reformation, so long as the Bishops had votes in the Upper-House. This led them at length to bring in a Bill for the exclusion of all Ecclesiastics from civil employments, and the Bishops in particular, from a right of sitting in the House of Lords.

Those who had only in view to restore the Civil Government, without meddling with the Hierarchy, and whom I shall call the Politicians, though I don't know, they were ever so termed, were greatly embarrassed. They plainly saw, that sundry abuses had crept into the Church, and would have readily agreed to their abolition, provided nothing more had been required. But it was proposed to go one step farther, and exclude the Bishops from the Upper-house, in which they saw several inconveniencies, with regard to the interest of the Church of England, to which they were attached. Though the Presbyterian party did not entirely discover themselves, and seemed to have no other view than to facilitate the redress of all abuses after the exclusion of the Bishops, it was easy to perceive, their projects reached farther, and that their aim was to undermine the Hierarchy. It is certain, there was no less inconveniencies in rejecting than consenting to, the Bill. By leaving the Bishops in the Upper-house, the King would be always secure of so many votes. As the Lords were not then so numerous as at present, as some were absent or otherwise employed, and some also were Roman Catholics, the Bishops and the rest of the King's party greatly influenced the resolutions of the Upper-house, as was daily experienced. Consequently the work of the reformation of the Government could not but meet with great obstacles. On the other hand, by rejecting the Bill proposed, the Presbyterian party would be displeased, which was very considerable in the Kingdom, chiefly by the support of the Scots, of whom there was great occasion, since it was by their means that the Parliament was enabled to labour effectually the redress of the grievances.

Then began to be debated the famous question, By what title do Bishops sit in Parliament? It was not denied, they had enjoyed this privilege from the beginning of the Monarchy; but some pretended, they sat in Parliament as Barons only, on account of the Crown-lands granted them by the Anglo-Saxon Kings, for which they did homage to the King like the rest of the Barons. Others maintained, they had a Seat there as Representatives of the Clergy, who could not be bound by the Laws made in Parliament, without giving their consent to them, according to the constant maxim of the Kingdom, and the undeniable privilege which all English Subjects had ever enjoyed. That the Lords gave their consent to the Laws, for themselves, and the Commons for all the Commons of the Kingdom, and therefore it was necessary, there should be in the Parliament Representatives of the Church and Clergy, otherwise the maxim would be false, that no man can be bound by the Laws to which he has not consented. They added farther, that the Parliament had always been thought to consist of three Estates, of which the Clergy had been always considered as one, whence they inferred, that to exclude from the Parliament one of its three Estates, would be to subvert the constitution of the Government.

To these arguments it was answered : Though it should be true, that the Clergy were an Estate of Parliament distinct from the rest of the People, which was contested, it did not follow, that the Bishops represented the whole Church : That there were in the Parliament two Houses, one of the Lords, and the other of the Commons ; and two Houses in the Convocation, the upper of the Bishops, and the lower of the inferior Clergy ; and therefore, according to this rule, the inferior Clergy should likewise have Representatives in the Parliament, that they might be deemed to give their consent to the Laws, which however, was never pretended. Hence it was inferred, the Bishops did not represent the Clergy, and added, that this supposed Representation was a new thing, unheard of before, and that a few months since, the Bishops would have been very angry to be counted only bare Representatives : That though it was necessary, the Clergy should be represented in the Parliament, it would not follow, that they ought to be represented by the Bishops, as all the people of England were not represented by the Lords. That the Abbots had formerly a seat in Parliament, not as Representatives, but as being Tenants in chief, and when they were excluded, it was not said, that a breach was made in the constitution of the Parliament, either by the exclusion of the Abbots, or dissolution of the Monasteries.

These, if I am not mistaken, are the principal arguments alleged for and against the Bishops, with regard to their seat in Parliament. This question was the more difficult, as it had been never determined by what right the Bishops sat in Parliament. Very probably, from the beginning of the Monarchy, till about the end of the reign of Henry III. the Parliaments consisted only of Lords, who were in possession of all the Lands of the Kingdom, for which they did homage to the King. And indeed it appears, the Lords, before that time, granted the King the money necessary for the support of the Government, without any mention of the Commons. It may therefore be said, that the Lords sat in Parliament by a double title, namely, for themselves, and as Representatives of the Nation. But after the Commons were introduced into Parliament, and had a separate House, the Lords lost the last of these titles, and sat only for themselves, the rest of the People having other Representatives. The Bishops and Abbots, who belonged to the body of the Lords, had probably their seat too by a double title, as possessors of Barons, and as Representatives of the Clergy, secular and regular. But as in introducing Representatives of the Commons into the Parliament, Representatives of the inferior Clergy were not also introduced, the Bishops and Abbots may be said to preserve their double title to sit there, as possessors of Barons, and as Representatives of the Clergy. The dissolution of the Monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII. rendered needless the representation of the Regulars, who no longer subsisted; but it made no alteration in the Bishops rights, who, according to this supposition, represented the secular Clergy, and continued to sit in Parliament, though the Abbots were abolished. But after all, it must be owned, this representation of the secular Clergy by Bishops, is only a supposition, which, though probable, cannot be said to be so evident as not to be opposed (1). But it seldom happens, that in disputes of this nature, justice and right are solely regarded. Though the reasons which may be drawn from the thing itself are not neglected, yet those are much more strenuously urged, which are founded in interest and policy.

The heads of the Presbyterians never ceased to represent to the Politicians the impossibility of restoring the Government to its natural state, so long as the Bishops should sit in the House of Peers; that the King had found means to gain the Clergy to his interest, by expressing a great zeal for the Church of England, and an extreme aversion to the Presbyterians; that the Clergy, and especially the Bishops, were entirely devoted to the King, in the belief that he was their protector and only support; that therefore they were persuaded he could not be too powerful, since this power would be so advantageous to the Clergy; that there were convincing proofs of this truth in the conduct of Land, Wren, and other Clergymen, particularly Sibthorpe, Montague, Manwaring, who had used their utmost endeavours to procure the King an unlimited power; that the Clergy in general were still in the same dispositions, and could do for the future as much mischief as formerly, if care was not taken to humble their pride and power, by confining them within the bounds of their calling.

The Politicians granted all these things, and besides, were not very well pleased with the Bishops and the rest of the Clergy. But they were loth to yield, for fear the alteration proposed might produce others in Church and State, which they did not care to meddle with. Mean while, after long weighing the inconveniences which might flow from their acceptance or refusal, they resolved at last to sacrifice the Bishops Right, rather than run the risk of seeing all their projects fall to the grounds, by the obstacles which the Bishops might raise. Whether this resolution was taken by the Leaders at the beginning of the Parliament, which I think not unlikely, or whether it was necessary to use some time to prevail with the Politicians, those who solicited the thing, judged that before it came to be publicly debated, it was convenient to breed prejudices against the Bishops in the minds of the People, and to cherish those already entertained. The House wanted no opportunities to execute this design. The Bill to take from the Bishops their seat in Parliament was not voted in the House of Commons till the 11th of March 1640-1, and passed not the House of Peers till the 27th of May following. But before the moving of this Bill, the Lower-House had taken several steps tending to incense the People against the Bishops. The great number of Petitions against the Bishops in general, against Episcopal Government, against some particular Prelates and Clergymen, against innovations, against the late Convocation, served them for foundation to examine the conduct of the Bishops with all the Rigour, their design required. Several pretend, all these Petitions were begged, and I won't affirm the contrary, though I know nothing particular concerning it (2). There is no clearer evidence of the Commons design with regard to the Bishops, than their resolution on the 20th of November, seventeen days after the opening of the Parliament, namely, that on Sunday the 22d of the same month (3) every member should be obliged to receive the Communion, and bring with him a ticket of his name and the place for which he served, and that after the Communion-day none should sit in the House but those that had first received the Sacrament. This resolution could be with no other view, than to prevent the Commons from being esteemed Presbyterians, and their resolutions disparaged on that pretence. Thus in the reign of Henry V. the House of Commons intending to give a mortal Blow to the Clergy, began with passing an Act for burning Heretics, least the Clergy should pretend that the House conspired only of such.

To show now all the preparations that were made in the House of Commons, before they proceeded in the Bill I have been speaking of, I shall only briefly mention the Petitions that were presented, the Speeches that were made on this subject, and the several resolutions that were taken.

On the 10th of November, seven days after the opening of the Parliament, Sir Edward Dering made a speech in the House, to persuade them to enter upon matters of Religion. He took occasion to present a Petition from one Wilton a Minister against the Archbishop who had suspended him, and concluded with saying, Our manifold Grievs do fill a mighty and vast circumference, yet so that from every part our lines of sorrow do lead unto him, and point at him the Centre, from whence our miseries in this Church, and many of them in the Commonwealth do flow.

The same day was read the Petition of Peter Smart, prisoner in the King's Bench, complaining of Dr. Cofins' innovations in the Church of Durham, and his profecution of the prisoner in the High-Commission at York, where he was sentenced and deprived of his Living, and Prebend of Durham. Whereupon it was ordered that he should have liberty to go abroad in safe-custody, to prosecute his Petition, which was referred to a Committee who were to consider by whose motion and means Dr. Cofins was preferred to his late dignity (+). It was Arch-bishop Land they had a mind to meet with. On the

(2) It seems to be plain, that the Clergy never thought themselves represented by the Bishops, seeing that after the Restoration, when the Convention dropped the Privilege of taxing themselves, the inferior Clergy had a Vote of Privilege, a right to vote for Members of Parliament, and to have their own Clergy taxed, in the year 1665, represented by the Commons, like the rest of the Freeholders. Mr. Hyde, (afterwards Lord Clarendon) and others, made use of this Argument, of the Bishops being the Representatives of the Clergy, in their Speeches against the taking away the Bishops Votes in the House of Peers; which certain way was no Argument at all, the Prelate, justly, as well as in the Axiom, sitting in Parliament on account of their Barony, like the rest of the Nobility.

2) The Lords Glarendon says, their way was to prepare a Petition very modest and dutiful for the Form; and for the Matter, not very unreasonable; and to communicate it at some publick meeting, where care was taken it should be received with approbation: the Subscription of very few hands filled the Paper itself, where the Petition was written, and therefore many more Sheets were annexed, for the receipt of the number, which gave: ailed the Credit, and procured all the Countenance to the undertaking. When a multitude of hands was procured, the Petition itself was cut out, and a new one framed suitable to it: this was added, and annexed to the long List of Names, which were subscribed to the former. Thus it came to pass, that the Petition was presented to the House, and the Lords Glarendon says, that the

The same day Sir Edward Dering made a Speech, complaining, that there was a severe High-Commission established in England, worse than the Popish Inquisition; that the Archbishop of Canterbury affected the title and power of a Patriarch, and acted like a sovereign; that he allowed of the impression of books in favour of Popery, of which he named several, and refused the same license for printing orthodox writings. He moved that there might be a Committee to inquire into the great number of oppressed Ministers under the Bishops tyranny, [for ten years last past,] and to examine the licences granted for bad books, and refused for good books.

Three days after, the House received a Petition from two of the inhabitants of Chyfter, complaining of their having been inhumanly treated by the High-Commission at York, for visiting Mr. Pryn when he was going to his prison in Caernarvon Castle. Upon this Petition the House appointed a numerous Committee to examine the jurisdiction of the two Commissions of Canterbury and York, and the abuses committed in the Courts.

p. 93. On the 11th, the House received a Petition subscribed by a great number of the inhabitants of London (1) and several Counties, containing twenty-eight grievances against Episcopal Government, the substance whereof was as follows:

The London Petition against Bishops, contains twenty-eight Grievances.

Rushworth, IV. p. 39. Nalson, T. I. p. 666. 1. Grievance. The Bishops subjecting and enthraling all Ministers under them and their authority, and so by degrees exempting them from the temporal power.

2. The faint-heartedness of Ministers to preach the truth of God, and oppose the progress of Arminianism, lest they should displease the Prelates.

3. The encouragement of Ministers to despise the temporal Magistracy, and to live contentiously with their neighbours, knowing that they, being the Bishops creatures, shall be supported.

4. The restraint of many godly and able men from the Ministry, and thrusting out of many congregations their Ministers, because they could not in conscience submit unto, and maintain the Bishops needless devices.

5. The suppressing of the buying of impropriations, and placing of able Ministers in them.

6. The great increase of scandalous men in the ministry, who, if they but wear a canonical coat, a surplice, a hood, and bow at the name of Jesus, think they have fully discharged their duty.

7. The discouragement of many from bringing up their children in learning; the many errors and strange opinions which were in the Church; great corruptions in the Universities; the want of preaching Ministers in many places; the loathing of the Ministry, and the general defection to all manner of profaneness.

8. The swarming of lascivious and unprofitable books, in disgrace of Religion; as namely, Ovid's Firs of Love, The Parliament of Women, &c.

9. The hindering of godly books to be printed; the blotting out or perverting in those which they suffer, whatever strikes either at Popery or Arminianism; the adding of what pleases them, and the restraint of reprinting Books formerly licensed, without re-licensing.

10. The publishing of Popish, Arminian, and other dangerous books and tenets; as namely, That the Church of Rome is a true Church, and in the worst times never erred in fundamentals; that the Subjects have no propriety in their Estates; but that the King may take from them what he pleases; that all is the King's, and that he is bound by no Law, &c.

11. The growth of Popery, and increase of Papists, Priests and Jesuits; the frequent venting of crucifixes and popish Pictures both engraven and printed, and the placing of such in Bibles.

12. The multitude of Monopolies, and impositions upon all kinds of commodities, &c. (2).

13. That the Church-government in England was upheld the same way as in the Romish Church. Hence it was that the Prelates maintained, that the Pope is not Antichrist, and forbade praying in the Church for the conversion of the Queen.

14. The great conformity of vestures and ceremonies with those of the Church of Rome.

15. The standing up at the Gloria Patri, and at the reading of the Gospel; praying towards the East; the bowing at the name of Jesus; the bowing to the altar, towards the East; crosses in Baptism; the kneeling at the Communion.

16. The turning of the Communion-table altarwise; the setting images and tapers upon them; the reading of the second Service at the altar, which is termed the Mercy Seat; the forcing people to come up thither to receive the Sacrament.

17. The consecrating of Churches, Chapels, Fonts, &c. and the re-consecrating of them upon pretended pollution.

18. The Liturgy for the most part taken out of the Romish Breviary, and the book of Ordination framed out of the Roman Pontifical.

19. The multitude of Canons; abuse of excommunication; denying of appeals; the Canons of the last Synod.

20. Plurality of Benefices; prohibiting of marriages without licence at certain times, and licensing of marriages without bans asking.

21. Profanation of the Lord's-day, the suspending and depriving Ministers for not reading a declaration for tolerating sports on that day.

22. The pressing of the strict observation of the Saints days, and drawing great sums of money out of mens purses for giving them leave to work on them.

23. The great increase of adulteries, &c. occasioned by the Prelates corrupt administration of Justice in such cases, who taking upon them the punishment of it, do turn all into moneys for the filling of their purses.

24. The general abuse of Excommunication, which was inflicted for trivial matters; and the abolition whereof could not be obtained without money, &c.

25. The Prelates claiming their office and jurisdiction to be Jure Divino; their taking upon them temporal dignities, &c.

26. The forcing people to take Commissions out of their own Courts.

27. The imposing of oaths upon Church-Wardens and Side-men, which they cannot take without perjury (3).

28. The great abuse of Ecclesiastical Courts, and the Bishops Usurpations.

This Petition ended with some considerations, the last whereof was, that the Bishops having occasioned the war with Scotland, this war could be terminated only by the suppression of Episcopacy.

The next day, several Ministers (4) were declared Delinquents, for introducing innovations into the Church, IV. p. 97. and a Committee was appointed to examine the complaints exhibited against the Bishop of Bath and Walis.

On the 15th, the House proceeded to take into consideration the new Canons of the late Convocation, and voted what has been related. After that, Laud was accused, and Wren obliged to give bail. P. 99, 112, 113, 223.

On the 12th of January 1640-1, Petitions were presented from four several Counties against the Hierarchy. P. 135.

On the 16th, a complaint was brought to the Lords (5), P. 143. against a Conventicle held in the Parish of St. Savinar's in Southwark, where at least sixty persons were seized, who upon being asked why they did not resort to their Parish-church, according to the Law of the 35th of Elizabeth, answered, that the Law of Elizabeth was not a true Law, for that it was made by the Bishops (6). The Lords contented themselves with ordering, that Divine Service should be performed as appointed by the Acts of Parliament; and that the Ministers should forbear to introduce any innovations.

On the 19th, the city of Glocester presented a Petition P. 245. against the Bishops.

On the 23d was read a Petition of several Ministers, in P. 250. behalf of themselves and many others their brethren, praying a redress of certain irregularities in the government of the Church. To which was annexed a remonstrance, setting forth these pretended irregularities, and the great revenues and the little use, of Deans and Chapters.

All these Petitions, which were very graciously received by the House of Commons, being plain indications that the House had some ill design against the Bishops, his Majesty sent for both Houses to attend him at the Banqueting-House at Whitehall, where he made the following Speech.

The King's Speech to the Parliament.
Jan. 23.
Rushworth.
IV. p. 154.
Nelson.
T. I. p. 735.

My Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes,
THE principal cause of my coming here at this time, is by reason of the slow proceedings in Parliament, touching which is a great deal of inconvenience. Therefore I think it very necessary to lay before you the state of my affairs as now they stand, thereby to hasten (not to interrupt) your proceedings.

First, I must remember you, that there are two armies in the Kingdom, in a manner maintained by you, the very naming of which doth more clearly shew the inconvenience thereof, than a better tongue than mine can express. Therefore, in the first place, I shall recommend unto you the quick dispatch of that business. In the next place, I must recommend unto you the state of my Navy and Forts; the condition of both which is so well known unto you, that I need not tell you the particulars, only thus much; they are the walls and defence of this Kingdom, which if out of order, all men may easily judge what encouragement it will be to our enemies, and what disheartening to our friends. Last of all (and not the least to be considered) I must lay before you the distractions that are at this present occasioned through the connivance of Parliament; for there are some men that more maliciously, than ignorantly, will put no difference between reformation, and alteration of Government. Hence it cometh, that divine service is irreverently interrupted, and Petitions in an ill way given in, neither disputed nor denied.

But I will enter into no more particulars, but shew you a way of remedy, by shewing you my clear intentions, and some rocks that may hinder this good work.

I shall willingly and cheerfully concur with you for the reformation of all innovations both in Church and Commonwealth, and consequently that all Courts of Justice may be reformed according to Law. For my intention is clearly to reduce all things to the best and purest times, as they were in the time of Queen Elizabeth. Moreover, whatsoever part of my revenue shall be found illegal, or heavy to my Subjects, I shall be willing to lay it down, trusting in their affections.

Having thus clearly and shortly set down my intentions, I will shew you some rubs, and must needs take notice of some very strange (I know not what term to give them,) Petitions given in the name of divers Counties, against the present established Government, and of the great threatenings against the Bishops, that they will make them to be but cyphers, or at least their voices to be taken away. Now I must tell you, that I make a great difference between reformation and alteration of Government; though I am for the first, I cannot give way to the latter.

If some of them have overstretched their power, and inchoated too much upon the temporality, if it be so, I shall not be unwilling these things should be redressed and reformed, as all other abuses, according to the wisdom of former times; so far I shall go with you, nay farther, if upon serious debate you shall show me, that Bishops have some temporal authority, inconvenient to the State, and not so necessary for the government of the Church, and upholding episcopal jurisdiction; I shall not be unwilling to desire them to lay it down; but this must not be understood, that I shall any way consent that their voices in Parliament shall be taken away; for in all the times of my predecessors since the Conquest, and before, they have enjoyed it; I am bound to maintain them in it, as one of the fundamental constitutions of this Kingdom. There is another rock you are on, not in substance but in form; yet the form is so essential, that unless it be reformed, it will mar the substance.

There is a Bill lately put in concerning Parliaments. The thing I like well, to have frequent Parliaments, but to give power to Sheriffs and Constables, and I know not whom, to use my authority, that I cannot yield unto. But to shew you, that I am desirous to give you content in forms which destroy not the substance, you shall have a Bill for this purpose; so that it trench neither against my honour, nor against the antient Privilege of the Crown, concerning Parliaments, to which purpose I have commanded my learned Council to wait upon you, my Lords, with such propositions as I hope will give you content, for I ingenuously confess, that frequent Parliaments are the best means to keep a right understanding between me and my People, which I so much desire.

To conclude, I have now shewn you the state of my affairs, my own clear intentions, and the rocks I wish you to eschew; in all which you may perceive the desire I have to give you content, as you shall find also by those Ministers I have, or shall have, about me for the effecting of these my good intentions, which, I doubt not, will bring peace and happiness to my Subjects, and contentment to you all.

Concerning the conference, you shall have a direct answer, which shall give you satisfaction."

This Speech produced not the effect, the King expected. First, because probably the exclusion of the Bishops was already resolved, and there was nothing in the King's Speech capable of altering that resolution. Secondly, the great concern expressed by the King for the Bishops right, was precisely the principal cause that made their exclusion to be desired. Thirdly, the King seemed to banter the Parliament, when he said, "if they would show him that the Bishops have any temporal authority inconvenient to the State, he should not be unwilling to desire them to lay it down." As if the Parliament ought to have expected, from the pure concession of the Bishops, the reformation of an authority prejudicial to the State, a maxim directly contrary to the principles, the Parliament was then of.

The next day, a complaint was brought to the Commons against Matthew Wren, for having, whilst Bishop of Norwich, by oppressions, innovations, and requiring certain oaths, compelled above fifty families of that City to withdraw out of England.

On the 11th of February, the Commons examined [part of] the London Ministers Remonstrance against the Bishops. In the debate upon this subject, some smart repartees passed between Mr. Grimston and Mr. Selden. Mr. Grimston argued thus: That Bishops are Jure divino, is a question; That Archbishops are not Jure divino, is out of question. Now that Bishops which are questioned whether Jure divino, or Archbishops, which out of question are not Jure divino, should suspend Ministers: that are Jure divino, I leave to you to be considered. To which Mr. Selden answered, That the Convocation is Jure divino, is a question; That Parliaments are not Jure divino, is out of question: That Religion is Jure divino, there is no question. Now, Sir, That the Convocation, which is questionable whether Jure divino, and Parliaments, which out of question are not Jure divino, should meddle with Religion, which questionless is Jure divino, I leave to your consideration.

I own these two arguments do not seem to me of equal force. The first supposes, that for the particular act of suspending a Minister, there must be an authority derived from God, a supposition seemingly very natural. The other supposes, that there is occasion for the like authority, to meddle with the affairs of Religion, a supposition which to me appears a little too general, and which should be reduced to particular acts, to render this argument like the first.

On the 5th, upon the complaint of the inhabitants of Wood-Church in Kent, against Mr. Brown their Minister, who being also a Justice of Peace, had, by colour of that office, done several things contrary to the Laws, the House ordered, that the Lord-Keeper should be desired to leave out the Clergy of England and Wales, at the renewing of the Commission of the Peace.

On the 8th and 9th, the House resumed the debates concerning the Bishops, and many Speeches were made for and against them (1), but they are too long to be inserted. I shall content my self with observing, that though the point in question seemed to be only to know, whether the Bishops ought to be excluded from the House of Peers, yet the arguments against them tended much farther, even to the entire abolition of Episcopacy.

I shall also remark, that among those who spoke for the Bishops, there was not one that denied, the Prelates had abused their power. But they maintained, that these were personal faults, which might be punished and prevented for the future, without any necessity of attacking Episcopacy itself. The adversaries of the Bishops intimated on the contrary, that there was no reforming Episcopacy, but by changing the government of the Church. They said, whilst there were Bishops there would be so many tyrants, who would think more of establishing their grandeur, than 640-1. of the People's salvation. Unhappily, they had but too many instances to confirm their opinion. The Lord Falkland, who spoke that day against the Bishops, said, among other things,

We shall find them to have tytted mint and anise, and have left undone the weightier works of the Law; to have been left eager upon those who damn our Church, than upon those, who upon weak conscience, and perhaps as weak reason, (the dislike of some commanded garments, or some uncommanded posture) only abstained from it. Nay, it hath been more dangerous for men to go to some neighbour's parish, when they had no sermon in their own, than to be obstinate and perpetual Recusants; while masses have been said in security, a conventicle hath been a crime; and which is yet more, the conforming to ceremonies hath been more exalted, than the conforming to Christianity; and whilst men for scruples have been undone, for attempts upon sedony they have only been admonished.

The opposition which the enemies of Episcopacy then met with in the execution of their designs, was strong enough to retard it, but not capable to make them desist. What they had just done was properly but an effort, in order to take more effectual measures hereafter. They were contented, therefore, with having prevailed with the House, that the Petition of the inhabitants of London should be taken into consideration, contrary to the opinion of those who would have it rejected without reading. Besides, what had been said on this occasion against the Bishops, promoted the execution of the project, to take away their votes in the House of Lords, which most of the Commons had already resolved in private. They continued therefore to receive Petitions against Episcopacy, and to take several steps tending to inspire the People with an aversion for the Bishops, and the rest of the Clergy.

The 13th of February, a Bill was brought in for abolishing superstition, in the supposition, that Bishops had introduced into the Church sundry superstitious practices.

The 1st of March the Commons appointed a Committee to prepare reasons to be offered to the Lords, that all Clergymen in England and Wales, should be put out of the Commission of the Peace.

The 9th, it was moved in the House, that a Bill be drawn against Pluralists [and Non-residents.]

The same day were presented from the Committee, for the Ministers Remonstrance against the Bishops, three heads for the debate and consideration of the House. The first concerned their secular employments, namely, their legislative and judicial power in Parliament; their judicial power in the Star-Chamber, and Commissions for the Peace; their employment as Privy-Counsellors, and temporal Offices. The second related to their sole power in ecclesiastical things, as ordination and censures. The third concerned the greatness of the revenues of Deans and Chapters, the little use of them, and the inconveniences thence arising. The House having debated upon the first of these heads, came to these resolutions:

I. That the legislative and judicial power of Bishops in the House of Peers, is a great hindrance to the discharge of their spiritual function, prejudicial to the Commonwealth, and fit to be taken away by Bill, and that a Bill be drawn to that purpose.

II. That for Bishops, or any other Clergymen, to be in the Commission of the Peace, or to have any judicial power, in the Star-Chamber, or in any civil Court, is a great hindrance to the discharge of their spiritual function, prejudicial to the Commonwealth, and fit to be taken away; and that a Bill be brought in to that purpose.

The same day, the Lords ordered to be burnt two books, written by Dr. Pocklington, entitled, Sunday no Sabbath, and Altare Christianum.

The 15th, the Commons sent up to the Lords articles against Dr. Coyne, who was accused of introducing into the Church of Durham divers innovations, tending to restore Popery.

The 21st of April, Petitions against the Hierarchy were presented by Nottinghamshire and Lancashire.

The 26th of the same month was read [a second time] a Bill, for punishing and fining the Members of the late Convocation. The Archbishop of Canterbury's fine was of twenty thousand pounds. There were others of ten thousand pounds, of five thousand, three thousand, two thousand, and the least of a Bishop was of a thousand. The rest of the Members were rated, each in proportion to his ecclesiastical revenues (1).

The same day was read a Bill, for regulating abuses in ecclesiastical Courts.

It was evident, that the Commons were projecting some great reformation in the ecclesiastical State, and probably, the Deans and Chapters were first to be attacked, because their use did not appear so manifest. For this reason, Dr. Hacket desired leave to speak before the House, on the behalf of Deans and Chapters, which was granted him. But after he had done, Dr. Burgess was permitted also to answer his reasons. The two Universities preferred likewise Petitions to the House on the same account, but to no manner of purpose.

At last, the Bill against the Bishops and Clergy exercising temporal jurisdiction, passed in the House of Commons, and was sent up to the Lords for their concurrence. But this Bill meeting with great opposition in the House of Peers, who put off the debate from day to day, the Commons caused a new Bill to be brought into their House, for the taking away of Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c. which was read the first time. Whilst they were debating whether it should be read again or laid aside, a message came from the Lords, signifying, that they were ready to concur with them as to the former Bill, except only taking away the Bishops votes in Parliament. But the Commons, without taking any notice of this offer, ordered the new Bill to be read a second time.

The second of June, at a conference between the two Houses, the Lords gave reasons why they did not judge it unlawful for the Bishops to sit in Parliament, alleging, that for their right to vote there, they conceived by the Common and Statute Law, and antient practice there was no question of it. As for any inconveniences, they did not yet understand any such as might induce them to deprive the Bishops and their Successors of their right. But for removing them from the Star-Chamber, Council-table, or any office in secular affairs, they would fully concur with the Commons.

Next day, heads for a conference with the Lords were reported, containing nine reasons why Bishops ought not to have votes in Parliament (2).

"1. Because it is a great hindrance to their ministerial function.

"2. Because they do vow and undertake at their ordination, when they enter into holy orders, that they will give themselves wholly to that vocation.

"3. Because Councils and Canons in several ages, do forbid them to meddle in secular affairs.

"4. Because the twenty-four Bishops have dependance on the two Archbishops, and take their oath of canonical obedience unto them.

"5. Because they are but for their lives, and therefore are not fit to have legislative Power over the honours, inheritances, persons, and liberties of others.

"6. Because of Bishops dependency and expectancy of translation to places of greater profit.

"7. That the several Bishops have of late much encroached upon the consciences and liberties of the Subject; and they and their successors will be much encouraged still to encroach; and the Subject will be much discouraged from complaining against such encroachment, if twenty-six of that order be to be judges upon that complaint. The same reason extends to their legislative Power in any Bill to pass for the regulation of that power, upon any emergent inconveniency by it.

"8. Because the whole number of them are interested to maintain the jurisdiction of Bishops; which hath been found so grievous to the three Kingdoms, that Scotland hath utterly abolished it.

"9. Because the Bishops, being Lords of Parliament, it setteth too great a distance between them and the rest of their brethren in the Ministry; which occasioneth pride in them, discontent in others, and disquiet in the Church.

"And as to their having votes a long time, the answer is, if it be inconvenient, time and usage are not to be considered with Law-makers: Some Abbots voted as antiently in Parliament as Bishops, yet are taken away."

Among these reasons the Commons only insinuated the principal in the 6th article, which however was universally known, namely, that the Bishops had been too much devoted to the King, and countenanced arbitrary power.

Mean while the Commons ordered a Bill to be prepared against the late Convocation, and another to abolish the High-Commission.

The 7th of June the Lords voted for maintaining the Bishops right to sit in Parliament.

The 11th, the affair of Episcopacy coming again into debate, lasted from seven in the morning, till night (3), and 1640-1. it was resolved by the Commons, that the preamble to the Bill should be exprest in these words :

Whereas the government of the Church of England by Archbishops and Bishops, their Chancellors and Commissaries, Deans, Archdeacons, and other Ecclesiastical Officers, hath been found by long experience to be a great impediment to the perfect reformation and growth of Religion, and very prejudicial to the State and Government of this Kingdom, &c.

The 15th, the Commons voted that all Deans, Deans and Chapters, Archdeacons, Prebendaries, Chanters, Canons, and Petty-Canons, and their Officers, shall be utterly abolished : That all the Lands taken from Deans and Chapters shall be employed to the advancement of learning and piety, provision being made that his Majesty be no loser in his rents, first-fruits, and other duties ; and that a competent maintenance shall be made to the several persons concerned, if such persons appear not to be delinquents. Several Speeches too long to be inserted, were made upon this occasion.

The 21st, the House being resolved into a grand Committee to debate the Bill for abolishing Episcopacy, Sir Edward Deering proposed, in a Speech, that there should be in every Shire twelve Divines and a President, to whom might be given what title they pleased, whether that of Bishop or any other : but nothing was resolved thereupon.

It is easy to perceive by what passed in the Parliament, during the first months, with regard to the Church, that the Commons considered this affair as a capital point, though they affected to let it pass as dependent on the design of reforming the civil Government. For scarce a day passed without some debate directly or indirectly on this subject. But as this was not the only affair then in agitation in the Parliament, it will be necessary to break off the narration, in order to speak of some other matters of no less importance.

The King could not but be very much displeased with the proceedings of the Commons, as well in the affair of grievances, as in that of Episcopacy. The two things he had most at heart, since the beginning of his reign, were the stretching his Prerogative, and maintaining the Church of England in its full lustre, and the Bishops in all their authority. Nevertheless, upon these two points it was that the Commons seemed to affect to give him daily mortifications, not only by their Speeches, but also by their Votes and the Bills they sent up to the Lords.

But besides Grievances and Episcopacy, there was another Article, wherein the Commons showed no great compliance to the King ; and that was the affair of the Catholics. Charles followed the King his Father's method, that is, he appeared to be entirely attached to the Protestant Religion and Church of England ; whilst on the other hand, he protected and countenanced the Papists. But there was this difference between the Father and Son ; King James's Religion was always very doubtful, notwithstanding his outward profession of the Protestant Religion ; whereas King Charles was never accused of being a Papist, but by men of very warm and passionate tempers. However, several things induced him to favour the Catholics, which gave his enemies some advantage.

1. The example of the King his Father, who, throughout his whole reign, could never be prevailed with to execute the Laws against them. 2. Though the Papists would not take the oath of Supremacy, they refused not to swear Allegiance, and that was sufficient for him to reckon them good Subjects. 3. In his project of humbling the Parliament, and reducing the Commons to the sole affair of Supply, the Parliament's desiring the execution of the Laws against the Papists, sufficed to throw him upon a contrary course, in order to deprive them by degrees, of the custom of obtaining every thing by importunity. 4. The Catholics having no other refuge but the King's protection, it was natural for them firmly to adhere to his person and interest, and the King thought himself obliged to grant them an extraordinary protection, in reward of their fidelity. 5. Nothing was more grating to the Puritans, than to see the Papists well received at Court ; and as the King hated the Puritans, he took a pleasure in mortifying them, by caring for their enemies. 6. The Queen, for whom the King had a very great condescension, did not a little contribute to inspire him with a good opinion, if not of her Religion, at least of the professors. 7. Archbishop Laud, who was Arminian, took care not to strengthen the Calvinistical-party, by incensing the King against the Papists. 8. Lastly, Charles I. was naturally of an inflexible temper, and this quality, added to his maxims of Government, made him impatient of whatever tended to curb his will. These are probably, the reasons that induced the King to countenance the Catholics, during the first fifteen years of his reign. He carried his regard for them so far, that not only the penal Laws enacted against them, were never executed, but the Papists were also considered at Court as the best Subjects, whereas the Puritans were regarded as enemies to the King and State.

The face of affairs being changed by the calling of the Parliament, and the King unable to protect the Papists, they were treated somewhat roughly. It was supposed, there was a settled design to introduce Popery, and that several Bishops and other Clergymen were in the plot. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Ely, and of Bath and Wells, Dr. Cosins, Secretary Windbank, and some others, were accused of being chiefly concerned in this affair, which was openly said to be managed by the Queen and her Confidants. Though this charge was perhaps carried too far, with respect to the private persons, it can hardly be denied, that they gave some cause for it by their proceedings. Their hatred to the Presbyterians made them not scruple to make too near approaches to Popery, in order to be at a greater distance from Presbyterianism. This, if I am not mistaken, was the true cause of all the innovations introduced into the public worship, and of the inviolable attachment to the observance of certain indifferent or needless customs and ceremonies. The chief aim of the Governors of the Church was to widen continually the distance between Presbyterianism and the Church of England. But this policy, which was advantageous to the enemies of the Puritans, whilst the King ruled with an absolute power, turned to their prejudice entirely, because in this Parliament they were accused of having had more secret designs ; in a word, of having intended to introduce Popery, and the punishment of the faults committed by some hot and passionate persons, was made to fall on the whole Church.

In all the proceedings of the Parliament against the Papists, the King had properly nothing to say. He could not deny that there were Laws against Recusants, and that these Laws had not been executed, though he had several times solemnly promised it. It was no longer a proper Season to protect them openly, and therefore he published Proclamations, enjoining the execution of the Laws, in order to content the Parliament. But these Proclamations were so artfully drawn, that they properly granted nothing of what they seemed to promise. Especially, the Parliament could never prevail with the King to let the condemned Priests be executed, whether the King believed these sentences too rigorous, or the Queen's Solicitations had a greater influence upon him than those of the Parliament. I shall now proceed to the most material transactions concerning the Catholics, during the first seven or eight months of this Session.

In the beginning of the Parliament, the King having published a Proclamation against Recusants, the Committee, charged with examining it, reported, it was not according to [his Majesty's intentions, or] the expectation of the House, for the following reasons :

1. In the clause wherein the Proclamation commands all Popish Recusants within fifteen days to depart the City, &c. it is added, Without special licence had thereunto : So that if by any means they can obtain any licence from his Majesty (which the Committee thinks they cannot) or from the Lords of the Council, Bishop, Lieutenant, or Deputy-Lieutenant, then they are not within that clause.

2. The order to disarm all Recusants, is limited to Recusants Convict, and being so restrained, if any be armed and not convicted, a Justice of Peace cannot disarm them.

3. Recusants are commanded to depart to their own dwelling Houses ; but as of late days there is great resort of Recusants to London and Westminster, and places adjacent, there is no urging them from thence by Law.

The Committee added, that many Recusants had Letters of Grace to protect their persons and estates.

In the continuation of this report, a few days after, the Committee said, That upon the examination of the Keepers of two Prisons only, Newgate and the Clink, they found sixty-four Priests and Jesuits discharged in one year, some by Privy-signer, others by Warrants from the Lords of the Council, but most of them by Warrants from Secretary Windbank, without any mention of the King's pleasure (1) : That upon examination of the Clerk of the Peace for Middlesex, and the Clerk of the Crown in the King's Bench, it was found, that within the compass of King Charles I. by Cyrillus Patriarch of Alexandria, being all written in great Capital Greek Letters, was vouched and attested by Sir Smonet d'Essex, a great Antiquary wherein the Postscript to the Epistles to Timothy and Titus are only thus : The First to Timothy, written from Laodicea ; the Second to Titus, written from Nicopolis. Whence he inferred, that the filling of Timothy the first Bishop at Ephesus, and Titus the first Bishop at Crete, were the spurious Additions of some Eastern Bishop or Monk, at least five hundred years after Christ. Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 284. Diurn. Occur. p. 123.

(1) In the Report it is added, That very few appeared to be under the King's own hand, and of them not any one but at the request of foreign Ambassadors, and the Queen mother. Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 68.

1640-1. "York, made to them two propositions. The first was, how his army should be relieved and maintained? To this the Lords resolved to engage themselves, and to send deputies to London to negotiate a supply. The second proposition was, that after the Scots had passed Northumberland, taken Newcastle, and possessed the Bishoprick of Durham, they sent a petition to his Majesty, which contained in general terms a desire to have their grievances taken into consideration. Upon receipt of his Majesty's answer, the Scottish Lords sent his Majesty a second petition, in which they made their particular demands, and declared, that according to his Majesty's command they would advance no further into England. So his Majesty asked the Lords what answer should be made to that petitionary letter? The Lords replied, that it was impossible for them to give any well-grounded advice, unless the true state of his affairs, and the condition of his army were laid before them. Whereupon his Majesty commanded the Earl of Traquair to make the narration of the Scottish business, and their late Acts of Parliament, and the [Earl of Strafford] Lord-Lieutenant-General to give an account in what condition the army stood.

"The Scots army had passed Northumberland without resistance. They had disputed the passage of the River Tyne at Newburn, where the English Horse retired in disorder. His Majesty's Foot Army consisting of twelve or fourteen thousand men in Newcastle, likewise retired to York, whereby the town of Newcastle, a place of great consideration, was fallen into the Scots hands, and the Bishoprick of Durham brought under contribution.

"In this state the Gentry of the Bishoprick repaired to his Majesty; from whom they were referred to the Earl of Strafford, who gave them this answer positively, that they could look for no help nor protection from the King, and therefore they might use the best means they could to preserve their lives and estates. Whereby they were forced to consent to a very heavy contribution, though such without which the Scottish army could not subsist. This contribution was eight hundred and fifty Pounds a day for the Bishoprick of Durham, Northumberland, and Newcastle. These Gentlemen much lamented their Estates, that the Scots should be irritated by being proclaimed traitors.

"The Scots on the other hand represented to the King's Commissioners, that being threatened with an army of thirty or forty thousand men, another of ten thousand out of Ireland, and by proclamation declared Traitors and Rebels; and having heard of another army providing, of eight or ten thousand by shipping to hinder their trade, at least their commerce with England, that they were drawn together by necessity, as they pretended, of defence. They further alleged, that it was a common discourse, of which they had seen Papers that they should be reduced into a Province, which would be but one summer's work. Therefore they had drawn their power together, and being assembled, and their Country poor; taking advantage of the time, while all those armies that should oppose them were out of the way, they were forced to enter into England.

"Thus the Great Council of the Lords found that the Scots had increased their confines near fourscore miles in England, and had passed the rivers of Tweed and Tyne; and that the river of Tees, the boundary of Yorkshire, was not to be defended, being fordable in many places by forty Horse a front. That if the Scots should pass that river, there was no possibility to hinder them from coming to York, without hazarding a battle, which the Earl of Strafford declared unto them he would not advise, because the King's army consisted of troops that were untrained, and unused to arms.

"This being the case, the Lords advised his Majesty that the Scots, and their grievances might be heard. And whereas their complaint had been, that their Petitions to his Majesty had been conveyed by conduits of an evil relish, that there might be chosen such Lords Commissioners, of whose integrity they could not doubt. The King was pleased to refer the choice of these Commissioners to the Great Council: And to them power was given, under the Great-Seal of England, to hear whatsoever the Scots could lay before them, and to enter into treaty with them.

"When this was proposed to the Scots Commissioners, they represented, that the countries where they lay were become poor; that they could not think, as their affairs stood, of returning home; that his Majesty had restrained them from passing further into England; so that a 1640-1. "treaty in this exigent was worse than a war, unless means might be thought upon how they might subsist, while the treaty was on foot; otherwise they should be obliged to plunder the country.

"The Commissioners having dispatched some of their company to acquaint his Majesty with the Scots demands, a commission was given them by the King to treat with the Scots for a maintenance, and the Commissioners thought, that instead of giving them any allowance, they should be left to their proportion of that contribution of eight hundred and fifty Pounds a day, already agreed upon by the Counties, as less dishonourable than to assign them maintenance. Accordingly the preliminaries were agreed upon; the treaty of cessation concluded, and the Commissioners advised his Majesty to ratify it, which was accordingly done. The Parliament approaching, their Lordships advised his Majesty to transfer the treaty from Rippon to London, to which his Majesty consented.

"To excuse the preliminaries agreed on at Rippon, the Earl of Bristol added, that it was indeed hard to pay the Scots a contribution of eight hundred and fifty Pounds a day, and that there was already some doubt that the Counties were not able to bear it: But that on the other side it was objected by the Scots, that it was impossible, if the payment should fail, to keep their promise, or to obey his Majesty, but that they should be necessitated against their will to plunder the country. For which reasons the Earl of Strafford had declared, that the Counties of Cumberland and Westmorland being under the Scots power, it was reasonable that in Subsidium they should contribute some help to their neighbours: But he added, that the Commissioners left at Durham had written, that it was impossible for them to proceed in the agreement; which if it were broken on their part, the Scots would allege an impossibility to consent to starve; so that if some means were not found, by which those Counties engaged might be relieved, he was afraid all their labour and treaty would come to nothing. Therefore the Commissioners, and all the Lords, engaged themselves faithfully and truly, to declare all these things to the Parliament.

"The Earl of Bristol declared further, that it was far from the Lord-Commissioners purpose to move any supply of money from the House of Commons, but to lay the cause before them. Availing certainly, that if some course were not taken, the whole Kingdom would be put into disorder. Armies would not starve; retreating was not yet in the thoughts of the Scots; therefore they must plunder and destroy, or advance into Yorkshire, and so farther into England, to seek subsistence; the prevention whereof did highly import the King and Kingdom.

"Lastly, the Earl proposed to the Parliament another thing, no less worthy of consideration, viz. That if the Scots army were provided of a competency, it were very strange there should not an equal care be had for maintaining the King's army. He said the Scots army was strong and powerful, and little other resistance against it, but the impediments of an army marching in winter; but whether it were fit for a Kingdom to be trusted to accidents of frosts, with a people bred in Swedeland (1), and cold countries, he left to their discretion. He confessed, that the Scots had made great protestations, and with great execrations, avowed, that they had no intent to advance forward, but return when they shall have received satisfaction: yet the Commissioners did not conceive that the Kingdom should rely upon promises and protestations. Many accidents might happen, when a nation come from a far country to a better, should be told, the business they came about was just, and their quarrel good; who finding themselves in a fat pasture, may pick quarrels with their leaders, if they should go about to prevent them. Upon these grounds his Lordship presented to the general consideration, the supply of his Majesty's army, that it be not disbanded; which if it should come to pass, Yorkshire, and other parts of England were left to the Scots discretion. His Lordship said, he durst not say the Scots would not come forward, but that it was in their power if they would; and therefore he recommended this representation to the whole body of the Kingdom, to prevent future dangers."

There was no occasion to use many arguments to induce the Parliament to allow that the Scottish army should be maintained in England. Upon the Earl of Bristol's report, it was resolved, that the Commons approve of the persons of the Lords that were Commissioners in the late Treaty, to be Commissioners now to treat with

(1) This alludes to the six thousand Scots sent by King Charles to the King of Sweden, under the Command of the Marquis of Hamilton. The Troop served in Germany, and never in Sweden. Rapin.

“the Scots Commissioners in this declaration, that no conclusion of theirs should bind the Commons, without their consent in Parliament.” Though the Scotch army was very expensive to England, the negotiation however lasted till the 7th of August 1641, when the treaty was at length signed. I shall insert here a summary of the articles, that it may be seen, first, wherein consisted the differences between the King and the Scots, and the difficulties of the Peace; and secondly what the King's grand project came to, of reducing the Kirk of Scotland to a perfect conformity with the Church of England, and perhaps of rendering himself absolute in Scotland, as he was almost in England, when he formed this Enterprize.

FIRST, the Scots declare, that by their treating with the English Parliament, they do not acknowledge any dependence of Scotland upon England, &c.

1. The Scots first Demand.

“That his Majesty would be graciously pleased to command that the Acts of the late Parliament of Scotland, may be published in his Majesty's name, with consent of the Estates of Parliament convened by his Majesty's authority, the 2d of June 1640.

Answer. His Majesty doth in the word of a King, promise the publishing of the said Acts, with the Acts to be made in the next session of the same Parliament; and that all the said Acts have in all time coming the strength of Laws, &c.

2d Demand. “That the castle of Edinburgh, and other strengths of the Kingdom should be furnished, and used for defence and security of the Kingdom.

Answer. Agreed unto.

3d Demand. “That Scottish men within his Majesty's dominions of England and Ireland, may be freed from censure for subscribing the Covenant, and be no more pressed with oaths, and subscriptions, unwarranted by their Laws, and contrary to their national Oath, and Covenant approved by his Majesty.

Answer. Granted with regard to the Subjects of Scotland, who shall be Sojourners only in England or Ireland. But such shall be excepted as are settled inhabitants in either of the two Kingdoms. The English and Irish shall have the like Privilege in Scotland.

4th Demand. “That whosoever shall be found, upon tryal and examination, by the Estates of either of the two Parliaments, to have been the authors and causers of the late and present troubles and combustion; whether by labouring to make and foment division betwixt the King and his People, or betwixt the two nations, or any other way, shall be liable to the censure and sentence of the said Parliaments respectively, the English to the Parliament of England, and the Scots to that of Scotland.

Answer. His Majesty believeth he hath none such, as incendiaries, about him; and therefore he can make no other declaration, than that all his Courts of Justice are free and open to all men. His Parliament in this Kingdom [of England] is now sitting, and the current Parliament of Scotland near approaching the time of their meeting. To either of which, he doth not prohibit any of his Subjects to present their just grievances and complaints, of whatsoever nature.

And whereas it was further demanded, that his Majesty would be pleased not to employ any person or persons in office or place, that shall be judged incapable by sentence of Parliament, his Majesty agreeth thereto; nor will he make use of their service, without the consent of Parliament, nor grant them access to his person.

5th Demand. “That their Ships and Goods, and all damage thereof may be restored.

Answer. This is consented unto, on condition it be reciprocal. And the Scottish Commissioners having informed, that about fourscore Ships of Scotland are yet stayed in the English Ports, and are like to suffer much further loss and damage; it is agreed, That warrants shall be presently granted for the delivery of them, and that four thousand pounds be presently advanced, for helping the present setting forth of the said ships.

6th Demand. “That for the losses which the Kingdom of Scotland hath sustained, and for the vast charges they have been put unto, reparation be made.

Answer. The Parliament of England grants to the Scots for this purpose, the sum of three hundred thousand pounds.

And whereas it was desired by the Scottish Commissioners, that the English Commissioners would let them know the security, manners, and terms of payment, of the aforesaid sum, and of the arrears due for relief of the northern Counties; It was agreed by order of the Parliament, that they should have fourscore thousand pounds, with the whole arrears due to the army, before the disbanding thereof. And for paying the remnant of the said sum, an Act of Parliament of publick faith, shall pass for security thereof; and that one moiety shall be paid at Midsummer 1642, and the other moiety a year after, in 1643.

And in like manner, whereas it was desired by the Scottish Commissioners, that they might know to whom they should address themselves for payment of the forementioned sum, the Parliament hath appointed Commissioners----and rejoiced that the place of payment shall be the Chamber of London. And lastly, that a safe conduct shall be granted for the secure transporting of the monies to Scotland.

8th Demand.

Containing several Articles.

“1. That all tokens and shews of hostility upon the borders of the two Kingdoms may be taken away; and particularly, that not only the Garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle may be removed, but that the works may be slighted, and the places dismantled (1).

Answer. His Majesty is desirous, that all things between the Kingdoms of England and Scotland, be reduced into the same state they were in before the beginning of the late troubles.

“2. That there be unity in Religion, and uniformity of Church-government between the two nations.

Answer. His Majesty, with the advice of both Houses of Parliament, doth approve of the affection of his Subjects of Scotland, in their desire of having a conformity of Church-government between the two Nations; and as the Parliament hath already taken into consideration, the reformation of Church-government, so they will proceed in due time, as shall best conduce to the glory of God, the peace of the Church, and of both Kingdoms.

“3. That the King's Majesty and the Prince come and reside sometimes in Scotland, “4. That the officers of State, Counsellors and Sessioners within the Kingdom of Scotland, be placed by advice of Parliament.

Answer. His Majesty promises to give ear so far to the informations of his Parliament, and when the Parliament is not sitting, of his Council and College of Justice, as that he shall neither make choice of such as they shall recommend unto him; or if he thinks another person fitter than any of those recommended, he shall make the same known to the Parliament, or in the time between Parliament, to the Council and Session, that if there is just exception against the life and qualification of the said party, he may timely nominate some other, against whom there shall be no just exception. His Majesty declares also, that the places in the College of Justice, shall be provided unto the Judges, Quamdiu se bene gesserint. If this answer cannot content the Scottish Commissioners, his Majesty remits the whole answer to be considered by him, or his Commissioners, at the Parliament, at the next sitting thereof.

“5. That his Majesty would be pleased to place about his own person, in places of greatest nearness and trust, some of his Scottish Subjects.

Answer. His Majesty shall continue the same care which hitherto he hath done for their satisfaction in this particular, and not only so, but shall also recommend the same to the Prince his Son.

“6. That none may have place about his Majesty, and the Prince, but such as are of the reformed Religion.

Answer. His Majesty doth conceive, that his Subjects of Scotland have no intention by this proposition, (especially by way of demand) to limit, or prescribe unto him the choice of his Servants, but rather to shew their zeal to Religion; wherein his own piety will make him do therein, that which may give just satisfaction to his people.

“7. That the Copper-coin, which hath passed in Scotland this long time, for seven times, and above as much as the true value and worth thereof, be newly regulated; and that no Copper-money be coined hereafter without consent of the Estates convened in Parliament.

(1) This Clause was usually inserted in Treaties between England and Scotland, that neither of the two Nations should take possession of Berwick or Carlisle. Rapin.

1641. said to this effect: ---- "That having been present at the trial of the Earl of Strafford, he could not in conscience condemn him of High-Treason, though he thought him guilty of misdemeanors. Therefore he desired the Lords to find some way to bring him out of this great

The Commons, were much troubled and discontented with this Speech, and immediately adjourned till May the 30, on which day great multitudes of people (1) repairing to Westminster, insulted and threatened the Lords, as they were going to their House, crying out, Justice, Justice.

The same day Mr. Pym made known to the House, "That there were divers informations given of desperate designs both at home and abroad, against the Parliament, and the peace of the Nation; and that the persons engaged therein were under an oath of secrecy: That there was an endeavour to disaffect the army, not only against the Parliament's proceedings, but to bring them up against the Parliament to over-awe them: That there was also a design upon the Tower; and endeavours used for the Earl of Strafford to escape: That these combinations at home, had a correspondence with practices abroad; and that the French were drawing down their forces again to the sea-side; and there was a cause to fear, their intent was upon Portsmouth: That divers persons of eminency about the Queen were deeply engaged in these plots: That it was necessary that the ports should be stopped; and his Majesty desired to command, That no person attending upon the King, Queen, or Prince, should depart without leave of his Majesty, with the humble advice of his Parliament."

Whereupon the House fell into a serious debate of this matter, and were generally of opinion, that it was necessary to enter into a common resolution for the safety of the Kingdom.

When it is considered in what juncture this conspiracy was discovered to the House, though Mr. Pym was informed of it long before; that it was at a time, when the Peers were, in some measure, to be compelled to pass the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Strafford, and when the rabble were also using violence for that purpose, there seems to be ground to suspect, that it was only an artifice to stir up the People, and induce the Lords to do as the Commons desired, from a fear of the imminent danger the Kingdom was threatened with. At least, there is reason to believe, this conspiracy was greatly aggravated. But this is only a conjecture, which ought not to be relied on, till the arguments pro and con are examined. However this be, the Commons, after a debate, came to a resolution of taking the following Protestation.

I A. B. do in the presence of Almighty God, promise, vow and protest, to maintain and defend, as far as lawfully I may, with my life, power, and estate, the true reformed Protestant Religion, expressed in the Doctrine of the Church of England, against all Popery and Popish innovation within this realm, contrary to the said doctrine; and according to the duty of my allegiance, I will maintain and defend his Majesty's royal person, honour, and estate.

Also the power and privilege of Parliaments, the lawful rights and liberties of the Subjects, and every person that shall make this Protestation, in whatsoever he shall do in the lawful pursuance of the same; and as far as lawfully I may, I will oppose, and by all good ways and means, endeavour to bring condign punishment on all such, as shall by force, practice, counsels, plots, conspiracies, or otherwise, do any thing to the contrary, in this present Protestation contained: And further, That I shall, in all just and honourable ways, endeavour to preserve the union and peace betwixt the three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland: And neither for hope, fear, or any other respects, shall relinquish this Promise, Vow, and Protestation.

It must be observed, this Protestation was taken on Mr. Pym's bare assurance of the discovery of a plot, and before there was any proof of it. Hence it may be conjectured, that the thing had been determined among the leading men in the House. After that, the Commons came to several resolutions, to provide for the safety of the Kingdom, and the town of Portsmouth in particular. They communicated to the Lords the informations they had received, the votes they had passed, and their Protestation, desiring that every Peer might be ordered to take it.

It was very difficult for the Lords to refuse the Commons desire. In the first place, they had inspired the Nation with such a terror, that no man durst oppose their resolves, for fear of being looked upon as having ill designs, and exposed to inevitable ruin. Secondly, the People still continued to flock to Westminster, and openly threatened the Lords. Thirdly, the multitude presented the same day a Petition to the Lords, demanding Justice upon the Earl of Strafford, and that their Lordships would please to free them from the fears of the conspiracy. Fourthly, the morrow, being the fourth of May, the people repairing to Westminster in greater numbers than the day before, some incendiaries posted up against a wall in the Old Palace-yard, the names of fifty six Members, calling them Straffordians, and betrayers of their Country. Lastly, the same day the multitudes presented to the Lords another Petition, saying, "That they understood the Tower was going to receive a garrison of men, not of the Hamlets, (as usually) but consisting of other persons under the command of a Captain, a great confidant of the Earl of Strafford, and that this was done to make way for the Earl's escape."

Upon this Petition, the House sent six Peers to examine Sir William Balfour, Lieutenant of the Tower, concerning the Truth of this fact. Balfour answered, it was true, he had his Majesty's order to receive one hundred men (2) into the Tower, and Captain Billingly to command them, and to receive only such men as the Captain should bring to him; but understanding now their Lordships pleasure, he would receive no other guard into the Tower but the Hamlet men.

The Lords did further declare, at a conference with the Commons, that they were drawing to a conclusion of the Bill of Attainder, but were so encompassed with multitudes of People, that they might be conceived not to be free, and therefore desired the Commons to join with them, to find out some way to send the people to their homes. Then they debated the Protestation, passed it, and took the same. It was taken by four hundred and thirty three Commoners, and one hundred and six Lords, including the Bishops and Judges. The Commons having ordered Dr. Burgess to acquaint the multitude with the Protestation taken by both Houses, and that they were desired to return to their homes, they forthwith departed.

There are then two things which manifestly appear in this affair. The first, that there was a project on foot to favour the Earl of Strafford's escape, which will be seen more clearly hereafter. The second, that the concourse of the people was privately procured, by some of the leading men of the Commons, since, the day before, the House had taken no step towards dispersing the multitude; though they were desired by the Lords, and since they found means to cause the people to retire, as soon as they knew the Lords had resolved to take the Protestation.

But the Protestation was not the only effect of the conspiracy. The same day, the Commons ordered a Bill to be prepared for the continuance of this present Parliament, that it might not be dissolved without the consent of both Houses. They ordered likewise the Protestation to be tendered to the whole Kingdom.

The same day, May the 4th, the House was informed, that six or eight of the conspirators were fled, of whom Mr. Henry Jermin, and Mr. Henry Percy, Members of the House, were two, and that they were gone towards Portsmouth. At the same time, information came that the Queen was preparing to go to the same place. These two successive informations causing strong suspicions, the Houses dispatched to Portsmouth one Lord and two Commoners, to propose certain queries to the Governor, and take care for the security of the town and haven. They agreed pro, without, to move the Queen to defer her journey to Portsmouth, alledging several reasons which were not the true, [particularly the safety of her Majesty's person.] They desired also the King to publish a proclamation, for calling in Jermin, Percy, and other fugitives, which the King promised to do. The same day, the Speaker sent, by order of the House, the following letter to Sir Jacob Ashby, with a charge to communicate it to the army.

S I R,

WE have had cause to doubt, that some ill-affected persons have endeavoured to make a misunderstanding in the army, of the intentions of the Parliament towards them. To take away all misunderstanding in that kind, the House of Commons have commanded me to assure you, that they have taken the affairs of the army into their serious care: And though, for the present, their monies have not come in as they wished, and as was due, by reason of the many distractions, and other impediments, which this House could no ways avoid; yet they rest most assured, that they shall not only have their full pay, but the House will take their merits into their further consideration, in regard they take notice, that notwithstanding their want, and endeavours of these ill-

I protest, they have not demanded themselves otherwise wealth; which this House takes in so good part, that we have already found out a way to get money for a good part of their pay, and will take the most speedy course we possibly may for the rest. So I remain,

Your very loving Friend,

William Lenthall.

Mean while, the Committee, appointed to enquire into the conspiracy, made their report in the following manner.

"That this plot consisteth of three heads: The first "was, the design upon the Tower. The second, to "engage the army. The third, to bring in foreign forces.
"For the Tower, it appeared to be thus: Captain
"Bilting, being examined upon oath, confessed, that he "was acquainted with Sir John Suckling: That the said
"Sir John lately offered him employment in one of the "King's ships, then at Portsmouth; afterwards employ"ment for Portugal: That this deponent having notice
"to meet at the privy Lodgings at White-Hall, d
"there receive orders to get an hundred men to serve in "the Tower, under him. And if he did fail, he should "answer it with his life. And afterwards meeting with "Sir John Suckling, and acquainting him therewith, he "told him he would furnish him with the said number.
"Sir William Balfour, Lieutenant of the Tower, being "examined, said, that he had command to receive Cap"tain Bilting with an hundred men into the Tower,
"who should be under his command. That the Earl "Stratford at that time expostulating with him about "his escape, told him, he would attempt nothing in that "kind without his privy; and that he should have the "King's warrant for his indemnity; and that the warrant
"should be to command him to remove the Earl of "Stratford from the Tower, to some other castle; and "he would then take his opportunity to escape; that the "Lieutenant of the Tower not giving any complying
"answer thereunto, the said Earl sent again to intreat
"him to come to him, and would have persuaded him to "let him make an escape; saying, *Without your con-
"urrence it cannot be done; and if you will consent there-
"unto, I will make you present payment of twenty two "thousand pounds, besides you shall have a good marriage for "your Son.* To which the Lieutenant of the Tower re"plied, he was so far from concurring therein, that he "was not to be further moved in such a thing. Thus "much the Lieutenant of the Tower delivered upon his

"Colonel Coring, upon his examination in the House "of Commons, did confess, that Sir John Suckling was "the first person that ever made any overture unto him,
"concerning the army's marching towards London: After"wards being in the Queen's Lodgings, he met with "Mr. H. Percy, which was about the beginnings, or "middle of Lent last, and Mr. Percy told him, there was "a consultation of Officers to be had, concerning the "good of the army; and desired him to go along with "him to his chamber, where the meeting was to be.
"There were present at the same meeting, Commissary
"If ..., Colonel Ashburnham, Captain Pollard, Sir John
"Berkly, Daniel O Neal, Mr. Jermin, and himself:
"That Mr. Percy said, there were propositions to be "made which were of great concernment; and that it "was necessary there should be an oath of secrecy taken "before any thing was propounded: That the oath
"should be to this purpose: That we should neither di"rectly nor indirectly discover any part of the consulta"tion, nor ever to think our selves dissolved from that "oath, by any other oath which might be imposed upon "us hereafter: Which oath was read out of a Paper, when "it was tendered unto them; and thereupon they were "sworn, by laying their hands upon the bible; that he
"and Jermin were sworn together; for the rest had taken
"the oath before."

"Then three propositions were made to them, name"ly:

As these Propositions are expressed in a Letter which will be seen presently, they are omitted here for brevity's sake.

"He further said, that the whole number there met,
"were of opinion, that the army should not march to"wards London, till a declaration had been first sent up "to the Parliament: That he the said Goring answered,
"it was a nice point to interpose in the proceeding of
"the Parliament; and did propound some difficulties to "allay the business, to divert Commissary Wilmet, and
"those other persons from so dangerous a business: And "said, that he did think it was a design of folly to un"dertake it; for they must think the Scots would take

"the advantage upon the army's removal Southwards;
"whose correspondence was so great with the city; and
"for them to begin to shew their teeth, and not be able "to bite, would argue little prudence; that they should "either undertake it so as to go through with it, or let
"it alone: That he did ask them what ammunition
"they had to accommodate so great an army: And
"whether they could command the ammunition in the "Tower: That Wilmet, Pollard, and Ashburnham, then "made answer, they had no purpose to go to London;
"for to surprize the Tower, was to conquer the King"dom: That this, amongst other passages, was part of "the discourse at the first meeting.

"That shortly after there was another meeting of the "same persons, and in the same place, in Mr. Percy's
"chamber, where there were propositions of another nature,
"desperate and impious on the one hand, and foolish on
"the other; and that he endeavoured by argument to "divert them, by propounding an impossibility to effect
"the same: For how could the army, lodged in several "quarters, unpaid, and at such a distance, march sud"denly to London, and surprize what they had in de"sign?

"That Mr. Jermin was the person that first proposed
"the marching of the army towards London: that for "his part he declared himself absolutely against it. That "Mr. Jermin replied to him in private, *You do not dis"like the design, for you are at ready for any wild, mad
"undertaking, at any man I know; but you dislike the tem"per of these persons who are engaged in the business.*

"He did further confess, that he propounded that Suck"ling might be admitted to the consultation: But Wil-
"met, Ashburnham, and Pollard, would not hear of it.
"And they three did then declare themselves against the "army's marching towards London.

"Then he took occasion to say, that he did acquaint
"some Members of both Houses, whom he could name,
"that there were some of the army whom they did not "think so well of, were more faithful and serviceable to
"the Parliament than they were aware of, which time
"would produce; and named them: And they did ac"cordingly give testimony of his integrity, so far as "general terms could discover the design. He confessed, "that Mr. Jermin did make some offers unto him, to "relinquish the Government of Portsmouth upon some
"terms of advance: But he said, he did not conclude "any thing, for he would first see the performance of "what was offered; so had no further discourse with him
"concerning that business. But he doth believe that
"Suckling and Jermin did confer together about the de"sign. He said they did desire his opinion about a Gene"ral; some were for Essex, some for Holland; but he,
"with Mr. Jermin, were for Newcastle.

"Being again examined upon his oath before the "Committee of Lords and Commons, and pressed more "particularly to answer questions not before proposed un"to him, he did confess, that meeting with Mr. Jermin
"in the Queen's withdrawing Chamber, her Majesty
"came and told him, the King would speak with him;
"and meeting with his Majesty, he told him; he was
"minded to set his army in a good posture, being ad"vised thereto by the Earl of Bristol (as he said) and his "Majesty then commanded him to join with Mr. Percy,
"and some others in that business.

"As for the designs from beyond the seas, the Com"mittee did make report to the House, that it was "cleared unto them, that Jermin endeavoured to have "got the possession of Portsmouth; that the King of "France had drawn down great forces to the sea-side;
"that the Governor of Calise had examined some Eng"lish men, whether the Earl of Stratford's head was cut
"or not: And this was in point of time, the first of May,
"according to the English stile, and Sir Philip Cart"wright, Governour of Guernsey, wrote letters also,
"which came in great haste, that he understood the "French had a design upon that Island, or some part of "England. It also appeared to the Committee, by divers
"of the letters which were opened coming from beyond "sea, that they expected the Earl of Stratford there; and "that they hoped the Horse-Leeches should be harved for "want of blood: and in some of those letters there was "advice to the Cardinal to bestir himself betimes, to in"terrupt the height of the proceedings here in England.
"Also examinations of some Priests were taken in Lanca"shire, and sent up to London, which were there taken
"the third of May, which did testify, that the Priests
"did say, the Parliament should be suddenly dissolved
"For the army was to march up thither with all speed,
"and they would be seconded by forces out of France;
"and that Montague did write out of France to Mr. Percy,

"Percy (which was also intercepted) that if he did perform what he had undertaken, he would be made a Knight of the Garter."

Upon these depositions, the House of Commons passed the following votes against Percy, Jermin, and Suckling—

1. That in the months of March and April last, they did conspire to draw the army together, and employ the same against the Parliament, and by force and dread thereof, to compel the Parliament to agree to certain propositions by them contrived, and to hinder and interrupt the proceedings of the Parliament.

2. That in pursuance of the said design, they did endeavour to persuade divers Members of the House of Commons, and others, being Officers of the said army, that it is to say, Wilnot, Ashburnham, Berkley, Pollard, and O Neal, that they were disobliged by the Parliament, thereby to incense them against the Parliament; and did hold divers consultations with the said Parties, to effect the said wicked design; and to that purpose did set down in writing, certain propositions to the effect as followeth, viz. 1. The preferring of Bishops in their functions and votes. 2. The not disbanding of the Irish army, until the Scots were disbanded. 3. And the endeavouring to settle the King's revenue to the proportion it was formerly.

3. That for the more secret carriage of this Plot, they did administer to the said parties a wicked and unlawful oath, whereby they did swear upon the holy Evangelists, not to reveal any thing that was spoken concerning the business.

4. That they did propound and endeavour to persuade the persons before-named, and other officers of the army, to put the said army into a warlike posture, to bring them up to London, to make themselves sure of the Tower, and so by force to compel the Parliament to conform to their will: And they did endeavour to work a belief in the said army, that the King and Parliament would disagree; and that all the French about the city of London would assist them: And to the great scandal of the King, that the Prince and the Earl of Newcastle were to meet the army at Nottingham with a thousand Horse; that Suckling, to compass the design of gaining the Tower, did contrive that an hundred men, under Captain Billingly, should be designed for that purpose, when the opportunity was offered, to the end the city of London should not be able to make any resistance, when the said army should come up; and Suckling, by the means and plot aforesaid did thereby endeavour, that the Earl of Stratford, then prisoner in the Tower, might the better compass his escape."

Besides the fore-mentioned depositions, here is a testimony of one of the chief conspirators, of which the Parliament made great use. It is Percy's Letter after his flight into France, to his Brother the Earl of Northumberland.

WHAT with my own innocence, and the violence I hear is against me, I find my self much distracted. I will not ask your counsel, because it may bring prejudice upon you; but I will with all faithfulness and truth tell you what my part hath been, that at least it may be declared by you, whatsoever becomes of me.

When there was fifty thousand pounds ready, designed by the Parliament for the English army, there was, as I take it, a sudden demand by the Scots at the same time of twenty-five thousand pounds, of which there was fifteen thousand pounds ready; this they pressed with such necessity, as the Parliament, after an order made, did think it fit for them to deduct ten thousand pounds out of the fifty thousand pounds formerly granted: Upon which the Soldiers in our House were much scandalized; amongst which I was one, and sitting by Wilnot and Ashburnham, Wilnot stood up, and told them, if that the Scots could thus procure money, he doubted not but the Officers of the English army might easily do the like. But the first order was reversed notwithstanding, and ten thousand pounds given to the Scots. This was the cause of many discourses of dislike amongst us, and came to this purpose, that they were disobliged by the Parliament, and not by the King: This being said often to one another, we did resolve, Wilnot, Ashburnham, Pollard, O Neal, and my self, to make some expressions of serving the King in all things he would command us, that were honourable for him and us, being likewise agreeing to the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, that so far we would live and dye with him; this was agreed upon with us, not having any communication with others, that I am coupled now withal: And further, by their joint consent, I was to tell his Majesty thus much from them; but withal, I was to order the matter so as the King might apprehend this as a great Service done unto him at this time, when his affairs were in so ill a condition, and they were most confident, that they would engage the whole army thus far; but further they would undertake nothing, because they would neither infringe the liberties of the Subjects, nor destroy the Laws; to which I and every one consented; and having their sense, I drew the heads up in a Paper, which they all approved when I read it; and then we did, by an oath, promise one another to be constant and secret in all this, and did all of us take that oath together: Then, I said, well, Sirs, I must now be informed what your particular desires are, that so I may be the better able to serve you; which they were pleased to do; and so I did very faithfully serve them therein as far as I could. This is the truth, and all the truth upon my soul, in particular discourses.

After that we did fall upon the petitioning to the King and Parliament for moneys, there being so great arrears due to us, and so much delays made in the procuring of them; but that was never done.

1. Concerning the Bishops functions and votes.

2. The not disbanding of the Irish army, until the Scots were disbanded too.

3. The endeavouring to settle his Majesty's revenue to that proportion it was formerly (1).

And it was resolved by us all, if the King should require our assistance in those things, that as far as we could, we might contribute thereunto, without breaking the Laws of the Kingdom; and in case the King should be denied these things being put to them, we would not fly from him: All these persons did act and concur in this as well as I. This being all imparted to the King by me from them, I perceived he had been treated with by others, concerning some things of our army; which agreed not with what was purposed by me, but inclined a way more sharp and high, not having limits either of honour or law. I told the King, he might be pleased to consider with himself, which way it was fit for him to hearken unto; for us, we were resolved not to depart from our grounds; we should not be displeased, whosoever they were, but the particular of the designs, or the persons, we desired not to know; though it was no hard matter to guess at them. In the end, I believe the danger of the one, the justice of the other, made the King tell me, he would leave all thoughts of other propositions but ours, as things not practicable; but desired, notwithstanding, that Goring and Jermin, who were acquainted with the other proceedings, should be admitted amongst us. I told him, I thought the other gentry would never consent to it, but I would propose it; which I did, and we were all much against it: But the King did press so much, as at the last it was consented unto; and Goring and Jermin came to my chamber; there I was appointed to tell them, after they had sworn to secrecy, what we had proposed; which I did. But before I go into the debate of the way, I must tell you, Jermin and Goring were very earnest Suckling should be admitted; which we did all decline, and I was desired by all our men to be resolute in it, which I was, and gave many reasons: Whereupon Mr. Goring made answer, he was engaged with Mr. Suckling his being employed in the army; but for his meeting with us, they were contented to pass it by: Then we took up again the ways which were proposed; which took great debate, and theirs differed from ours in violence and heat; which we all protested against, and parted, disagreeing totally, yet remitted it to be spoken of by me and Jermin to the King, which we both did; and the King, constant to his former resolutions, told him, these ways were all vain and foolish, and he would think of them no more. I omit one thing of Mr. Goring, he desired to know how the chief Commanders were to be disposed of; for if he had not a condition worthy of him, he would not go along with us. We made answer, That no body thought of that; we intended, if we were sent down, to go all in the same capacity we were in. He did not like that by any means, and by that did work so with Mr. Chudleigh, that there was a letter sent by some of the Commanders to make him Lieutenant-general: And when he had ordered this at London, and Mr. Chudleigh had his instructions, then did he go to Portsmouth, pretending to be absent when this was working: We all desired my Lords of Essex and Holland; but they said, if there were a General, they were for Newcastle: They were pleased to give report, that I should be General of the Horse. But I 1641. "now they are certainly such, as all loyal hearts ought to acquiesce in with thankfulness; which we do with all humility, and do at this time, with as much earnestness as any, pray and wish, that the Kingdom may be settled in peace and quietness, and that all men may, at their own homes, enjoy the blessed fruits of your wisdom and justice.

"But it may please your excellent Majesty, and this High Court of Parliament, to give us leave, with grief and anguish of heart, to represent unto you, that we hear that there are certain persons stirring and pragmatical, who instead of rendering glory to God, thanks to your Majesty, and acknowledgment to the Parliament, remain yet as unsatisfied and mutinous as ever; who, whilst all the rest of the Kingdom are arrived even beyond their wishes, at daily forging new and unreasonable demands; who, whilst all men of reason, loyalty and moderation, are thinking how they may provide for your Majesty's honour and plenty, in return of so many graces to the Subject, are still attempting new diminutions of your Majesty's just regalities, which ever must be no less dear to all honest men, than our own freedoms; in fine, men of such turbulent Spirits, as are ready to sacrifice the honour and welfare of the whole Kingdom to their private fancies, whom nothing else than a subversion of the whole frame of Government will satisfy: Far be it from our thoughts to believe, that the violence and unreasonableness of such kind of persons can have any influence upon the prudence and justice of the Parliament. But that which begets the trouble and disquiet of our loyal hearts, at this present, is, that we hear those ill-affected persons are backed in their violence, by the multitude and the power of raising tumults; that thousands flock at their call, and beset the Parliament, and Whitehall itself; not only to the prejudice of that freedom which is necessary to great Councils and Judicatories, but possibly to some personal danger of your sacred Majesty, and the Peers.

"The vast consequences of these persons malignity, and of the Licentiousness of those multitudes that follow them, considered in most deep care and zealous affection for the safety of your sacred Majesty, and the Parliament; our humble petition is, that in your wisdom you would be pleased to remove such dangers, by punishing the Ringleaders of these tumults, that your Majesty and the Parliament may be secured from such incursions hereafter. For the suppressing of which, in all humility we offer our selves to wait upon you (if you please) hoping we shall appear as considerable in the way of defence to our gracious Sovereign, the Parliament, our Religion, and the established Laws of the Kingdom, as what number soever shall audaciously presume to violate them: So shall we, by the wisdom of your Majesty and the Parliament, not only be vindicated from precedent innovations, but be secured from the future, that are threatened, and likely to produce more dangerous effects than the former.

And we shall pray, &c.

Give me leave to make some remarks on this Petition, in order to shew, that it cannot be the same that was communicated to the King, and subscribed by him with the letters C. R. in token of his approbation.

In the first place, it evidently appears, this was drawn up at London, at the very time when the multitudes repaired to Westminster, which happened not till the third and fourth of May, there having been no such concourse of people before, and this lasting only two days. But it will be seen hereafter, that the King himself said, that this Petition, which he signed with C. R. was brought to him from the army, and that after having read it, he approved of it, as being very innocent. If the Petition communicated to the King, had been prepared in the army, it cannot be this, since those that penned it, could not foresee the riotous assemblies at Westminster on the third and fourth of May, which however they speak of as then in being. And if it was drawn at London, as 'tis very likely, it cannot be that which was communicated to the King, since he affirmed, it was brought to him from the army.

It will be said perhaps, that this Petition might be prepared at London the third or fourth of May, at the time of the concourse, that it was sent to the army, and then brought back to London to be communicated to the King.

But allowing only a fortnight for those Journeys from London to York, and from York to London, and for communicating it to the officers dispersed in different quarters about the country, the Petition would have come too late to the King, and have been entirely useless, since the riots were ceased, the Earl of Strafford dead, and the King had passed the Bill for the continuance of the Parliament. It would have been therefore very preposterous for the King to approve of this Petition at such a juncture.

Secondly, the Earl of Clarendon intimates, this Petition was projected and drawn long before the third and fourth of May, by the very officers who were afterwards accused of the conspiracy. He says, after the King had subscribed it, it was carried down to the army, and signed by some officers, but was suddenly quashed, and no more heard of till the discovery of the pretended plot, of which more in its place. This is a clear evidence, that the Petition the King subscribed with C. R. had been communicated long before the third or fourth of May, the day of the discovery of the plot. But if this be so, how could the authors of the Petition speak of the riots on the third and fourth of May, as actually in being? The Petition subscribed by the King cannot therefore be the same that the Lord Clarendon has inserted in his History.

T. I. p. 192.

In the third place, the officers who intended to gain the army to the King, and who, according to the Lord Clarendon, projected likewise the Petition to the King and Parliament which was approved by his Majesty, proposed as their end, to preserve the Bishops votes and functions, to hinder the disbanding the Irish army till that of the Scots was disbanded too, and to settle the King's revenues. But in the petition above, there is no mention of any of these articles (1).

Lastly, it will hereafter be seen, that the King to justify his signing the Petition, said, nothing more was required in it, than the settling of the Government upon the same foot as under Queen Elizabeth. But in the Petition given us by the Lord Clarendon as subscribed by the King, there is nothing like it, Elizabeth not being named in it (2).

Before I conclude this matter, I must not forget what Denotes concerning Percy's Letter, Clarendon, T. I. p. 210, 212, c. Before I conclude this matter, I must not forget what has been said concerning Percy's letter to his brother the Earl of Northumberland. 'Tis pretended that Percy, endeavouring to escape into France, was known at the sea-side, and wounded by some persons who would have stopped him: That getting from them; and flying to the Earl of Northumberland's, that Lord prevailed with some of the leading Men of the Commons, [particularly Mr. Pym] that his brother's escape should be connived at, on condition he would write the letter above-mentioned, as if it was writ in France. It is easy to perceive, that hereby the relation in that letter is designed to be rendered suspected of falshood. But I don't find, it is positively affirmed, or that any proofs are produced to discover the forgery. The whole amounts to a bare assertion, that the Plot in question was a fiction, a chimera, an impossibility: That the Parliament curtailed the depositions of the witnesses, omitting every thing that served to justify the King: That the conferences in Percy's chamber, were free conversations between friends, of whom some were Members of Parliament: That the depositions of the witnesses were fitter to demonstrate there was never any conspiracy to seduce the army, than to prove there was really any such thing. But upon the whole, we must take, as good proofs the bare assertion of those who relate these facts, which they have not cleared in the least (3).

As the King was frequently reproached with this conspiracy afterwards, I thought it necessary to give a just idea of the thing, that the Reader may be the better able to judge of the objections and answers I shall have frequent occasion to mention. It is time now to proceed to the Lord Strafford's Trial.

If it is not supposed, that Charles I. from the beginning of his reign to the time of this last Parliament, had formed a design to establish in England an arbitrary Government, it will be almost impossible to understand his History, and particularly this second part. But, upon this supposition, which to me appears incontestable, all difficulties vanish. It is not surprizing to see the King's Council, his Ministers, Favorites, the Star-Chamber, High-Commission, Judges of the realm, in a word, all persons in publick employments, intent upon one single point, I mean, the stretching of the Royal authority as far as lay in their power. It is not surprizing to see the implacable hatred

The Earl of Strafford's Trial.

(1) Whitehead's account of this matter is thus: The Officers put themselves into a Junto of sworn Secrecy, drew up some heads by way of Petition to the King and Parliament, For Money for the Army, Not to disband before the Scots. To preserve Bishops Votes and Functions. To settle the King's Revenues. The Army being tainted from hence, met, and drew up a Letter, or Petition, which was showed to the King, and approved and signed by him with C. R. and a direction to Captain Legg, that none should see it but Sir Jacob Ashley, the main drift was, That the Army might be called up to attend the safety of the King's Person, and Parliament's Security, or that both Armies might be disbanded. Memorials, p. 46.

(2) The Lord Clarendon says, That Goring, who proposed the marching of the Army to London, being disgusted at having that proposal rejected and ridiculed, did, the same, or the next day, whereon he had proposed it, discover all, and more than had passed, to the Earl of Strafford, and the Lords Say, and Kimbolton, but as dangerous as the design was afterwards alleged to be, it was not however communicated to the Parliament till about three Months after. Clarendon, Tom. I. p. 195.

(3) Mr. Naïon, who took upon him to justify the King against the false Accusations of his Enemies, as he says himself in his Introduction, passes over this Article very slightly. See the end of Vol. I. of his Collections. Rapin.

1641, of the House of Commons to the King's Ministers, and particularly to those who were most trusted by his Majesty, and believed the chief authors of the publick evils. Among these, the Earl of Strafford was considered as the most dangerous, because the most able, and because his two high posts of President of the Court of York, and Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, afforded him frequent occasions to serve the King effectually, and assist him to execute his designs. Accordingly he was the first the Commons attacked, eight days after the opening of the Parliament. The impeachment and trial of this Lord, contains many remarkable things, some whereof are, as I may say, above the comprehension of foreigners, by reason of the great difference between the Laws and Customs of England, and those of other States. It would therefore be too difficult a task for me to undertake to give a particular account of all the circumstances of this famous Trial, which have been collected in a large volume in Folio. For this reason I shall content myself with giving a general idea of it, such as I shall think proper to satisfy the Reader's curiosity.

There is, no doubt, when the Commons impeached the Earl of Strafford, his ruin was resolved by the leading men of that House. The Earl being looked upon as the most powerful, and most in favour of all the King's Ministers, and as the principal author of the miseries of the Kingdom, this was sufficient to make it thought requisite to sacrifice him to the publick. I do not think it necessary to seek other motives of this resolution, or to ascribe it to more secret causes. Since the Parliament undertook to redress grievances, and restore the Government to its ancient state, nothing was more natural than to punish such as had helped to unhinge it, and among these the Earl of Strafford was the principal, and consequently, the fittest to serve for example to those, who should in time to come, engage in the like enterprize. But besides this, he had made himself many enemies, by his imperious behaviour, to which great Ministers, who are secure of their master's favour, are generally too liable. Moreover, he had deserted the People's interests, after having strongly supported it whilst a Member of the House of Commons, and devoted himself entirely to the King. This sufficed to render him odious, and the Commons, when they impeached him, knew they could not do any thing more grateful to the People. He was therefore accused of High-Treason, not that in the short time, since the opening of the Parliament, the Commons could have any certainty of his being guilty of that crime, but upon a certain publick evidence, and the inward conviction of most of the Members. After his being sent to the Tower upon this impeachment, the House considered of the articles on which they were to ground his accusation, and when they were brought to the Lords, proofs were sought to support them (1).

These articles, to the number of twenty eight, tended to prove in general, that the Earl of Strafford had endeavoured to subvert the fundamental Laws of the State, and establish an arbitrary power. So, though each of the pretended crimes, whereof he was accused, could not be accounted High-Treason, the House pretended, that altogether manifestly shewed his design, and the means he had employed to accomplish it. The substance of the twenty eight articles, is as follows: (2):

Earl of Strafford,
J. 1640-1.
Rushworth,
T. VIII.
Nelson,
T. II. p. 10.

I. That he being President of the King's Council in the north parts of England, had procured to himself a commission, with instructions annexed, whereby power was given to him, to determine all offences, suits, &c. within certain precincts therein specified, and in such manner as the said instructions did appoint, according to the proceedings of the Star-Chamber. By virtue of which commission, he had exercised an exorbitant and unlawful jurisdiction over the persons and estates of his Majesty's subjects in those parts, to their ruin.

II. That at the Assizes held for the County of York, he did publicly declare and publish before the people, that some of the Justices were all for law, and nothing would please them but law; but they should find, That the King's little finger should be heavier than the laws of the law.

III. That being Lord-deputy of Ireland, he did say in a publick Speech, That Ireland was a conquered nation, and that the King might do with them what he pleased: And speaking of the Charters of former Kings of England, made to the City of Dublin, he further then 1641. said, That their Charters were nothing worth, and did bind the King no farther than he pleased.

IV. That Richard, Earl of Cork, a Peer of Ireland, having sued out process in course of Law, for recovery of his possessions, from which he was put, by colour of an order made by the Lord Strafford, and the Council; he, the said Lord Strafford, threatened the said Earl to imprison him, unless he would surcease his suit, and said, that he would have neither law nor lawyers dispute or question his orders.

That the said Earl of Cork having contested the validity of an order of Council made in Ireland, in the time of King James I, the Lord Strafford had said, That he would make the said Earl and all Ireland know, that so long as he had the government of that Kingdom, any act of State there made, or to be made, should be as binding to the Subjects of that Kingdom, as an act of Parliament. And that he did sundry other times, and upon sundry other occasions, by his words and speeches, arrogate to himself a power above the fundamental laws, and established government of that Kingdom, and scorned the said laws and established government.

V. That he did give, and procure to be given, against the Lord Mountnorris, (then a Peer of Ireland, Vice-Treasurer, and Receiver-general of that Kingdom, and Treasurer at war, and one of the principal Secretaries of State, and keeper of the Privy-Signet of the said Kingdom,) a sentence of death by a Council of war, called together by the said Earl of Strafford, without any warrant, or authority of law, or offence deserving any such punishment.

And he the said Earl, did also at Dublin, without any legal or due proceedings, or trial, give, and cause to be given, a sentence of death against one other of his Majesty's subjects; and caused him to be put to death in execution of the same sentence.

VI. That without any legal proceedings, and upon a Paper-petition, he did cause the said Lord Mountnorris to be dis seized and put out of his manor of Tymore in the Kingdom of Ireland; the said Lord Mountnorris having been eighteen years before in quiet possession thereof.

VII. That he did cause a case, commonly called the case of Tenures upon defective Titles, to be made and drawn up, without any jury or trial, or other legal process, and without the consent of parties, and did then procure the Judges of the realm of Ireland to deliver their opinions and resolutions to that case, and by colour of such opinion, did, without any legal proceeding, cause Thomas Lord Dillon, and many others, to be put out of the possession of divers Lands and Tenements, whereby many of his Majesty's subjects, and their families, were utterly undone.

VIII. That without any legal process, he had made a decree or order against Adam Viscount Loftus, a Peer, and Lord-Chancellor of Ireland, and did cause the said Viscount to be imprisoned, on pretence of disobedience to the said decree or order. That afterwards, without any authority, he required and commanded the said Lord Viscount to yield up unto him the Great Seal of the realm of Ireland, which was then in his custody, by his Majesty's command, and imprisoned the said Chancellor for not obeying such his command.

That he did imprison George, Earl of Kildare, thereby to enforce him to submit his title to the manor and lordship of Castle-leigh in the Queen's County, being of great yearly value, to the said Earl of Strafford's will and pleasure, and kept him a year prisoner for the said cause; and refused to enlarge him, notwithstanding his Majesty's letters for his enlargement to the said Earl of Strafford directed.

That upon a Petition exhibited to him against Dame Mary Hibbotts, Widow; the said Earl of Strafford recommended the said Petition to the Council-table of Ireland, where the most part of the Council gave their vote and opinion for the said Lady; but the said Earl finding fault herewith, caused an order to be entered against the said Lady, and threatened her, that if she refused to submit thereto, he would imprison her, and fine her five hundred pounds; that if she continued obstinate, he would continue her imprisonment, and double her fine every month; by means whereof she was enforced to relinquish her estate in the lands questioned

(1) The Committee appointed to draw the Articles of Accusation against him, were, Mr. Whitch, the Chief Justice, the Lord Digby, Sir Walter Earl, Mr. Pym, Hampden, Hollis, Steuart, Selden, St. John, Mynard, Palmer, Glyn, Whitlock, p. 59.

(2) These Articles filed two hundred Sheets of Paper. As some of the Treasons charged upon him were of fourteen years standing, the Earl desired three months time to make his answer, but was allowed only till the 24th of February. Whitlock, p. 60. — The chief manager during the whole Trial was Mr. Pym, of whom Dr. Wood, tells the following story. When the Earl, then only Sir Thomas Wentworth, was upon making his peace with the Court, he gave Pym some obscure intimation of it. Pym understanding his drift, flung it in this expression, "You need not tell all that art to tell me, that you have a mind to leave us. But remember what I tell you, you are going." — "I am not," said he; and remember, that though you leave us now, I will never leave you while your Head is upon your Shoulders." Memoirs, p. 45.

1641. " in the said Petition, which shortly after were conveyed to Sir Robert Meredith, to the use of the said Earl of Strafford.

" That the said Earl, in like manner, did imprison divers others of his Majesty's subjects, upon the like pretences, &c.

" IX. That the said Earl, assuming to himself a power above and against law, took upon him, by a general warrant under his hand, to give power to the Lord Bishop of Down and Connor, his Chancellor, &c. to attach and arrest the bodies of all such of the meaner and poorer sort, who after citation should either refuse to appear before them, or appearing, should omit or deny to perform, or undergo all lawful decrees, sentences, and orders imposed, or given out against them, and them to commit and keep in the next goal, until they should either perform such sentences, or put in sufficient bail, to shew some reason before the Council-table, of such their contempt and neglect.

" X. That he had procured the customs of the merchandise exported out, and imported into Ireland, to be farmed to his own use. And, to advance his own gain and lucre, did cause and procure the native commodities of that Kingdom, to be rated in the book of rates for the customs, according to which the customs were usually gathered, at far greater values and prices than in truth they were worth; that is to say, every hide at twenty Shillings, which in truth was worth but five Shillings, every stone of wool at thirteen Shillings and four-pence, tho' the same were really worth but five Shillings, at the utmost nine; by which means the custom, which before was but a twentieth part of the true value of the commodity, was enhanced sometimes a fifth part, and sometimes to a fourth, and sometimes to a third part of the true value.

" XI. That the said Earl did refrain the exportation of the commodities of the Kingdom of Ireland, without his licence; and then raised great sums of money for licences of exportation of those commodities, and dispensation of the said restraints imposed on them, by which means those commodities were raised above half in half.

" XII. That under colour to regulate the importation of Tobacco into Ireland, he did issue a Proclamation, prohibiting the importation of Tobacco into that Kingdom; after which restraint, the said Earl caused divers great quantities of Tobacco to be imported to his own use: That if any Ship brought Tobacco into any port there, the said Earl and his agents used to buy the same to his own use, at their own price; and if the owners refused to let him have the same at undue values, then they were not permitted to vent the same there; by which undue means, the said Earl having gotten the whole trade of Tobacco into his own hands, he sold it at great and excessive prices.

" That by a Proclamation he commanded, that none should put to sale any Tobacco by wholesale, but what should be made up into rolls, and the same sealed with two seals by himself appointed, one at each end of the roll: And such as was not sealed to be seized, appointing six-pence the pound for a reward to such persons as should seize the same. Which Proclamation was rigorously put in execution, by seizing the goods, fining, imprisoning, whipping, and putting the offenders in the pillory. And though he enhanced the customs, where it concerned the merchants in general, yet he drew down the impost formerly taken on Tobacco, from six-pence to three-pence the pound, it being for his own profit so to do.

" That he raised several other monopolies and unlawful exactions for his own gain, viz. on starch, iron-pots, glasses, tobacco-pipes, &c.

" XIII. That flax being one of the principal and native commodities of Ireland, the said Earl having gotten great quantities thereof into his hands, and growing on his own lands, did issue out several Proclamations, prescribing and enjoining the working of flax into yarn and thread, and the ordering of the same in such ways wherein the natives of that Kingdom were unpractised, and unskilful; and the flax wrought or ordered in other manner than as the said Proclamation prescribed, was seized and employed to the use of him and his agents, and thereby the said Earl did gain, in effect, the sole sale of that native commodity.

" XIV. That the said Earl, by Proclamation, did impose upon the owners, masters, purfers, and boatswains of every ship, a new and unlawful oath, viz. That they, immediately after the arrival of any ship within any port or creek in the Kingdom of Ireland, should give in a true invoice of the outward bulk of wares and merchandizes first laden aboard them, together with the several marks and number of goods, and their qualities and condition, the names of the several merchants, proprietors of the said goods, and the place from whence they were freighted, and whither they were bound, &c.

" XV. That by his own authority, without any warrant or colour of Law, he did tax and impose great sums of money upon divers towns and places in Ireland; and did cause the same to be levied upon the inhabitants of those towns by troops of soldiers, with force of arms, in a warlike manner; and sent such numbers of soldiers to lie on the lands and houses of such as would not conform to his orders, until they should render obedience to his said orders; and this he did at several times, and in divers places, by which means he levied war within the said realm against his Majesty and his liege people of that Kingdom.

" XVI. That the said Earl did make a proposition, and obtained from his Majesty an allowance thereof, That no complaint of injustice or oppression done in Ireland, should be received in England against any, unless it appeared, that the party made first his address to him the said Earl. And to prevent the subjects of that realm of all means of complaints to his Majesty, and of redress against him and his agents, he did issue a Proclamation; thereby commanding all the nobility, undertakers and others, who held estates and offices in the said Kingdom, to make their personal residence in the said Kingdom of Ireland, and not to depart thence without licence of himself; which Proclamation the said Earl had by several rigorous ways, as by fine, imprisonment, and otherwise, put in execution; by means whereof the subjects of that realm were restrained from seeking relief against the oppressions of the said Earl.

" XVII. That speaking of the army in Ireland, he did declare, That his Majesty was so well pleased with the army of Ireland, and the consequences thereof, that his Majesty would certainly make the same a pattern for all his three Kingdoms.

" XVIII. That, in order to draw dependency upon himself, of the Papists in both Kingdoms of England and Ireland, during the time of his Government in Ireland, he restored divers Frieries and Mass-houses, (which had been formerly suppressed by the precedent Deputies of that Kingdom; two of which houses are in the City of Dublin, and had been assigned to the use of the University there) to the pretended owners thereof.

" That in the months of May and June last, the said Earl did raise an army in Ireland, consisting of eight thousand foot, all of which, except one [thousand] or thereabouts were Papists; and the said one thousand were drawn out of the old army there, and in their places there were a thousand Papists put into the said old army by the said Earl.

" That the more to engage and tie the said new army of Papists to himself, and to encourage them, he did provide, That the said new army of Papists were duly paid, &c. but the said old army were, for the space of one whole year and upwards, unpaid.

" That being appointed a Commissioner within eleven several Counties of the northern parts of England, for compounding with Reculants for their forfeitures due to his Majesty; and being also receiver of the composition money thereby arising, he did compound with them at low and under rates, and provided, That they should be discharged of all proceedings against them in all his Majesty's Courts, both temporal and ecclesiastical, contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm.

" XIX. That he did of his own authority contrive and frame a new and unusual oath, by the purport whereof, the party taking the said oath, was to swear that he should not protest against any of his Majesty's royal commands, but submit himself in all due obedience thereunto. Which oath he enforced on the subjects of the Scottish nation, inhabiting in Ireland; and compelled divers of his Majesty's said subjects there, to take the said oath against their wills; and of such as refused to take it, some he grievously fined and imprisoned, and others he destroyed and exiled; namely, he fined Henry Steward and his wife, who refused to take the said oath, five thousand pounds a-piece, and their two daughters and James Gray, three thousand pounds a-piece, and imprisoned them for not paying the said fines.

" That he did upon that occasion declare, That the said oath did not only oblige them in point of Allegiance to his Majesty, and acknowledgment of his Supremacy only, but to the ceremonies and government of the Church established, and to be established by his Majesty's royal authority, and said, That the refusers to obey he would prosecute to the blood.

" XX. That he was the chief incendiary of the late war against the Scottish nation, by inciting and provoking his Majesty against his subjects of Scotland; and had declared 1641. declared and advised his Majesty, that the demands made by the Scots in their Parliament, were a sufficient cause of war against them: That he said, that the nation of the Scots were rebels and traitors; and he being then about to come to England, further said, That if it pleased his Majesty to send him back again, he would root out of the Kingdom of Ireland the Scottish nation both root and branch: That he had caused divers of the ships and goods of the Scots to be stayed, seized, and molested, to the intent to set on the war between the two nations.

“XXI. That at his arrival into England, finding that the Scots had imposed the troubles in the North, and made a pacification with his subjects of Scotland, he laboured by all means to procure his Majesty to break that pacification. And having incited his Majesty to an offensive war against his Scottish subjects, he counselled his Majesty to call a Parliament in England, yet he intended, that if the proceedings of that Parliament should be such, as should stand with his mischievous designs, he would then procure his Majesty to break the same; and by ways of force and power, to raise monies upon the Subjects of this Kingdom. And for the encouragement of his Majesty to hearken to his advice, he did before his Majesty and his Privy-Council, then sitting in Council, make a large declaration, that he would serve his Majesty in any other way, in case the Parliament should be such, as he desired.

“XXII. That before the beginning of the last Parliament, the said Earl of Strafford went into Ireland, and procured the Parliament of that Kingdom to declare their assistance in a war against the Scots, and gave directions for the raising of an army there, consisting of eight thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, being for the most part Papists, as aforesaid. And confederate with one Sir George Ratcliffe, did together with him traitorously conspire to employ the said army, for the ruin and destruction of the Kingdom of England, and of altering and subverting of the fundamental Laws, and established Government of that Kingdom.

“Shortly after, the said Earl returned into England, and to sundry persons declared his opinion to be, that his Majesty should not be troubled with the Scots, but that he did not supply him according to his occasions, he might use then his Prerogative as he pleased, to levy what he needed; and that he should be acquitted both of God and Man, if he took some other course, to supply himself, though it were against the wills of his Subjects.

“XXIII. That upon the thirteenth day of April last, the Parliament of England met, and the Commons House did enter into debate and consideration of the grievances of this Kingdom; he the said Earl of Strafford, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, did procure his Majesty, by sundry speeches and messages, to urge the said Commons House, to enter into some resolution for his Majesty's Supply, for maintenance of his war against his Subjects of Scotland, before any course taken for the relief of the grievances wherewith this Kingdom was then afflicted; whereupon a demand was then made from his Majesty of twelve Subsidies, for the release of Ship-money only. And while the said Commons were in debate and consideration concerning the same Supply, before any resolution by them made, the said Earl of Strafford, with the help and assistance of the said Archbishop, did procure his Majesty to dissolve the said Parliament; and upon the same day, the said Earl did endeavour to incense his Majesty against his Subjects, who had been Members of the said House of Commons, by telling his Majesty, they had denied to supply him; and afterwards upon the same day, did advise his Majesty to this effect, that having tried the affections of his People, he was loath and averse from all rules of Government; and that he was to do every thing that power would admit; and that his Majesty had tried all ways, and was refused, and should be acquitted towards God and man; and that he had an army in Ireland, which he might employ to reduce this Kingdom.

“XXIV. That in the same month of May, he declared before others of his Majesty's Privy-Council, That the Parliament of England had forsaken the King, and that in denying to supply the King, they had given him advantage to supply himself by other ways; and that he was not to suffer himself to be mastered by the forwardness and undutifulness of the

“And having so maliciously slandered the said late House of Commons, he did, with the help and advice of the said Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Lord Finch, late Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal of England, cause to be printed and published in his Majesty's name, a false and scandalous book, full of bitter and malicious “inveclives, entitled, His Majesty's Declaration of the Causes that removed him to dissolve the last Parliament.

“XXV. That not long after, he the said Earl of Strafford did advise the King to go on vigorously in levying the Ship-money, and did procure the Sheriffs of several Counties to be sent for, for not levying the Ship-money, divers of which were threatened by him, to be fured in the Star-Chamber.

“And a great loan of one hundred thousand pounds was demanded of the city of London, and the Lord-Mayor, and Sheriffs, and Aldermen of the said city, were often sent for by his advice to the Council-table, and required to certify the names of such inhabitants of the city as were fit to lend; which they with much humility refusing to do, he the said Earl of Strafford did use these and the like Speeches, viz. That they deserved to be put to fine and ransom; and that no good would be done with them, till an example were made of them, and that they were laid by the heels, and some of the Aldermen hanged up.

“XXVI. That the said Earl having brought his Majesty into excessive charge, without any just cause, did counsel and approve the two following dangerous and wicked projects, viz. “To seize upon the bullion, and the money in the mint: And to imbase his Majesty's coin, with the mixture of brass.

“And accordingly he procured one hundred and thirty thousand pounds, which was then in the mint; and belonging to divers merchants, strangers and others to be seized on, and paid to his Majesty's use. And when divers merchants of London, owners of the said bullion and money, came to his house, to let him understand the great mischief that course would produce here and in other parts; he the said Earl told them, That the city of London dealt undutifully and unthankfully with his Majesty; and that they were more ready to help the Rebels than to help his Majesty: and that it any hurt came to them they may thank themselves; and that it was the course of other Princes to make use of such moneys to serve their occasions.

“And when the Officers of his Majesty's mint came to him, and gave him divers reasons against the imbasing the said money; he told them, That the French King did use to send Commissioners of horse, with commission to search into men's Estates, and to peruse their accounts, that so they may know what to levy of them by force, which they did accordingly levy; and turning to the Lord Cottington then present, said, That this was a point worthy of his Lordship's consideration.

“XXVII. That he was made Lieutenant-general of all his Majesty's forces in the North; and being at York, he did, by his own authority, impose a tax on his Majesty's Subjects in the County of York of eight pence per diem, for maintenance of every folk of the trained-bands of that County; which sums of money he caused to be levied by force. And to compel his Majesty's Subjects out of fear to pay the same; he did declare, that he would commit them that refused the payment thereof, to the Tower of London, where they were in very little time to be executed.

“XXVIII. That being Lieutenant-general of his Majesty's army, he did not provide for the defence of the town of Newcastle as he ought to have done, but suffered the same to be lost, that so he might the more incense the English against the Scots.

“And for the same purpose he did write to the Lord Conway, the General of the horse, that he should fight with the Scottish army at the passage over the Tyne, whatsoever should follow; notwithstanding that the said Lord Conway had formerly by Letters informed the said Earl, that his Majesty's army, then under his command, was not of force sufficient to encounter the Scots.”

The Parliament of Ireland hearing the Earl of Strafford's Committee was in the Tower, immediately sent a Committee of both Houses to England, to lay before the Parliament Remonstrances concerning the grievances, endured by the Irish, under that Lord's administration. But as these Remonstrances contained little but what is mentioned in the twenty eight articles, I do not think it necessary to insert them.

This process was not ready to be tried till the 22d of March 1640-1, and lasted till the 12th of April. It would be too tedious to give a particular account of the proofs, depositions of the evidences, answers of the party accused upon each article, and replies of the Commons. To give a general idea of the thing, it will suffice to say in two words, that the impeachment running wholly upon the Earl of Strafford's pretended intention to subvert the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, the greatest part of the crimes he was accused of, could be accounted High-Treason but on supposition of this same intention. And therefore 1641. therefore the managers (1) insisted upon every one of the articles in order to prove this intention, maintaining that though each singly was not capable of proving it, they were however, when joined together, of the utmost evidence. But besides, that each of these articles was not equally well proved, it remained also to decide, whether the intention could render a man guilty of treason. The Counsel for the Earl of Strafford maintained that although by the Law, the bare intention of killing the King was High-Treason, it did not follow that the intention could be considered upon the same foot, with respect to other Treasons, which the Law had not explained in the same manner. On the other hand the Earl of Strafford showed that none of the particular crimes he was charged with could be deemed Treason, and that a hundred Felonies could never make one treasonable crime. But this dispute concerned only the Nature of the offence, in which the accused had a great advantage, especially if it be considered that in England, in criminal cases, the Judges are extremely careful not to mistake, and to attend only to what proves directly the Nature of the offence contained in the indictment. If the Commons had been satisfied with accusing the Earl of Strafford of Felony, or misdemeanours, very probably they would have obtained a speedy sentence against him. But having solely impeached him of High-Treason, it belonged to the Peers to condemn or acquit him solely upon that sort of offence. In the Reign of Edward VI. the Duke of Somerfet was accused of High Treason and Felony. He was acquitted as to the first, but condemned for the last.

The Earl of Strafford defended himself with all the ability, preference of mind, judgment and temper that could be expected from a person of his parts (2). Accordingly the Commons easily found that the Lords would hardly be induced to condemn him. And therefore they thought fit to take another course to accomplish their ends.

The 19th of April it was voted by the Commons, that the endeavour of the Earl of Strafford to subvert the fundamental Laws of the Realms of England and Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical Government in both those Kingdoms, was High-Treason. Two days after a Bill of Attainder was brought in against the Earl. The Bill was read twice in the morning, and the third time in the afternoon, and passed with the majority of 204 against 59, after which it was sent up to the Lords.

Among the opposers of the Bill, the Lord Digby distinguished himself by a very eloquent Speech, wherein he endeavoured to show, that to condemn the Earl of Strafford in that manner was a real murder (3). Great exceptions were taken at this Speech, and though the House seemed at first not much to regard it, they ordered, afterwards that it should be publicly burnt by the hangman.

The Bill of Attainder produced not the effect the Commons desired. The Lords were in no haste to examine it, or to answer the impatience of the Commons. They had a mind first to consider the arguments for and against the Bill. In this interval the Peers caused Sir William Balfour to be examined concerning the project of letting the Earl of Strafford escape. Several thousands of the inhabitants of London presented to both Houses a petition against the Earl, saying, he was sworn enemy of the City. The 29th of April Mr. St. John, in the name of the Commons, made a long Speech to the Lords to prove that the Bill of Attainder was not contrary to Law. May the 1st, the King came to the Parliament, and made the following Speech to both Houses.

My Lords,
“I Had not any intention to have spoken to you of this business this day, which is the great business of the “Earl of Strafford, because I would do nothing that might serve to hinder your occasions: But now it comes to pass, that seeing of necessity I must have part in the judgment, I think it most necessary for me to declare my conscience therein. I am sure you all know, that I have been present at the hearing of this great case, from the one end to the other (4), and I must tell you, That I cannot in my conscience condemn him of High-Treason; it is not fit for me to argue the particulars; I am sure you will not expect that. A positive Doctrine best becomes the mouth of a Prince: Yet I must tell you three great truths, which I am sure no body knows so well as my self. 1. That I never had any intention of bringing over the Irish army into England; nor ever was advised by any body so to do. 2. That there was never any debate before me, neither in public Council, nor at private Committee, of the disloyalty of my English Subjects, nor ever had I any suspicion of them. 3. I was never counselled by any to alter the least of any of the Laws of England, much less to alter all the laws. Nay, I must tell you this, I think no body durst ever be so impudent to move me in it; for if they had, I should have put such a mark upon them, and made them such an example, that all posterity should know my intentions by it; for my intention was ever to govern according to Law, and no otherwise (5). I desire to be rightly understood. I told you in my conscience I cannot condemn him of High Treason; yet I cannot say I can clear him of misdemeanours: Therefore I hope you may find a way to satisfy justice, and your own fears, and not press upon my conscience. My Lords, I hope you know what a tender thing Conscience is: Yet I must declare unto you, that to satisfy my People I would do great matters: But this of conscience, no fear, no respect whatsoever, shall ever make me go against it. Certainly I have not so ill deserved of the Parliament at this time, that they should press me in this tender point; and therefore I cannot expect that you will go about it.

“Nay, I must confess for matters of misdemeanours, I am so clear in that, that though I will not chalk out the way, yet let me tell you, that I do think my Lord Strafford is not fit hereafter to serve me, or the commonwealth, in any place of trust, no, not so much as that of a Constable. Therefore I leave it to you, my Lords, to find some such way as may bring me out of this great freight, and keep our selves, and the Kingdom from such great inconveniencies; certainly he that thinks him guilty of High-Treason in his conscience may condemn him of misdemeanours.”

This Speech produced a quite contrary effect to what the King had expected. Accordingly, the Earl of Clarendon intimates that the Lord Say advised the King to it, in order to draw him into a snare, and render the Earl of Strafford's ruin more certain (6). The Commons were highly offended with it, saying, it was an unprecedented thing, that the King should meddle with Bills before they were presented to him, and a means to take away the freedom of votes, and immediately adjourned till Monday, the 3d of May.

On that day it was that the rabble of London flocked to Westminster: And on the same day the House of Commons drew the Protestation before-mentioned, and on the morrow, the 4th of May, the Lords approved of the same, and [on the 7th] passed the Bill of Attainder of the Earl of Strafford, there being not above forty-six Lords in the House, of the fourscore who had constantly attended the trial (7). It is pretended that those who absented themselves, were terrified by the threats of the populace.

(1) They were, George Lord Digby, John Hampden, John Pym, Oliver St. John, Sir Walter Earl, Geoffrey Palmer, John Mainard, John Glyn. Thomas Howard Earl of Arundel was Lord High-Steward upon this occasion. The place of the Trial was Westminster Hall; to which a Theatre and Seats were erected for both Houses of Parliament, and for the Judges. The Members of the House of Commons sat uncovered: And the Lords in their Robes. Rushworth, Tom. 8. p. 40, 41. Whitelock, p. 41.

(2) Dr. Wood observes, that he expressed in his Defence, such nervous and moving flights of Eloquence, as came nothing short of the most celebrated pieces of Antiquity. This appeared from his summing up his long and arduous enterprise, with this pathetic conclusion: My Lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, more for the Interest of this poor Plaintiff, a Slave in Heaven has left me. At this he stopped, pointing to his Children that stood by the side of God, saying, that the Afflictions of this present Life, are not to be compared to that eternal weight of Glory which shall be revealed hereafter. And so, my Lords, even so, with all tranquillity of Mind, I leave to your Judgment, and sweetest that Judgment be of Life or Death, To whom Lausamus. p. 46. — See Whitelock observe, “That certainly never any Man added such a part, on such a Theatre, with more wisdom, composure, and eloquence, with greater reason, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and gestures, than this great and excellent Person did.”

(3) The Lord Digby in his Speech has these words: — “I am full the same in my Opinions and Affections as to the Earl of Strafford; I constantly believe him to be the most dangerous Minister, the most insupportable to me of any Subject that can be characterized. I believe his Pretences in themselves as high, as any man in the world, till he be dispatched to the other: And yet, let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, my hand must not be to that dispatch.” Thus far a Nuke, who for his Zeal to the Royal Cause, became the most obnoxious to the Parliament. Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 226. — The Reason, it seems, of his being against the Bill of Attainder, was, because he believed the Earl's advising the King to bring over the Army from Ireland to reduce this Kingdom, did not to the King's end of Scotland, and not to England, the thing then under debate, being how to reduce Scotland.

(4) At the Trial there was on the Stage, a Chair and Cloth of State for the King, on either side where I was a close Gallery for the King, Queen, and Prince to be present. In this place his Majesty remained all the time of the Trial. Whitelock, p. 41.

(5) It is very hard to conceive this Affection of the King's with his Government the full fifteen years of his Reign. Repin.

(6) When the Earl of Strafford was told with joy by his Friends, that the King had made him a warm speech in his favour to both Houses, he received it as his doom, and told them, “The King's Words had raised him, but that he had little else to do but to prepare himself for death.” Whitlock's Mem. p. 46.

(7) The Lord Clarendon says, of the forty-six, eleven only dissented. Tom. 1. p. 201. According to Whitelock, there were but forty-five, of whom twenty-six voted the Earl guilty of High-Treason, upon the 15th Article, For leaving twenty in Ireland by force, in a warlike manner. And upon the 15th Article, For pressing on Oaths upon the Subjects in Ireland. Mem. p. 45.

The King was then in the most uneasy situation. He loved the Earl of Strafford, and was convinced the Earl had done nothing but what was agreeable to his intentions and his maxims of Government. He might be guilty with regard to the People on many accounts, but certainly he was not so with respect to the King, who had always approved of his conduct. Besides, the King had proteſted in full Parliament, that he neither could nor would do any thing againſt his confidence, and that he did not believe in his confidence, the Earl was guilty. On the other hand, if he conſented to the Bill of attainder, after ſuch a declaration, he would ſhow that he was reduced to this extremity by the neceſſity of his affairs, ſo would not be thanked for it, and for the future would have nothing more to deny his Parliament. But in caſe he rejected the Bill, he plainly perceived the conſequences of his refusal, and that at leaſt he ſhould be accuſed of denying his People juſtice, contrary to the advice of both Houſes of Parliament.

It is not unlikely that in this extremity ſome one adviſed the King to diſſolve the Parliament. At leaſt, the Commons imagined he had no other way to free himſelf from his preſent embarraſſment. And therefore to deprive him of this refuge alſo, the ſame day, the 4th of May, they ordered the bringing in of a Bill for the continuance of the Parliament, that it might not be diſſolved without the conſent of both Houſes, which Bill was read thrice in two days (1), and paſſed three days after in the Upper Houſe, with the Bill of attainder of the Earl of Strafford. In theſe two or three days the Commons, as hath been ſaid, vigorously puſhed the affair of the Plot, to fill the People with fears, and force the Lords to paſs the two Bills.

The King of attainder having paſſed the Houſe of Lords, the King aſſembled his Privy-Council, and ſent for his Lawyers. He laid before them his ſcruples and reaſons for not conſenting to the Bill. But Juxon Biſhop of London was the only perſon that ventured to adviſe the King, to reject a Bill preſented to him by both Houſes. All the reſt endeavoured to perſwade him to ſatisfy his People, and that the life of any one perſon ought not to be put in the balance with the ſafety of the Kingdom. As to his ſcruples, they told him, he might conſult his Biſhops, who would give him the propereſt advice. The King met meeting with the ſatisfaction he expected from his Council, ſent for ſome Biſhops to adviſe with. It is affirmed, that Williams Archbiſhop of York ſaid to him on this occaſion, "That there was a private and a publick Confidence; that his publick Confidence as a King, might not only diſpenſe with, but oblige him to do that which was againſt his private Confidence as a man." And therefore in plain terms adviſed him, "even for confidence fake to paſs the Act (2)." But what contributed moſt to determine him, was a letter from the Earl of Strafford, who hearing of the ſtreights the King was in, humbly beſought him himſelf to paſs the Bill, to remove him out of the way towards a bliſſed agreement, which he doubted not God would for ever ſtabiliſh betwixt him and his Subjects. Adding, That his conſent would more acquit his Majeſty therein to God, than all the world could do beſides. To a willing man there is no injury. At laſt the King no longer able to withſtand the preſſing inſtances of the Parliament and his own counſellors, or rather the fear of the calamities he foreſaw would befall both himſelf and poſterity, if he reſuſed to conſent to the Bill, ſigned a Commiſſion to four Lords (3) to paſs it in his name (4).

By the ſame commiſſion he impowered theſe Lords to give the Royal aſſent to the Bill for the continuance of the Parliament, which was of much greater importance to him than the Earl of Strafford's life, but which however it does not appear that he much regarded, ſo full was he of the other. This Bill, which was of ſuch conſequence to the King, was brought in the 6th of May, and in five days paſſed both Houſes, and received the King's approbation, [on the 11th] as if it had been but a trifle.

On the 12th of May, the ſecond day after the Royal aſſent to the Bill of Attainder, the Earl of Strafford was executed, and ſuffered death with great conſtancy. It was then, and is ſtill at this time a ſubject of diſpute, whether he deſerved to loſe his head or not. Thoſe who are for him, ſay there needs only to examine the articles of accuſation, the evidences produced againſt him, and his answers, to be convinced that he was not guilty of High-Treaſon. That the conviction of his accuſers themſelves is a further proof, who perceiving they could not expect from the Lords a ſentence according to their wiſh, uſed ſo many extraordinary means, to compaſs their end. Firſt, the change of the judicial accuſation into a Bill of Attainder. Secondly, the tumultuous concourſe of the people. Thirdly, the diſcovery made to the Houſe of Commons of the pretended conſpiracy, precieſly at this juncture, though it had been long neglected (5). In the fourth place, the Proteſtation, the ſole deſign whereof was to terrify the people, and incenſe them againſt the King and his party. Laſtly, the violence uſed to the Lords, to extort their conſent to the Bill, and which obliged many to abſent themſelves, to avoid being expoſed to the fury of the people. It is pretended, all this ſhows that the Commons themſelves did not believe him guilty, ſince they uſed ſo many artifices to take away his life.

They who are againſt him, ſay, It cannot be denied, that the King had formed a deſign to eſtabliſh an arbitrary Government, and aſſumed to himſelf a power contrary to law. That he had made choice of ſuch Miniſters and Counſellors as he thought moſt proper to ſerve him in the execution of his deſign. That from the King's Council had proceeded all the oppreſſions ſo long complained of by the People, and conſequently the King's Miniſters and Counſellors could not be innocent, unleſs theſe oppreſſions, which were as clear as the ſun, were denied. That the Earl of Strafford was univerſally known to be the chief of theſe Miniſters, and the perſon in whom the King moſt confiſted, and to hold the firſt place in the ſecret Council, called the Junto, conſiſting of four or five perſons only, where all the reſolutions were taken for the oppreſſion of the Subjects. That he could not be ſuppoſed to be againſt all theſe reſolutions, ſince his arriving to ſo high a degree of favour, was entirely owing to his attachment to the King's will. That it was no leſs evident, that in his three great poſts of Privy-Counſellor, Preſident of the North, and Lord Deputy of Ireland, he had always carried himſelf agreeably to the King's principles and maxims, though he knew theſe principles were contrary to the law. That all his endeavours tended to increaſe the King's revenues, and extend his Prerogative, by all methods, even the moſt irregular. That in England, obedience to the King's orders does not excuſe the Miniſters in illegal proceedings. That therefore it muſt either be deny'd that the King ever did any thing contrary to law, or be confeſſed, that his Miniſters, and eſpecially the chief, were not innocent of theſe violations. That the ſtreſs of the Commons accuſation did not lye ſo much upon each particular article, as upon all together, to ſhow that the Earl of Strafford really intended to eſtabliſh an arbitrary Government. That every article was a proof of this intention, and it was a deluſion to repreſent them as being each ſingly a ſeparate charge of ſome particular crime. That this intention, joined to the manner of exercising the power given him by the King, was an unpardonable crime, ſince it tended to ſubvert all the Laws, and alter the Conſtitution. That it was not the ſame with the intention of ſubverting the laws, as with the intention of committing any other offence, even Treaſon itſelf. That theſe laſt, when committed, may be puniſhed by the Laws: but if the intention of ſubverting the Laws be not puniſhable till put in execution, there is no remedy; aboliſhed Laws not being of any uſe. That upon theſe grounds, Parliaments had at all times, puniſhed ſeveral Miniſters for this reaſon. In ſhort, that an example being neceſſary to deter Miniſters for the future from devoting themſelves ſo entirely to the King's will, to oppreſs the Subject, there could not be a better for that purpoſe than the Earl of Strafford, whole power had made every one tremble, and who beides was the object of the publick hatred, and the whole nation conſidering him as the chief author of their miſeries.

I ſhall add here, to finiſh what relates to the Earl of Strafford, that not long after his death, this ſame Par-

(1) This Bill was brought into the Houſe of Commons, the next Morning after it was propoſed, and the ſame day it was perfected, and paſſed the Houſe. The firſt motion for this Bill was made by a Lawſhire Knight, who offered to procure the King 650,000 l. till the Subjects ſhould be raiſed; if he would paſs ſuch a Bill. Whitelock, p. 45. The pretended reaſon of making ſuch a Law was, That the great Sum of Money which the Jews were to have, ſhould not ſuddenly be raiſed; and that being to be borrowed for their preſent uſance, lenders would hardly be found, unleſs they law a certain way to ſecure their Money, which the danger of diſſolving this Parliament would hazard. Dugdale's View, p. 70. Clarendon, Tom. 1. p. 204.

(2) Biſhop Hacker gives a different account of this particular. See Part II. p. 162. — Williams was not made Archbiſhop of York till ſome months after this.

(4) Notwithſtanding his Letter to the King, when his Majeſty ſent Secretary Carleton to the Earl, to acquaint him with what was done, and the Motives of it, the Earl ſeriouſly aſked the Secretary, Whether his Majeſty had paſſed the Bill or not? As not believing, without ſome aſſent, that the King would have done ſo. And being again aſſured that it was paſſed, he roſe from his Chair, lift up his Eyes to Heaven, laid his Hands on his Heart, and ſaid, Put me your Truſt in Prayers, and the ſixth of May, for in them there is no Salvation. Whitelock, p. 46. The ſame Author adds, it was reported, that in order to bring the King to ſign the Bill, he was promiſed, the Earl's life ſhould be ſpared.

(5) From the middle of April, till May 3. See Clarendon, Tom. 1. p. 196.

1641. Parliament passed an Act for restoring his children in blood and honour, and for settling his estate upon his heirs (1), and that the Act of Attainder was repealed in the reign of Charles II. I do not believe that ever any English Subject has had so many praises bestowed on him as the Earl of Strafford. Several, in speaking of him, have not been able to forbear adding always to his name, some honorable epithet, to show their esteem for him. In a word, he is represented as one of the greatest men, one of the most accomplished Ministers England ever produced. I do not pretend by any means to question his natural or acquired abilities. But I own, when I consider his life and actions, I do not see what can serve for foundation to such exalted encomiums. In the first place, after he was in favour, the King had no quarrel with any foreign State. So, he had no opportunity to display his talents in negotiations and embassies. As to war, he was employed but once, in the late war with Scotland, in quality of Lieutenant-general, commanding the army in the absence of the General. On this occasion he may be said, to commit a very great error, in not being ready to oppose the Scots passage of the Tyne, and in suffering them to take Newcastle, if perhaps it was not designedly done, to engage inevitably the two nations in a war, which certainly can be matter of no great commendation. It must therefore be owned, that his talents were confined to the discharge of his Posts or Employments. As to that I find he was accused of having prevaricated, and entirely devoted himself to accomplish the King's design of setting up an arbitrary Government. Suppose this were a slander, and he had never any such thought, I do not see, however, that his innocence can be matter of praise to him, any more than to many others who had been in the same posts before him. What then did he perform in the administration of his offices, to deserve the character of an accomplished Minister, and the name of a great Man, which is generally given him? If it is said, that he made use of his great talents to serve the King faithfully, and promote his designs, which doubtless is the sole foundation of the encomiums bestowed on him, it is to be feared, many will not allow that he ought to have served the King in that manner, or that he did him any real service, as the event has shown. The great praises therefore given to the Earl of Strafford, must be considered only as a sensible proof of the principles of his panegyrists, who perhaps are very sorry he succeeded no better.

The death of the Earl of Strafford was a great, though not the only, mortification to the King. After the Commons had made this trial of their strength, they resolved to complete the reformation of the Government, which till now was but commenced. The King, on his part, endeavoured, though in vain, to cool the great ardour of the Commons, by granting or promising places to such as were most agreeable to them. He had made Sir Edward Littleton Lord-Keeper, in the room of the Lord Finch, who was forced to fly. For the same reason, Dr. Juxon Bishop of London resigned his Treasurer's Staff, which was to be given to the Earl of Bedford. But the Earl died, whilst he was earnestly labouring to procure an agreement between the King and Commons. Oliver St. John, a leading man in the House of Commons, had been made Solicitor-general. The Lord Cottington was to surrender the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer in favour of Mr. Pym, and the place of Master of the Wards in favour of the Lord Sey. The office of Secretary of State exercised by W. Brouncker, was designed for Denzil Holles. The Earl of Essex, the Lord Kimbolton, and Mr. Hampden, were likewise to have places (2). But the Earl of Bedford's death put an end to most of these projects. The King ceased not, however, after the death of the Earl of Strafford, to gratify the Commons, by making the Earl of Essex Lord Chamberlain, having first removed the Earl of Pembroke; for the Earl of Essex was a great favorite of the Commons. But all this produced not the great alterations expected by the King. The wound was too deep to be cured by such lenitives.

The general aim of the Parliament was not only to redress past grievances, but also to free the Kingdom from the fear of being exposed hereafter to the like calamities. The King, on the contrary, imagined, that by giving or promising good places to the Leaders of the opposite party, he should stop their mouths, and render them dumb dogs. But they were too wise to fall into the snare. They were very sensible, these places which the King gave or offered to give them, would be always at his disposal, and that when the motive of his giving them should cease, it would be ever in his power to turn them out. Besides, many of them were too conscientious to sacrifice the good of their Country to their private interest. This disposition of the Leaders manifestly appeared, in that the King's favours were not able to cause them to relinquish their project, so great was their distrust of him. They could not believe that a Prince, who had so openly discovered an intention to establish an arbitrary Government, had suddenly changed his principles and maxims. Nay, what he did in their favour, convinced them of the necessity of firmly adhering to their project, perceiving his aim was to divide them.

This project consisted, as I said, first, in redressing all the grievances: Secondly, in taking measures to prevent the King from returning to his former courses. This they laboured with great diligence, after the Earl of Strafford's death. Hitherto, they had only prepared matters by votes, which plainly showed their design, and by the Protestation subscribed by both Houses. But they expected to meet in the House of Peers, with obstacles so much the greater, as the King had there a strong party.

The House of Peers consisted of one hundred and twenty Lords, the two Archbishops, and twenty four Bishops. Among the first, the two Princes Charles and James, the Duke of Buckingham, and seven or eight others, were yet minors; and there were some, whose age, or infirmities, or affairs, hindered them from being present in this Parliament. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Finch, the Earl of Strafford, were no longer there at the time I am speaking of: so that the Bishops would have made a fifth part of the House, had it been complete. But as, according to the Lord Clarendon, there were not above four score Peers at the Earl of Strafford's trial, a third part may be reckoned absent; and as, on the other hand, there were vacant Sees, the Bishops and popish Lords may, without a very wrong calculation, be counted about a quarter part of the Upper-house. As they were all devoted to the King, it is easy to perceive, they rendered the King's party very powerful among the Lords. Accordingly, this was the reason which obliged the Commons to use their utmost endeavours to take away their votes in Parliament. Most of them had now made themselves odious, by promoting the King's designs with all their power, and persecuting the Puritans, and they still continued to obstruct the design of redressing the grievances, by the number of their voices in the House of Peers.

This was the reason made use of by the leading Presbyterians, who had more secret and extensive designs, to induce such Members of the Church of England as were against the King, to sacrifice the Bishops privilege of sitting in Parliament. They intimated to them, that whilst the King had so many votes in the Upper-house, it would be almost impossible effectually to labour the redress of grievances. That after all, to deprive the Bishops of this privilege, would, instead of being detrimental, be rather advantageous to Religion, since they would thereby be more attached to their spiritual functions. That it would be no less beneficial to the State, since the King would be deprived of a means he had always used with success, to break the Parliament's measures.

The opposite party to the King in the Parliament, consisted indeed of Puritans, but there were two sorts, as I observed. Some were true Presbyterians. Others were State-Puritans, that is, persons whom the Court had always considered as Puritans; not that they were enemies to the Church of England, but because their maxims concerning civil Government were thought to be founded upon Puritan principles. These two sorts of Puritans had been equally oppressed the first fifteen years of this reign, as well by the Court as by the Clergy, so that the Hierarchy was become very odious to the one, and very suspicious to the other. The true Presbyterians earnestly desired the utter extirpation of Episcopacy. The other Puritans were extremely incensed against the Bishops and the rest of the Clergy, who had always supported and countenanced the King's designs. Wherefore they were easily persuaded, that it would be a great service to the State, to clip the wings of the Clergy, to the end they might be less useful to the King. Besides, though Church of England men, they were not of the opinion of those who believed that Religion could not subsist without Bishops, and that Episcopacy was so closely united with the Monarchy, that the one could not be abolished without the destruction of the other. So far was the Hierarchy from giving them any uneasiness, that they would have been very glad to preserve it, provided the Clergy could have been confined to their spiritual functions. But they were grieved to see the Clergy invested with a secular power, which they abused. It must be further added, that being thus disposed, they saw the Presbyterians, who were numerous in the Kingdom, and supported by the Scots, strenuously insist upon taking away the Bishops votes in the House of Lords. It was dangerous to displease them, for a very strong reason. For that the Presbyterians affected to speak of the State only, it was well known, that Religion was the principal thing in view, and that their transactions concerning the civil Government, tended only to diable the King from oppressing them, if he remained too powerful. Had the King therefore tried to gain the Presbyterians, by offering them reasonable terms, they might have accepted them, and relinquished the design of reforming the civil Government, and then the State-Puritans would have been at the King's mercy. Union between the Puritans was therefore absolutely necessary. For, it was no less dangerous for the Presbyterians, that the King should content the State-Puritans, in which case they would have infallibly abandoned the Presbyterians.

Both these parties therefore stood in great need of each other, and it was their interest to support one another, for fear the King should take advantage of their division. But he could never resolve either to grant any terms to the Presbyterian party, or to satisfy the Politicians. He therefore formed, himself, so strict an union between these two parties, that they became one and the same. The Politicians chose rather, out of condescension to the Presbyterians, to sacrifice the Bishops privilege, than be exposed to the danger of seeing themselves again subject to an arbitrary Government.

According to these dispositions, and the consequent resolutions, the House of Commons equally laboured the redress of grievances, and the execution of the design against the Bishops. Thus the affairs of Church and State went hand in hand, so that scarce a day passed, but the Commons gave the King some mortification, one while by passing Bills or Votes against the King's former proceedings, another while by prosecuting the authors of the grievances or innovations; sometimes by exclaiming against the forementioned conspiracy, and sometimes by increasing the yoke of the Papists.

All this tended to the end propoed by the opposite party to the King. It was supposed as a thing publicly known, that there had been a settled design to introduce Popery, and that some of the Bishops were concerned in the plot. Thus, by accusing the Papists of having ill designs, and by rigorously prosecuting them, this accusation was made, in some measure, to reflect on the Bishops and Clergy. It was pretended, that the innovations introduced into the divine service, were a consequence of this design, and for that reason, by condemning them, the Clergy, who had countenanced them, were rendered odious to the People. The accusations against particular persons, who had been most zealous to support these innovations, produced also the same effect. In short, nothing was omitted that could contribute to show the people the necessity of restoring the Government to its natural state, and convince them, that the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy was more prejudicial than necessary to the Church and State. With these two things the Commons were taken up for the space of three months, from the death of the Earl of Stratford, to the King's journey to Scotland.

First, with respect to the State, in this interval it was, that Bills were brought in to abolish the Star-Chamber and Court of York, to regulate the Council-table, to abolish Ship-money, and prevent vexatious proceedings concerning Knighthood, against illegal imprisonments, and for ascertaining the bounds and limits of Forests. Each Judge in particular was accused. The tax imposed by the King on the Shires, for the wages of the Muster-master, was declared contrary to Law. The conspiracy to seduce the army was likewise examined, and Wilms, Aburnham, and Pellard, were expelled the House, and committed to prison. All the Patents for monopolies, of which most were suppressed, were brought before the House. It was also examined, by what means a certain clause had been inserted in the Petition of Right, concerning Tunnage and Poundage, and care was taken to register a declaration on that head, to hinder posterity from being deceived by that surreptitious clause. I pass over in silence several votes flowing from all these articles, or which concerned particular persons.

As to Religion, besides what was done with respect to the Papists, and of which I have already spoken, the Commons declared illegal the oath by which Ministers were bound to maintain the Hierarchy in the Church. A Bill was brought in against Pluralists. The Canons made by the late Convocation were condemned. A Bill was passed to abolish the High-Commission. The suppression of Deans and Chapters was voted. Matthew Wren Bishop of Ely was impeached. The Proteftation was ordered to be subscribed by the whole Nation. An accusation was brought to the Lords against thirteen Bishops, who had assented at the Convocation.

I have but just mentioned these Articles, because a particular account of each seemed to me needless. I shall only add, that there was some difference between the two Houses concerning the Proteftation. The Lords would have left every man at liberty to sign it: but did not think proper to use compulsion. The Commons, on the contrary, looked upon the Proteftation as a Shibboleth, to distinguish the Ephraimites (1), and at last the Lords agreed to what the Commons desired.

One of the articles of the Proteftation occasioning some disputes, the Commons explained more fully that Article, which was thus worded: I swear to defend the true reformed Protestant Religion, expressed in the Doctrine of the Church of England, against all Popery and Popish innovations within this Realm, contrary to the same Doctrine. Some persons insisting upon the first part of this clause, pretended, that there was no other Doctrine of the Church of England than what is contained in the thirty nine Articles drawn up in the Reign of Elizabeth, of which one is to preserve the Government of the Church by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, &c. Hence they inferred, that those who should take the Proteftation were bound to maintain Episcopacy. But the Commons considering the whole clause as expressed in the Proteftation, declared, "That by these words was, and is meant, only the publick Doctrine professed in the said Church, so far as it is opposite to Popery and Popish innovations; and that the said words are not to be extended to the maintaining of any form of worship, discipline or government, nor of any rites or ceremonies of the said Church of England." This clearly showed what was their intention with regard to the Hierarchy.

There was also another dispute between the two Houses concerning the Star-Chamber. The Lords were willing to agree, it should be reformed, but refused to consent to its abolition. Mean while, the Commons vigorously supporting the Bill, they had sent up to the Peers, it passed at last, and the King gave his assent the 5th of July.

In this same interval, I mean, from the death of the Earl of Stratford, to the King's journey to Scotland, there were some other transactions which it is necessary to mention.

The Customers, who had collected the duties imposed on Merchandises by the King's sole authority without consent of Parliament, finding they were like to be attacked, offered of their own accord one hundred and fifty thousand pounds for an Act of oblivion, and their offer was accepted (2).

The Lord Digby, son of the Earl of Bristol, and Member of the House of Commons, was called by Writ to the House of Lords the 10th of June (3). In the beginning of this Parliament, he had distinguished himself by his zeal for the redress of grievances: but his Speech against the Bill of Attainder of the Earl of Stratford, made him forfeit the good will of the Commons. Whether he was already gained by the King, or on this occasion first joined his party, his Majesty thought proper to screen him from the resentment of the Commons, by calling him to the House of Peers. He will hereafter appear the King's chief Minister and Counsellor, great enemy to the Commons, as they on their part never forgave his defection.

The Irish army ought to have been long since disbanded, as there was no occasion to keep it on foot, and the Commons had frequently desired it of the King. Nevertheless, this army subsisted the last, though the Commons had taken care for their payment. When they came to be disbanded, the King acquainted both Houses, that the Spaniard having desired to take this army into his service, and intimated the same by his Ambassador, he had promised to send him four thousand men. The Lords made no scruple to agree to the King's engagement. But the Commons, ever full of fears and suspicions, thought not proper, that the King should keep these troops in the King of Spain's name, who would make them serve in the Low Countries, from whence the King might draw them whenever he pleased. Besides, the French Ambassador had desired the rest of the army for his Master, to which the King had also consented. They thought it was an artifice of the King's, to keep this Popish army which was devoted to him, and on which he could much better rely than on that of England. Wherefore they prayed the King

They declared, That whoever should not take the Proteftation, was unfit to bear Office in Church or Commonwealth; and ordered this Vote to be printed, and sent down to every County, City, and Burroughs. Rothw. 10th, IV. p. 253.

This Petition was delivered to the House by the great Farmers of Tunnage and Poundage, namely, Sir Paul Pindar, Sir Abraham Davis, Sir 7th, W. Raleigh, and Sir John Young. The petty Customers had the liberty likewise to come in upon Compulsion, and then have the benefit of the Act of Oblivion. Act 7th, T. II. p. 256.

The King called the Lord Digby to the House of Lords, at the time the Commons expelled him their House. His Writ was dated the 9th, and he was not out of the House the 10th. Upon his coming to the House of Lords, he was asked to all the standing Committees. Nelson, T. II. p. 133.

to call in his word. They had on this occasion several conferences with the Lords, where they alleged sundry reasons to support their opinion, without expressing the true one: but it was easily perceived. The King was much displeased with the Commons opposition, whether he thought himself bound in honour to keep his promise, or really intended to preserve this army, by lending it to the Kings of France and Spain, in order to use it himself in case of necessity. What gives cause to suspect he had formed such a project is, that it does not appear the Kings of France and Spain had then any great occasion for these troops. Be this as it will, the King, without regarding the Commons opposition, shewed that his intention was to perform his promise, and this affair was not yet ended when the King departed for Scotland. Some time after, he sent a message to the Lords dated from Edinburgh, wherein he appeared resolved to stand to his engagement, let what would be the consequence. But the two Houses found means to render his resolution ineffectual, by publishing an Ordinance, declaring, that whoever should assist in transporting these Irish troops into any foreign Country, should be deemed an enemy to the State. This Ordinance broke all the King's measures, not one owner of ships being willing to hazard inevitable ruin for his sake.

The King, as I said, expected that the Parliament would grant him an aid capable of enabling him to drive the Scots out of the Kingdom. He quickly found his mistake, and clearly perceived, that the Scots were come into England at the solicitation of the English male-contents, and that these male-contents were the very persons who had most credit and authority in the two Houses. He judged therefore, that instead of thinking any longer of expelling the Scots by arms, he should rather endeavour to agree with them, in order to disjoin their interest from that of the English, and induce them to disband their army, which was always ready to support the Parliament. When therefore the commissioners of the two Kingdoms met at London, to continue the Treaty of Rippon, they found no resistance from the King, who by granting the Scots first demand, plainly shewed he was disposed to refuse them nothing. This demand was, that the King should cause to be published in his name, the Acts of the Parliament of Scotland, as well those which were already passed in the first session, as those which should be passed in the second. So great a condescension on this point, which had been properly the cause of the second war, convinced the Commons, that the King's aim was speedily to get rid of the Scottish army, which to him was an incumbrance, but to them was very necessary for the execution of their projects. And therefore as the Scottish Commissioners had a good understanding with the Commons, they so managed, that the Negotiation of Peace was prolonged till the 7th of August 1641, though the King, by granting whatever was required, removed all difficulties as far as lay in his power.

At last, the negotiation being about to end, and nothing more wanting to conclude the Treaty, but to agree upon some articles of little importance, the King permitted the Parliament of Scotland to meet, and promised to be there in person, to pass such Acts as should be judged requisite. The Commons having knowledge of the King's resolution, entertained some suspicion of this journey, and were apprehensive, that the King's design was to put himself at the head of his army in the north, under colour of going to Scotland. They desired therefore a conference with the Lords, and moved, that the armies might be disbanded before the King's departure, and that both Houses should present a petition to the King, to pray him to defer his journey. They supported their motion with several arguments, and amongst others with this, that it was necessary to prevent the suspicions of the People, and the designs some might have, to make use of the army to raise disturbances in the Kingdom. That besides, several Bills were sent up to the Lords and not yet passed. That others were now under consideration in the Lower-House, and it was necessary the King should give his assent to them, before his departure (1). In short, after divers conferences, it was resolved, with the King's consent, that he should defer his journey till the 10th of August, and that the two armies should be disbanded by that time (2). Nevertheless, as the English army could not be entirely disbanded before the King's departure, for want of money, the Commons desired a farther delay of a fortnight, alledging still the People's jealousies. But the Lords refused to concur with them, and the King departed the 10th of August, as had been agreed (3).

The Commons distrust of the King still subsisting, they desired the concurrence of the Peers, that a Committee of Lords and Commoners might be sent to the Parliament of Scotland to remain there, and inform them from time to time of their proceedings, to which the Lords consented. The persons named to go Commissioners for Scotland, were the Earl of Bedford, the Lord Howard of Effrick, Nathaniel Fiennes, Sir William Armynne, Sir Philip Stapleton, and John Hampden, and a draught of a Commission was sent by an express to the King to sign. But the King refused it, because he saw no necessity for such a Commission. He consented however, that the Committee should come and attend him in Scotland, to see the ratification of the Treaty. As the Committee were properly designed only for spies upon the King's actions, both Houses thought fit to send them into Scotland, on some other pretence. But the Earl of Bedford did not go on this service.

Some days after, the House of Commons came to several resolutions, against the monopoly of soap, which was declared illegal. Moreover they voted, that the sentence in the Star-Chamber against certain soap-boilers of London, should be reversed, and the Judges of that Court, who had given their votes in the sentence, should pay the parties costs and damages. It was ordered also, that inquiry should be made what Members of the Privy-Council had given their consent to the illegal orders made at the Council-table, about the soap-monopoly.

As the Commons had undertaken to redress all grievances, that of the city of London, concerning the Plantation of Londonderry was likewise considered, whilst the King was in Scotland. The House passed several votes upon this Subject, and declaring illegal all the proceedings of the Star-Chamber, reversed the sentence against the City of London, as unjust and given by incompetent Judges. They declared, that when the King should be pleased to repay to the city the money he had received, the Patent thereupon granted should be cancelled or surrendered.

After that, both Houses resolved to adjourn from the 9th of September, to the 20th of October, that the Members might go to their homes, from whence they had been absent ten months. As soon as this resolution was taken, a great number of both Houses retired into the country, to gain a little more time to repose themselves, so that there remained but twenty-two Lords in the Upper, and a hundred and fifteen Members in the Lower-House. Then some one, who was doubtless Presbyterian, willing to improve so favourable an opportunity, moved, that it was necessary to make some alterations in the Common-Prayer-Book. This motion occasioned a very warm debate, Mr. Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, strenuously defended the Liturgy, so that, contrary to the expectation of the person who had raised the debate, nothing was resolved.

But some days after, the affair of Innovation in the Church was debated, and the House passed several votes, declaring, that certain innovations ought to be abolished. At the same time, the Lords seeing, that in the Lower-House, the authentickness of the Common-Prayer-Book was questioned, voted, that it should be observed as before in all the Churches, without any omission or alteration. This begot a conference between both Houses, wherein the Commons desired the Lords to consent to the following Declaration, and join with them in the publication thereof.

Declaration of September 8. 1641.

Whereas divers innovations, in or about the worship of God, have been lately practised in this Kingdom, by enjoining some things, and prohibiting others, without warrant of Law, to the great grievance and discontent of his Majesty's Subjects. For the suppression of such innovations, and for preservation of the public peace, it is this day ordered by the Commons in Parliament assembled, that the church-wardens of every parish-church and chapel respectively, do forthwith remove the Communion-table from the east-end of the church, chapel, or chancel, into some other convenient place, and that they take away the rails, and level the chancels as heretofore they were before the late innovations.

(1) There were four Reasons delivered to Mr. Holles to move the King to stay his Journey into Scotland. The third of which is that referred to here by our Author, namely, The Distempers and Jealousies of the Kingdom are such, that they cannot be composed by passing some Acts, unless his Majesty stay the Assize Time. Which words do not seem to imply so much as our Author expresses. Rushworth, Tom. IV. p. 361.—Besides this, the Commons moved, that the King might be desired to appoint a Glorious Regent, because many emergent occasions might happen in Parliament, where use must be made of the King's Authority. Ibid. p. 360.

(2) They were both disbanded together, August 6. Whitehead, p. 47. The coming of the Scots into England, cost the Nation 1000000*l.* besides damages. Rushworth, Tom. IV. p. 360.

(3) And came to Scotland, Aug. 14. Guthrie's Mem. p. 24. Before his departure he passed several Bills; particularly one for the Judges holding the ex places during life, which was before during pleasure. Diurn. Osn.

1641. That all crucifixes, scandalous pictures of any one or more persons of the Trinity, and all images of the Virgin Mary, shall be taken away and abolished; and that all tapers, candles, and lights, be put out.

That all corporal bowing at the name (Jesus) towards the east-end of the Church, Chapel, or Chancel, or towards the Communion-table, be henceforth forborn.

That the orders aforesaid be observed in all the several Cathedral Churches of this Kingdom, and all the Collegiate Churches or Chapels in the two Universities, or any other part of the Kingdom; and in the Temple Church, and the Chapels of the other Inns of Court, by the Deans of the said Cathedral Churches, by the Vice-Chancellor of the said Universities, and by the Heads and Governors of the several Colleges and Halls aforesaid, and by the Benchers and Readers in the said Inns of Court respectively.

That the Lord's-day shall be duly observed and sanctified: All dancing, or other sports, either before or after divine service, be forborn and restrained; and that the preaching of God's word be permitted in the afternoon, in the several Churches and Chapels of this Kingdom, and that Ministers and Preachers be encouraged thereunto.

That in case these orders be not observed, complaints thereof shall be delivered in Parliament before the 30th of October next.

The Lords regarded not the desire of the Commons. But on the morrow, September the 9th, the day appointed for the adjournment, they communicated to the Commons, in a conference, an order dated January the 16th, 1630-1, enjoining that divine service should be performed without any alteration, as appointed by Acts of Parliament, and a confirmation of the same order, pursuant to a resolution taken on the present 9th of September, desiring the Commons to concur with them in the publishing thereof.

The Commons absolutely refused to join in the publication of this order, thinking it unreasonable at such a juncture, to press the rigorous observance of the Laws concerning divine service, when a great part of the People called for a reformation. Besides, they knew, this last order, which confirmed that of the 16th of January, was made when there were but twenty Lords in the House, and by a majority of two voices only, eleven against nine. Then they drew up a declaration, inserting that of the day before, to which the Lords had returned no answer, with the order of the Peers of the 16th of January, and the confirmation of the same order of the 9th of September, with the refusal of the Commons to concur with them, and ordered, that their declaration should be printed and published.

I imagine it will not be amiss to remark, concerning this dissention between the two Houses, first, that passion reigned on both sides, since the time of making these two motions was by no means convenient, there not being above the fifth part of the Members present in each House.

Secondly, That there was a great difference in the two points in question, with respect to their importance. One concerned the preservation of the public worship, and book of Common-Prayer, appointed by the laws since the Reformation, but wherein, however, many people ardently wished great alterations might be made; nay, desired they might be entirely suppressed, whilst the rest of the nation believed them absolutely necessary. This was a thing of such consequence, that, it seems, nothing ought to have been decided for or against it, but upon mature deliberation, and when both Houses had their usual number of Members. For this reason, if the motion for making alterations in the Liturgy had been approved in the Lower-house, doubtless the Lords would have justly opposed it, and refused their concurrence. But on the other hand, as the Commons had taken no resolution, there does not seem to have been any necessity for the Lords to renew their order of the 16th of January, which remained in force, and wanted not this confirmation: Nay, it appeared that this order was renewed only out of spleen, because the Commons had made a declaration against innovations. Had the Lords been satisfied with refusing their consent to the Commons declaration of the 8th of September, there would have been nothing to object. But in refusing to return any answer to the Commons, and renewing withal their order of the 16th of January, they discovered that they acted out of spleen and revenge, and it was not doubted, but the Bishops were the chief authors of the renewal of this order.

The second point, which concerned the innovations, was not of the same importance. The question was only to know, whether they were really innovations, and if so, whether illegal or dangerous to Religion. But this was a thing not to be debated in such a juncture, when both Houses were going to be adjourned, and most of the Members already retired into the Country. So the Lords might have refused their consent to the votes of the Commons, though it had been only on pretence of the thinness of both Houses. But in returning no answer to the Commons, they shewed in some measure that they approved of these innovations, which had so long been an occasion of complaints and murmurs in the Kingdom.

The same day, before the adjournment, the Commons appointed a Committee of forty three (1), to take care, during the recess, of the most weighty and important affairs. The Lords appointed a Committee also, consisting but of seven Peers, which done, both Houses adjourned to the 20th of October.

During the recess, the Committee, which had followed the King into Scotland, sent word to the Committee of the House of Commons, that there was a sort of conspiracy in Scotland, and that the aim of the parties concerned, seemed to be, to interrupt the proceedings of the Parliament of that Kingdom, and to destroy the Marquiss of Hamilton, the Earl of Argyle, and the Earl of Lanerick. As the Committee received this notice but two days before the meeting of the Parliament, they only ordered the Lord-Mayor of London to place convenient guards in several places of the City, fearing that the conspirators of Scotland might have correspondents in England, to disturb at the same time the peace of the Kingdom.

The Parliament being met the 20th of October, Mr. Pym made a report to the House, of what the Committee had done during the recess. Whereupon the Commons desired a conference with the Lords, where they represented to them:

“ 1. That a letter from the Committee in Scotland, gave ground to think, that when there was a design in England, to seduce the King's army, and interrupt the Parliament, that there was the like design at that time in Scotland.

“ 2. That the principal party named in that design in Scotland, the Lord Crawford, is a person suspected to be popishly affected; and therefore may have correspondence with the like party in England.

“ 3. That it has been lately published in England, that some things were to be done in Scotland before it broke out there. Therefore we may suspect some correspondence here.”

Upon these grounds the Commons propounded to the Lords, that a strong guard should be kept in the Cities of London and Westminster, and care taken for the defence of the whole Kingdom, and that an express messenger be sent to the Committee of both Houses in Scotland, to acquaint them, that the Parliament of England was ready to give the Scots all necessary assistance against those who should disturb the peace.

The Lords approving of these proposals, instructions were sent to the Committee agreeable to the Commons desires.

The same day, the 20th of October, both Houses desired the Earl of Essex, whom the King had made General on the South of the Trent, to place a guard at Westminster, for the security of the Parliament, which was accordingly done. This Scottish conspiracy made a great noise at that time: but it was not possible to discover it fully. See what Mr. Burnet says of it, in his Memoirs of the Duke of Hamilton.

“ A Gentleman, not known to the Marquiss of Hamilton, brought him and the Earl of Argyle, the discovery of a Plot; which, he said, was laid for their lives, and the Earl of Lanerick's, which he said he could justify by one witness who was invited to the execution of it: He told also a long formal story of the persons to be actors, of the time, place, and manner; And said it was to be executed that very night. This the Marquiss carried to the King, without naming particulars; which could not be done fairly by the law of Scotland, since he had but one witness to prove them by. The King desired him to examine the thing to the bottom, and bring him what further evidence he could find: In the evening other presumptions were brought to the Marquiss, but no clear evidence: However, the matter was got abroad, and in every body's mouth, so that all who depended on these Lords, came about them in great numbers: And those on whom the design was fastened, gave out, it was a forgery to make them odious, and gathered also together. The Marquiss hearing this did not stir out of doors, lest some of their too officious followers should raise tumults; and next day in the evening, he, with the Earl of Argyle, and his Brother the Earl of Lanerick, and half a dozen Servants went out of town to his house of Keneil, twelve miles from Edinburgh, and sent his exchequer to his Majesty, with an account of the reasons. Upon this many discourses went about, people of all sides passing construction as they were affected: But the Parliament took the whole mat-

Those who had given the information, owned what they had said, and those on whom the Plot was fixed, did as positively deny all; so that no clear proof being brought, the Parliament could come to no other decision, but that the Lords had good reason to withdraw themselves; and so they were invited to return to their place in Parliament (1)."

Remark on this Confession. Clarendon, T.L. p. 326.
There is however in the Lord Clarendon's History a particular, which may give some light to this affair. The Earl of Montros told the King, that the Marquis of Hamilton was false to him, and even offered to rid him of this secret enemy; but the King abhorred the expedient. Perhaps the Earl of Montros thought he should do the King a pleasure in having the Marquis assassinated, and mentioning it to some person, the secret was divulged. However this be, the Commons of England, it seems, were extremely jealous of the King, or at least they did their utmost to inspire the people with distrust. For their fear was grounded but upon very slight presumptions, and a bare possibility, that this pretended plot against three Scottish Lords, could have any influence in England.

Complaint to the Commons concerning the Non-Observance of their Declaration. Rushworth, IV. p. 393. Dairi. Occur.
The next day, a complaint was made to the Commons against some persons for not obeying the Declaration of the ninth of September, published by order of the House. As this affair was debated with great warmth, Sir Edward Dering made a Speech, which I think proper to insert, to shew that it was not without ground that the Commons were accused of exceeding their power, in publishing their Declaration, without obtaining the concurrence of the Lords.

Mr. Speaker,

Sir Edward Dering's Speech. Rushworth, IV. p. 394. T.L. p. 610.
IT is very true (as is instanced unto you) that your late order and declaration of the 8th and 9th of September, are much debated and disputed abroad; perhaps it may be a good occasion for us to re-dispute them here. The intent of your order to me seems doubtful, and therefore I am bold, for my own instruction, to propound two queries.

1. How far an order of this House is binding?
2. Whether this particular order be continuant, or expired?

Your orders (I am out of doubt) are powerful, if they be grounded upon the Laws of the Land: Upon that warrant we may, by an order, enforce any thing that is undoubtedly so grounded, and by the same rule we may abrogate whatsoever is introduced contrary to the undoubted foundation of our laws. But, Sir, this order is of another nature, another temper, especially in one part of it, of which (in particular) at some other time.

Sir, There want not some abroad, men of birth, quality and fortune, such as know the strength of our Votes here as well as some of us, (I speak my own infirmities) men of the best worth, and of good assistance in us, and no way obnoxious to us: They know they sent us hither as their trustees, to make and unmake Laws; they know they did not send us hither to rule and govern them by arbitrary, revokable, and disputable orders, especially in Religion. No time is fit for that, and this time as unfit as any: I desire to be instructed herein.

Mr. Speaker, in the second place there is a question, whether this order (whereupon the present complaint is grounded) be permanent and binding, or else expired, and by our selves deserted? I observe, that the order being made the 8th of September, in hope then of concurrence therein by the Lords; that failing, you did issue forth your last resolution by way of declaration, wherein thus you express your self; That it may well be hoped, when both Houses shall meet again, that the good propositions and preparations in the House of Commons, for preventing the like grievances, and reforming the disorders and abuses in matters of Religion, may be brought to perfection; wherefore you do expect that the Commons of this realm do in the mean time (what, obey and perform your order made the day before? No such thing, but in the mean time) quietly attend the reformation intended.

These are your words, and this my doubt upon them, whether by these words you have not superseded your own order? Sure I am, the words do bear this sense, and good men may think and hope it was your meaning.

My humble motion therefore is this, I beseech you to declare, that upon this our reconvention, your order of the 8th of September is out of date; and that the Commons of England must (as you say) quietly attend the reformation intended: which certainly is intended to be perfected up into Acts of Parliament. And in the mean time, that they must patiently endure the present Laws, until you can make new, or mend the old."

The 22d of October, the Bill for disabling persons in the Commons to exercise temporal jurisdiction was again debated, and several Speeches made pro and con. At last, it was resolved to prosecute the Bishops who had assented at the late Convocation, and to push the Bill for excluding the Bishops from their Votes in Parliament. To that end, the House desired a conference with the Lords, where Mr. Pym and Mr. St. John explained the demands of the Commons, with the reasons to support them. Mr. Pym spoke first in this manner:

My Lords,

THE Parliament, the fountain of justice, ought to be preserved pure from corruption and free from partiality, which will add not only lustre, reputation and honour, but authority to what is done in Parliament: All mens estates and liberties are preserved under the safe-custody of Parliament; this moveth us to be careful of any thing that may prejudice the Parliament in point of freedom and integrity.

Therefore, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons have commanded me, with my colleague, to represent unto your Lordships two propositions, which they hold of very great importance and necessity to be put in execution at this time.

First, that those thirteen Bishops which stand accused before your Lordships, for making the late Book of Canons, and putting them in execution, may be excluded from their votes in Parliament.

Secondly, that all the Bishops may be excluded from having any vote in that act, come from the House of Commons to your Lordships, entitled, An Act to take away the Bishops votes in Parliament, &c.

That which concerneth the thirteen Bishops falleth to my charge to open, as I am commanded to tell your Lordships, that it standeth not with honour and with justice, that these Bishops should have votes, standing thus charged with the breach of trust, and of the highest trust, against the prerogative of the King, against the privilege of the Parliament, against the property of the Subject, and against the peace of the Kingdom; these are the jewels that are depozed under the trust and safeguard of Parliament, and all these have been broken; and this appeareth by the making of the new Canons voted by your Lordships to be against all these trusts.

That these persons have been parties to the breach of this trust, that will appear by the journals of the Convocation, which are now in the country, and may be sent for; the entry of the Book is, that all the thirteen Bishops were parties, and did confirm and subscribe these Canons; therefore it is hoped by these Canons, that those that have assumed to themselves a legislative power, whereby they have, as much as in them lies, rooted out the foundation of Parliament, that they should have no interest in the legislative Power at all in Parliament.

Next, that those that have deprived the Subjects of those good Laws that are already made for them, that they should have no interest or part of making future Laws for the Subject; this they conceive standeth with a great deal of equity and justice, which is one reason to desire they should be excluded from their votes in Parliament.

Next is, the heinousness of their offence. It is very fit they should be innocent men, and faithful men, that should have the exercise of so great a thing as it is; much less then should they be Delinquents of so high a nature, actors in the subverting of the Laws of the realm, that they should continue their votes and places in Parliament: And that their delinquency may the better appear, you are desired to read the votes passed in the House of Commons, (Nulla Contradicente) and with which the Lords have concurred and agreed."

Then the votes concerning the making of the said Canons, were read by Mr. Goodwin.

And then Mr. Solicitor St. John proceeded to this effect: That he was in the next place to present some reasons and precedents concerning the Bishops not having their votes touching the Bill, entitled, An Act to take away the Bishops votes in Parliament, &c.

1. Because they have no such inherent right and liberty of being there, as the Lords temporal, and Peers of the realm have; for they are not there representative of any body else; No, not of the Clergy; for if so,

(1) B. P. Gentry says, That this was but a pretended Plot; and that the design of the Earls of Argyle, Hamilton, and Lamerik, was only to make a tumult in Parliament, pretending, that, upon their removal, the Parliament should presently have broken up, which therefore the King took care to prevent.

1641, "then the Clergy were twice represented by them, viz. in the Lords-House, and in the Convocation: For their writ of election is to send two Clerks, Ad Consentientiam, &c. Besides, none are there representative of others, but those that have their suffrages from others; and therefore only the Clerks in the Convocation do represent them.

"2. They have not the inherent right of Peccage as the Lords have, because in some things they cannot do that there, which the Lords may do in case of Treason and matter of Blood. Upon trial of any Peer they have no liberty of vote, which could not be taken away by any Canon, if their right of voting there were inherent.

"If they were representative of the Clergy, as a third Estate and degree, no Act of Parliament could be good, if they did wholly dissent; and yet they have dissented and the Law good and in force, as in the Act for establishing the Book of Common-Prayer in Queen Elizabeth's time; they did dissent from the confirming of that Law, which could not have been good, if they had been a third estate and dissentient.

"4. The King may hold his Parliament without calling the Bishops at all to it, as hath been adjudged by all the Judges of England, 7 Henry VIII, occasioned by the Convocation's citing one Dr. Standish, for speaking of words against their power and privilege, as they conceived: In that case all the Judges of England, in the presence of the King, declared, That the King might hold his Parliament without calling them at all.

"So 25 Edward I, in respect the Prelacy would not agree with the rest of the Kingdom, in granting a reasonable and necessary aid and supply, they were excluded in the Parliament at Carlisle: And before that Parliament, an Act passed against several oppressions of the Abbots, Priors, and Bishops, upon the inferior Clergy of the Kingdom, by purveyance, and setting of high prices, &c. to be collected; and six or seven Acts more, all to this purpose, concerning the carriage of the Prelates to the inferior Clergy; so that when themselves were concerned, they were excluded their votes.

"In all these records of the matter concerning the Clergy, the entry is, That the King, habito tractatu, &c. with the Earls, the Barons, and others the Nobles, &c. hath agreed to this Act, or by the assent of the Earls, Barons, and other Lay-People: which shews, that the Bishops did not consent, for if they had, they should have been first named before the Earls and Barons: For the order of naming the degrees of Nobility in all ancient records, is Prelates, Earls, and Barons.

"Thus 3 Richard II. there being provision, the Pope should not make presentation, &c. it is said, that the petition of the Commons was assented unto by the King, and the Lords temporal, and was always esteemed a firm Act of Parliament, notwithstanding the Bishops opposed the same."

This affair was carried no farther at that time, doubtless, by reason of the obstacles which occurred in the Upper-house, where the Bishops gave their voices, to decide whether they were to vote or not. But it was reserved for another time (1).

The grievances being almost redressed, the Parliament seemed to have little more to do. But the distrust with regard to the King being very great, the leaders of the opposite party to the King believed, the redressing of past grievances was not sufficient. They had a mind also to prevent the like for the future, by disabling the King to abuse his power. It can hardly be denied, that this design was founded upon reasons very plausible, and apt to gain the consent of those who had only the welfare of their Country in view. For if the King, whilst he was invested with all the Prerogatives allowed him by the Laws, had abused his power to establish an arbitrary Government; if he had pursued the execution of this design fifteen years together; if he had desisted but by a superior force obliging him to call this Parliament, how could it be thought that he would change his principles and maxims, if left in possession of the same power which had served him to execute his project? Now there were scarce any of the Members of both Houses, I say, even of those who were most attached to the King, but what were convinced, that the constitution had been greatly endangered of late years. See what the Lord Clarendon lays on this occasion, in his History of the civil Wars:

Clarendon, T. I. p. 53. For the better support of these extraordinary ways, and to protect the agents and instruments, who must be employed in them, and to discountenance and suppress all bold enquiries and opposers, the Council-table and Star-Chamber enlarge their jurisdictions to a vast extent. The Council-table by Proclamations, enjoying to the People what was not enjoyed by the Law, and prohibiting that which was not prohibited; and the Star-Chamber confining the breach and disobedience to those Proclamations by very great fines and imprisonment; so that any disrespect to any acts of State, or to the persons of State-men, was in no time more penal; and those foundations of Right, by which men valued their security, to the apprehension and understanding of wise men, never more in danger to be destroyed.

If the persons most devoted to the King, as was the Earl of Clarendon, had such sentiments, we may easily judge what others thought, and whether they had reason to believe, that the redress of past grievances was a sufficient security for the time to come.

But on the other hand, it cannot be denied, that there were in the Parliament, men, who were brooding secret designs against the Government of the Church, and that these men thought, the diminution of the regal power was absolutely necessary to the execution of their designs, knowing the King would ever oppose them, as long as he was clothed with his usual authority. But it cannot be inferred, from their using the forementioned reasons, to inflame the Parliament's distrust of the King, for a private end of their own, that therefore these reasons were bad. On the contrary, we may venture to assert, it was solely by the weight of these reasons, that the Presbyterians, whose number was inconsiderable in the Parliament and Kingdom, prevailed at last to persuade the rest of the Parliament, of the necessity to restrain the King's power. If these reasons had not been capable of convincing the least prejudiced minds, they would never have succeeded in causing the Parliament to take the resolutions that will hereafter appear. For what interest could the major part of the Members of Parliament have, to alter the constitution of Church and State, if the past had not afforded them a just occasion to fear for the future?

From what has been said, there result two opinions, which have divided, and still do divide all England. The first ascribes to the Commons in general, and to several Peers, the private end designed by the Presbyterians. The followers of this opinion will not allow, that most of the Members proposed to themselves a juster end in all their proceeding against the King. Those who embrace the second opinion, refuse also to admit of this distinction of ends and principles. They pretend, that the opposite party to the King always acted upon motives of equity, justice, and love of their Country. For my part, I shall make no scruple to say, that I think both these opinions very groundless. I can never believe, that the greatest part of the Members of this Parliament, who, even by the confession of the King's friends, had at first no desire to make any alterations in the constitution of the Church or State, should suffer themselves to be corrupted by a small number of other Members, whose views and designs they were not so ignorant of, as to be wholly guided by their directions. Neither can I think that they run into the project of subverting Church and State, out of laziness, ignorance, stupidity, or that they fell into all the snares the others were pleased to lay for them, as the Lord Clarendon insinuates. I rather believe, they weighed the reasons which were to engage them to maintain the civil and ecclesiastical Constitution, with the danger of leaving it in its natural state, and that this danger appeared to them so great, that, to prevent it, they resolved to agree to the alterations intended by the Presbyterians.

On the other hand, I can as hardly believe, that they who took so much care to cherish distrust between the King and Parliament, who were always ready to give an ill turn to all the King's words and actions, who instead of healing, inflamed the wound; that these men, I say, should have in view only justice and the good of their Country. Especially as they were seen to practise all methods to accomplish their private end, I mean, the change of the Government of the Church, in which the rest of the Parliament had no interest. Nay rather, it would have been their interest to oppose it, had they not dreaded a greater mischief.

If therefore a man blindly follows either of these two opinions, without any limitation, he will never be able to give a just notion of this Parliament's conduct. It is as difficult to believe, that a whole Parliament, or at least, the greatest part of the Members, may combine together to subvert the Government of the Church and State, as it is to conceive, that all these same Members may have acted only upon disinterested motives, and with the sole view of procuring the welfare of the State in such a juncture. This, however, is the error into which almost all the

(1) July 9. it was proposed by some of the Commons, That the Bishops Lands might be put into the hands of Feoffees, nine of the Lairy, and three of the Clergy in every Diocese, and the rest of the Lands belonging to Deans, &c. to be employed for the advancement of Learning, and the Bishops to have a liberal allowance during life. Roskith, Tom. IV. p. 200.

1641. English Historians have fallen. They have all embraced one or other of the two opinions, the spirit of party not suffering them fairly to consider the several motives, on which the Members of this Parliament proceeded, and this has begot great obscurity in all they have said upon this subject. The truest and most probable Hypothesis, in my opinion, is briefly this:

The Author's Hypothesis. The King had given great occasions of complaints to his subjects, during the first fifteen years of his reign. It is no wonder, therefore, that he had made himself many enemies, who earnestly wished to have the Government restored to its natural state. Among these enemies, the Presbyterians, who, besides the common, had their private grievances, were the most eager. They desired not only to diminish the King's power, that he might not be able to hurt them, but also to subvert the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, and establish the Presbyterian Government in its place, in which they were supported by the Scots. The King being obliged to call this Parliament against his will, there were few Members but what were disposed to redress past grievances, and prevent the like for the future. Even they who were not enemies to the King, were in this disposition, and it may be affirmed, that this was the general sentiment of the Members at the beginning of the Parliament. But even, among those who desired the redress of grievances, there were two different sentiments. Some were for stopping at the redress of grievances, without proceeding any farther, believing, that would be sufficient to hinder the King from attempting a second time so unsuccessful an enterprize. This was the King's sentiment, as well as of many Members of both Houses. Others were not only for redressing grievances, but also for taking proper measures to prevent the like mischiefs for the future. The Presbyterians were of this number: but they had also more extensive views, and more hidden designs, namely, to introduce the Presbyterian Government into the Church. To accomplish this end, it was necessary to deprive the King of a power, which they foresaw he would not fail to exert, in opposition to their design; and there was no better way, than by cherishing the Parliament's distrust, to which the Members, for the most part, were already but too much inclined. They had therefore only to gain a sufficient number of those, who were willing to stop at the redress of grievances, and nothing was more proper to obtain their concurrence than to fill them with fears and suspicions. This was the reason that such care was taken to aggravate the plot for seducing the army, to dwell continually upon the pretended design of bringing them to London, to spread a report, that a French army was going to land and seize Portsmouth with the King's consent, and I know not how many other rumours, equally improbable. This was the cause of so many efforts to exclude the Bishops from the Upper-house, in order to lessen, as much as possible, the party of those who were for stopping at the redress of grievances. This likewise was the reason, that so many mortifications were given the King, to induce him to take some measures, which should give an advantage against him, and be apt to convince the more moderate, that it was dangerous to leave him in possession of his whole power. It is not therefore very strange, that many of those who were against carrying things to extremities, should in the end be prevailed on, by the fears and suspicions they were continually inspired with. To confirm themselves in their sentiment, they had no other ground than their confidence in the King's word, against which there were unanswerable objections, as for instance, the violation of the Petition of Right.

By these direct and indirect means, the Presbyterians at length succeeded in gaining a sufficient number of votes to give them the superiority in the House of Commons, at least, as to the design of diminishing the King's power. When this party was grown superior, their opposers endeavoured in vain to curb their fury. On the other hand, the King himself fell into the snares laid for him, and took measures, which, as will hereafter appear, made him lose a great number of those who had hitherto appeared the most moderate. The following passage of the Lord Clarendon's History, will serve to illustrate this matter.

L.P. 255. I knew not how these men have already answered it to their own consciences, who having assumed their Country's trust, and it may be, with great earnestness laboured to procure that trust, by their supine laziness, negligence, and absence, were the first inlets to those inundations; and so contributed to those licencies which have overwhelmed us. For by this means a handful of men, much inferior in the beginning, in number and interest, came to give Laws to the major part; and to show that three diligent persons are really a greater and more significant number than ten unconcerned, they, by plurality of voices, in the end, converted or reduced the whole body to their opinions. It is true, men of activity and passion in any design, have many advantages that a composed and settled

No. 63. VOL. II.

Council, though industrious enough, usually have not; and some that gallant men cannot give themselves leave to entertain, even for the prevention of all the mischief the others intend.

The Earl of Clarendon grants, that a handful of men, at first much inferior in number and credit, converted in the end the whole House to their opinions. But as he was a zealous advocate for the King, he took care not to ascribe the success of this handful of men, to the weight of the reasons which they alleged to the others to reduce them to their sentiments. It was requisite, however, to give some reason of it, and he found no better, than the laziness, negligence, and unconcernedness of the King's friends, and the vigilance of the others. I do not know whether this reason will be capable to satisfy the impartial.

This, as I verily believe, is the true hypothesis which ought to be established, in order to give a clear idea of the conduct of this Parliament; and I hope this digression will not be unserviceable for the better understanding of the sequel.

The Parliament seemed to have nothing more to do, all the grievances being in a manner redressed, and the armies disbanded. But after what has been said, it will not doubtless be thought strange, that the House of Commons should order the Committee, which, at the beginning of the Parliament, was charged with preparing a Remonstrance of the state of the Kingdom, to resume and finish that work. Nothing would have been more needless than such a Remonstrance, after the grievances were redressed, if it had not been intended on purpose to quarrel with the King, and afford a pretence to defer to another time the settling his revenues, which was the only thing that remained to be done, and which the King expected. I have already observed, there was a party in the Parliament, who meant not to stop at the redress of grievances. It was this party that caused the Remonstrance to be resumed, in expectation the King would be displeased with it, and take some step that should promote the execution of their project.

But whilst this Remonstrance was preparing, an affair of such consequence unexpectedly happened, that the Commons were obliged for a time to lay aside all other business. I mean the Irish Rebellion, the news whereof came to Sir John Temple the 1st of November 1641.

Since the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, when Tir-Oen's rebellion was happily quelled, the Irish had lived peaceably under the dominion of James I. and Charles I. Not but that the Lords Deputies had always an eye over them, considering them as men, whose fidelity was very suspicious: however, they had at least no occasion to complain, that they were worse used than in the former reigns. As to their Religion, it is easy to imagine, they had suffered no new troubles under these two Princes, who thought of nothing less, than of persecuting the Catholics. Nevertheless, in March or April this year 1641, the Irish formed the project of casting off the English yoke, of seizing upon all the fortified places, and of cutting the throats of all the English throughout the whole Kingdom. The day appointed for executing this bloody design, was the 23d of October, on which day, they were to rise all over the Island. This design was itally executed, as projected, and it is said, on that and the following days, above forty thousand English Protestants were massacred by the Irish. But the project of seizing the same day upon the castle of Dublin, where was a great magazine of provisions and stores, was discovered [by Owen O Conally] the night before, and prevented by the diligence of the Lords Justices of Ireland, who governed in the absence of [Robert Sidney] Earl of Leicester, who had been appointed Lord-Lieutenant some months before, and was yet in England.

This news being communicated to the Commons by the Lords of the Privy-Council, filled the House with consternation and terror, and at the same time with indignation against the Rebels. They immediately turned themselves into a grand Committee, and passed the following resolves:

That 50,000 l. shall be forthwith provided for the service of Ireland.

That a conference be had with the Lords to move them, that a select Committee of the Members of both Houses may be appointed to go to the City of London, and propose unto them the loan of that sum.

That a select Committee of both Houses may be named to consider of the affairs of Ireland, and of the sending of men and ammunition from hence into that Kingdom.

That Owen O Conally, who discovered this great Treason in Ireland, shall have 500 l. presently paid him, and 200 l. per Annum pension, until provision be made for an inheritance of greater value.

That the custody of the Isle of Wight be taken for the present from the Lord Wesley, suspected of being a Catholic, and sequestered into another hand.

That the Committee of Irish affairs shall consider how, and in what manner this Kingdom shall make use of the friendship and assistance of Scotland in the business of Ireland.

Rothworth. IV. [406.] Some days after both Houses published a Declaration, to acquaint the publick that they had resolved to assist the King with all their power to reduce the Irish Rebels.

The King demands aid of the Parliament of Scotland. The King, who was still in Scotland, had received intelligence of what had passed in the North of Ireland (1), but did not know that the Irish had miscarried in their design upon the Castle of Dublin. He immediately communicated his intelligence to the Parliament of Scotland, and demanded their assistance. The Parliament replied, "that

"Ireland being dependent on the Crown of England, and "his Majesty having already writ to the Parliament of "England, and sent to Ireland for farther information, no "other course could be taken, and the rather as the Parliament of England might conceive jealousies; but that "after fuller information, if the English should think the "assistance of Scotland necessary, it should be ready, as "soon as England."

The Rebellion daily increased. The English themselves of the Pale joined with the Irish, having pretended for some time to be attached to the interest of England. These English of the Pale were descendants of the ancient Conquerors of Ireland, who settled there in the Reign of Henry II, and who at the time of the Reformation continued in the Roman Catholic Religion. It was therefore necessary to send a strong force into Ireland to reduce the rebels to obedience. And yet, though the letters from the Lords Justices for assistance were frequent and pressing, though the rebels continually increased in number and strength, though the King most earnestly pressed both Houses to send men, money, and ammunition to Ireland, though the Parliament showed an extreme desire to reduce that Kingdom, it is certain that the succours sent thither, were but small and fitter to continue than end the war. It would doubtless be thought strange to see so much ardour in words, and so little desire to show it in deeds, if the reason of this conduct was not known. And therefore it will be requisite to explain it.

The disposition of the House of Commons, whilst the King was in Scotland has been before shown. A resolution was taken to divest him of part of his power. The views of some were only to hinder him from abusing it for the future. Others added to this motive, the design of rendering him unable to oppose the change they were meditating, with respect to the Government of the Church. The order of the House to the Committee to prepare the Remonstrance of the state of the Kingdom, was a clear evidence, they had some secret design which would show it self in due time. Whilst measures are taking to execute this design, the Irish rise in rebellion, at a time when they seemed to have the least reason, since the government had never been more gentle to them than in the present Reign. They massacre in cold blood above forty thousand English Protestants (2), and unfortunately for the King, spread a report that they had his authority for what they did. They call themselves the Queen's army, and disperse all over the Kingdom, copies of a supposed Commission under the Great-Seal, which they pretend to have from the King to authorize them to take arms. It cannot be denied that all this was capable of making impressions on the minds of those who were already ill affected to the King, and believed him capable of any thing to avoid the servitude that was preparing for him. Indeed, the sober and most considerate did not think it possible, or even probable, that the King should be willing to have his Protestant Subjects of Ireland massacred. But they suspected however that this Rebellion, raised at such a juncture, was not wholly owing to the discontent of the Irish, and that very possibly the King had excited it, to find the Parliament employment, and divert them from the project they had formed. As to the massacre of the Protestants, they did not believe the King had any hand in it, but imagined it very possible, that after raising the Rebellion, it was not in his power to restrain the Irish. The King on his part not knowing what was laid against him in England, used his utmost endeavours to clear himself from this black imputation, by pressing the Parliament to send a speedy aid into Ireland. But these solicitations had a quite contrary effect, because it was believed that his aim was to leave England unprovided with troops, and to engage the Parliament in an Irish war, which must have been very expensive. This was the reason that the Commons proceeded with deliberation, and sent but inconsiderable succours into Ireland, being apprehensive, the Irish Rebellion was a snare laid for them by the King, to cause them to consume the English troops and money.

As several have spoken of this pretended Commission from the King to the Papists of Ireland to authorize them to take arms, and as some have represented it as true, others, as doubtful, but most as an evident forgery, I shall thought it would not be unacceptable to insert it. I shall add a circular letter sent with the copy of the pretended Commission from the leaders of the rebels, to those of their party.

From our Camp at the Newry, this 4th of November, 1641.

Phelim O Neal, Rory Mac Guire, &c (3).

To all Catholics of the Roman party, both English and Irish, within the Kingdom of Ireland, we wish all happiness, freedom of conscience, and victory over the English heretics, who have for a long time tyrannized over our bodies, and usurped by extortion our estates.

BE it hereby made known unto you all, our friends and countrymen, that the King's most excellent Majesty, for many great and urgent causes thereunto moving, reposing trust and confidence in our fidelity, has signified unto us, by his Commission under the Great-Seal of Scotland, bearing date at Edinburgh the first day of this instant October 1641, and also by Letters under his Sign manual, bearing date with the said Commission, of divers great and heinous affronts, that

(1) The Lords Justices sent him an account of it, by Sir Henry Spotswood, who went by Sea directly to Scotland; but, before that, the King received notice of it by a letter from the Lord Chichester, from Belfast, dated October 24. Rothworth, Tom. 4. p. 407.

(2) Above one hundred and fifty four thousand Protestants, were massacred in that Kingdom, from the 23d of October 1641, to the 1st of March following, according to the computation of the Priests themselves that were present. Rothworth, Tom. 5. p. 355, 734. But, according to Sir J. Temple, there were, since the Rebellion first broke out, unto the Celebration made September 15, 1643, above three hundred thousand British and Protestant cruelly murdered in cold blood, destroyed some other way, or expelled out of their habitations. Irish Rebel. p. 6. See Cox. p. 73.—It seems Cardinal Richelieu was deeply concerned in this Massacre. See R. Coke, Tom. 1. p. 340, and Tom. 2. p. 5.

"the English Protestants, especially the Parliament there, have published against his royal person and prerogative, and also against our Catholic friends, within the Kingdom of England; the copy of which Commission we have here sent unto you to be published with all speed in all parts of this Kingdom, that you may be assured of our sufficient warrant and authority herein, viz.

"CHARLES by the grace of God King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the Faith, &c. To all Catholic Subjects within our Kingdom of Ireland, greeting. Know you that we, for the safeguard and preservation of our person, have been forced to make our abode and residence in our Kingdom of Scotland, for a long season, occasioned by reason of the obdurate and disobedient carriage of our Parliament of England against us, who have not only presumed to take upon them the government, and disposing of those princely rights and prerogatives that have justly descended unto us from our predecessors, both Kings and Queens of the said Kingdom, for many hundred years past, but also have possessed themselves of the whole strength of the said Kingdom, in appointing governors, commanders, officers, in all parts and places therein, at their own will and pleasure without our consent; whereby we are deprived of our Sovereignty, and left naked without defence: And for as much as we are in our selves very sensible, that these storms blow aloft, and are very likely to be carried by the vehemency of the Protestant party into our Kingdom of Ireland, and endanger our royal power and authority there also; Know ye therefore, that we, reposing much care and trust in your duty and obedience, which we have for many years past found, do hereby give unto you full power and authority to assemble and meet together, with all the speed and diligence that a business of so great a consequence doth require, and to advise and consult together by a sufficient and discreet number, at all times, days, and places, which you shall in your judgment hold most convenient and material for the ordering, settling, and effecting of this great work, mentioned and directed to you in our letters, and to use all politic ways and means possible to possess your selves, for our use and safety, of all the forts, castles, and places of strength and defence within the said Kingdom, except the places, persons and estates of our loyal and loving Subjects the Scots: And also to arrest and seize the goods, estates, and persons, of all the English Protestants within the said Kingdom to our use; and in your care and speedy performance of this our will and pleasure, we shall perceive your wonted duty and allegiance unto us, which we shall acknowledge and reward in due time.

Witness our self at Edinburgh, the 1st day of October, in the 17th Year of our Reign.

Argument about the King cannot have given this Commission.

Though for many reasons it be more than probable that the King never granted a Commission to the Irish to take arms, it is however certain they boasted of having such a thing. But it is no less certain, that it cannot be the same with what has been just read, nor can this be the Commission published by the leaders of the Irish rebels. My reason is, because in this Commission, the King is made to say things which happened not till several months after the day of the date, and which those who are supposed to have published it the 4th of November could not foresee. The King is made to say on the 1st of October 1641, that the Parliament had possessed themselves of his Sovereignty, and appointed governors, commanders and officers, in all places, which certainly was not done before the month of October 1641. It must be therefore that Rushworth, who has inserted this Commission in his Collections, had had memoirs and little judgment, not to see in this pretended Commission of the 1st of October 1641, things which happened not till the next year 1642. However it is true, the Irish boasted of having the King's Commission. But it is pretended they forged it themselves, and fastened to it an impression of the Great-Seal, taken from some grant or patent (1).

Be this as it will, the pretension of the Irish that they had the King's and Queen's authority, was of very ill consequence to the King. There were but too many who had an ill opinion of his zeal for the Protestant Religion, and thought him capable of being induced by the Queen's solicitations to restore the Catholic Religion in England,

The former Parliaments had discovered their suspicions, and the King instead of undeceiving them, had given them words only, which were followed with no effects. When therefore the news came, that the Irish Papists were in arms, and had massacred the Protestants, it was very natural to dread the like plot in England, which could not but be extremely prejudicial to the King. Though the Parliament did not seem to regard much the calumny spread against the King, they were however full of distrust, and this distrust made them think it not proper to leave England without troops, money, and ammunition, in order to assist Ireland, lest England should be unprovided, in case the same plot was contriving there. Nay, it was the interest of the leading men in the Parliament to feign a greater distrust than they really had, to strengthen the suspicions and fears of such Members as were not fully persuaded. This served to convince them how necessary it was to curb the King's power, and render him incapable to execute his designs.

But though the party of those who were for lessening the regal power was numerous in the Parliament, they were not yet in condition to proceed as they pleased. Matters were to be prepared by degrees, one while by cherishing suspicions and fears, another while by engaging the House to take proper steps to lead them to their end, which was not known to all the Members.

With this view it was, that under colour of thanking the Scots for their promised assistance to suppress the Rebellion in Ireland, and of treating with them about it, they engaged the House to send to the Committee in Scotland new instructions very mortifying to the King. The House said, in these instructions.

"That they had just cause to believe, that the conspiracies and commotions in Ireland, were but the effects of the counsels of those who continued in credit, authority and employment about his Majesty; therefore they feared that the great aids which should be raised for subduing the rebellion in Ireland, would be applied to the fomenting of it there, and encouraging some such like attempt in England. And therefore the Commons besought his Majesty to change those Councils, from which such ill courses had proceeded, and to employ such Ministers as should be approved of by his Parliament, who were his greatest and most faithful Council. But if his Majesty did not condescend to their supplications, they should be forced to resolve upon some way of defending Ireland from the rebels, and of securing themselves from mischievous counsels and designs; and command those aids and contributions which should be raised for the reducing of Ireland to the custody and disposing of such persons of honour and fidelity, as they had cause to confide in."

These instructions conclude with the following article. You shall represent to his most excellent Majesty this our humble and faithful Declaration, that we cannot without much grief remember the great miseries, burthens, and distempers, which have for divers years afflicted all his Kingdoms and Dominions, and brought them to the last point of ruin and destruction; all which have issued from the cunning, false, and malicious practices of some of those who have been admitted into very near places of counsel and authority about him, who have been favourers of Popery, superstition and innovation; subverters of Religion, honour, and justice; factors for promoting the designs of foreign Princes and States, to the great apparent danger of his Royal person, crown, and dignity, and of all his people; authors of false scandals and jealousies betwixt his Majesty and his loyal Subjects; enemies to the peace, union and confidence betwixt him and his Parliament, which is the surest foundation of prosperity and greatness to his Majesty, of comfort and hope to them: that by their counsels and endeavours, those great sums which have been lately drawn from the People, have been either consumed unprofitably, or in the maintenance of such designs as have been mischievous and destructive to the State; and whilst we have been labouring to support his Majesty, to purge out the corruption, and restore the decays both of Church and State, others of their faction and party have been contriving by violence and force to suppress the liberty of Parliament (2), and endanger the safety of those who have opposed such wicked and pernicious courses.

This was properly a preparative to the Remonstrance of the state of the Kingdom, which was to be brought into the House the first opportunity, and which was indeed read the 22d of November. It met with so strong opposition, that the debates lasted from three in the afternoon till three

(1) It was an Impression of the Broad Seal, which hung to a Patent, found by O. Neal, in the Castle of Charlton, at the taking of it. Nelson, Tom. II. p. 529. — To these reasons to prove the forgery of this Commission, may be added another, which seems demonstrative. The Commission is supposed to be written, published by Authority in that Kingdom. Before the late Union in Queen Ann's Reign, the King's constant Title in all the Scotch Public Acts was of Scotland, England, &c. King. This Observation was communicated by Mr. Arbuckle of Dublin. — Rushworth observes, that the words of the Commission are enough to show the villainous practice of the Authors, and its bare recital a sufficient refutation and detection of the unparalleled Forgery. Tom. 4. p. 400. See Borlase, p. 29.

(2) Alluding to the Conspiracy to reduce the Army. Regin.

1641. "ruin and destruction wherein your Kingdoms of England and Scotland are threatened. The duty which we owe to your Majesty, and our Country, cannot but make us very sensible and apprehensive, that the multiplicity, sharpness, and malignity of those evils under which we have now many years suffered, are fomented and cherished by a corrupt and ill-affected Party, who, amongst other their mischievous devices for the alteration of Religion and Government, have fought by many false scandals and imputations, cunningly insinuated and dispersed among the People, to blemish and disgrace our proceedings in this Parliament, and to get themselves a party and faction amongst your Subjects, for the better strengthening themselves in their wicked courses, and hindering those provisions and remedies, which might by the wisdom of your Majesty, and counsel of your Parliament, be opposed against them.

"For preventing whereof, and the better information of your Majesty, your Peers, and all other your loyal Subjects, we have been necessitated to make a declaration of the state of the Kingdom, both before and since the assembly of this Parliament, unto this time, which we do humbly present to your Majesty, without the least intention to lay any blemish upon your Royal person, but only to represent how your Royal authority and trust have been abused, to the great prejudice and danger of your Majesty, and all your good Subjects. (1.)

REMARK (1.) The design of this Declaration or Remonstrance was not to inform the King, as the Commons assured him, but solely to make their apology, and exasperate the People against him. First, the Remonstrance is not directed to the King, and he is always mentioned in the third person. Secondly, the Commons voted that the Remonstrance should be printed, before they had received any answer from the King, and published it against his will. So what they say at the close of this article is all a flourish, without one word of truth.

"And because we have reason to believe, that those malignant parties, whose proceedings evidently appear to be mainly for the advantage and increase of Popery, are composed, set up and acted by the subtle practice of the Jesuits, and other engineers and factors for Rome, to the great danger of this Kingdom, and most grievous affliction of your loyal Subjects, have so far prevailed, as to corrupt divers of your Bishops and others in prime places of the Church, (2.) and also to bring divers of these Instruments to be of your Privy-Council, (3.) and other employments of trust and nearness about your Majesty, the Prince, and the rest of your Royal children.

REM. (2.) The Commons pointed at Laud Archbishop of Canterbury, Nail (a) Bishop of Winchester, Wren Bishop of Ely, Cyprus Dean of Peterborough.

REM. (3.) As Windebank Secretary of State, and some others.

"And by this means have had such an operation in your Council, and the most important affairs and proceedings of your Government, that a most dangerous division, and chargeable preparation for war betwixt your Kingdoms of England and Scotland, the increase of jealousies betwixt your Majesty and your most obedient Subjects, the violent distraction and interruption of this Parliament, the insurrection of the Papists in your Kingdom of Ireland, and bloody massacre of your People, have been not only endeavoured and attempted, but in a great measure compassed and effected.

"For preventing the final accomplishment whereof, your poor Subjects are enforced to engage their persons and estates, to the maintaining of a very expenceful and dangerous war, notwithstanding they have already, since the beginning of this Parliament, undergone the charge of 150000 l. Sterling, or thereabouts, for the necessary support and supply of your Majesty in these present and perilous designs. And because all our most faithful endeavours and engagements will be ineffectual for the peace, safety, and preservation of your Majesty and your People, if some present, real, and effectual course be not taken, for suppressing this wicked and malignant party.

"We your Majesty's most humble and obedient Subjects, do with all faithfulness and humility beseech your Majesty: 1. That you would be graciously pleased to concur with the humble desires of your People in a parliamentary way, (4) for the preserving the peace and safety of the Kingdom from the malicious designs of the popish party.

REM. (4.) That is to say, by consenting to the Bills which should be presented to him.

"For depriving the Bishops of their votes in Parliament, (5.) and abridging their immoderate power usurped over the Clergy, and other your good Subjects, which they have perniciously abused, to the hazard of Religion, and great prejudice and oppression of the Laws of the Kingdom, and just liberty of your People.

REM. (5.) The Commons were not satisfied with desiring that the Bishops, whom they supposed guilty of the design to countenance Popery, should be punished, but took occasion from thence to inflict a penalty on the whole Bench, by depriving them of the privilege of sitting in Parliament.

"For the taking away such oppressions in Religion, Church-Government and discipline, as have been brought in and fomented by them. For uniting all such your loyal Subjects together, as join in the same fundamental truths against the Papists, by removing some oppressions and unnecessary ceremonies, by which divers weak consciences have been scrupled, and seem to be divided from the rest, (6.) and for the due execution of those good laws, which have been made for securing the liberty of your Subjects.

REM. (6.) The meaning of which was, in the language of the Commons or of their leaders, that he should abolish the Hierarchy and Book of Common-Prayer; but they did not yet dare to speak out, and therefore covered their intention under this expression, by removing unnecessary ceremonies.

"2. That your Majesty will likewise be pleased to remove from your Council, all such as persist to favour and promote any of those pressures and corruptions wherewith your People have been grieved; and that for the future, your Majesty will vouchsafe to employ such persons in your great and publick affairs, and to take such to be near you in places of trust, as your Parliament may have cause to confide in; that in your princely goodness to your People, you will reject and refuse all mediation and solicitation to the contrary, how powerful and near soever. (7.)

REM. (7.) Meaning the Queen.

"That you will be pleased to forbear to alienate any of the forfeited and escheated Lands in Ireland, which shall accrew to your Crown by reason of this rebellion; that out of them the Crown may be the better supported, and some satisfaction made to your Subjects of this Kingdom, for the great expences they are like to undergo this war.

"Which humble desires of ours being graciously fulfilled by your Majesty, we will, by the blessing and favour of God, most cheerfully undergo the hazard and expences of this War, and apply our selves to such other courses and counsels, as may support your royal estate with honour and plenty at home, with power and reputation abroad, and by our loyal affections, obedience, and service, lay a sure and lasting foundation of the greatness and prosperity of your Majesty, and your royal posterity in future times.

A Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom, presented to the King from the House of Commons, the first of December, 1641.

THE Commons in this present Parliament assembled, having with much earnestness and faithfulness of affection and zeal to the publick good of this Kingdom, and his Majesty's honour and service, for the space of twelve months, wrestled with great dangers and fears, the pressing miseries and calamities, the various distempers and disorders which had not only assaulted, but even overwhelmed and extinguished the liberty, peace, and prosperity of this Kingdom, the comfort and hopes of all his Majesty's good Subjects, and exceedingly weakened and undermined the foundation and strength of his own royal throne,

"Do yet find an abounding malignity and opposition in those parties and factions who have been the cause of those evils, and do still labour to cast aspersions upon that which hath been done, and to raise many difficulties for the hindrance of that which remains yet undone, and to foment jealousies betwixt the King and Parliament, that so they may deprive him and his People of the fruit of his own gracious intentions, and their humble desires of procuring the publick peace, safety, and happiness of this realm: For the preventing of those miserable effects, which such malicious endeavours may produce, we have thought good to declare: (1.)

REMARK (1.) This was all flourish, and a pretence used by the Commons, to have an occasion to publish this Remonstrance, which was resolved upon at the very beginning of the Parliament, before any one thought of blaming their conduct.

(a) Nail was translated from Winchester to Tork in 1631, in which honour he died, three days before the Long-Parliament was opened.

"The root and growth of these mischievous designs.

"The maturity and ripeness to which they have attained before the beginning of the Parliament.

"The effectual means which have been used for the extirpation of those dangerous evils, and the progress which hath therein been made by his Majesty's goodness, and the wisdom of the Parliament.

"The ways of obstruction and opposition, by which that progress hath been interrupted.

"The courses to be taken for the removing those obstacles, and for the accomplishing of our most dutiful and faithful intentions and endeavours of restoring and establishing the antient honour, greatness, and security of this Crown and Nation.

"The root of all this mischief we find to be a malignant and pernicious design of subverting the fundamental laws and principles of Government, upon which the Religion and Justice of this Kingdom are firmly established. The actors and promoters hereof have been,

"1. The Jesuited Papists, who hate the laws, as they are the obstacles of that change and subversion of Religion, which they so much long for.

"2. The Bishops, and the corrupt part of the Clergy, who cherish formality and superstition, as the natural effects, and more probable supports of their own ecclesiastical tyranny and usurpation.

"3. Such counsellors and courtiers, as, for private ends, have engaged themselves to further the interests of some foreign Princes, or States, to the prejudice of his Majesty, and the State at home.

"The common principles by which they moulded and governed all their particular counsels and actions were

"First, to maintain continual differences and discontents betwixt the King and the people, upon questions of prerogative and liberty, that so they might have the advantage of siding with him, and under the notions of men addicted to his service, gain to themselves and their parties the places of the greatest trust and power in the Kingdom. (2.)

RE M. (3.) It is certain, this was the way Archbishop Laud, and the Arminian Party grew powerful at Court.

"A second, to suppress the purity and power of Religion, and such persons as were best affected to it, as being contrary to their own ends, and the greatest impediment to that change which they thought to introduce.

"A third, to conjoin those parties of the Kingdom which were most propitious to their own ends, and to divide those who were most opposite, which consisted in many particular observations.

"To cherish the Arminian party in those points, wherein they agree with the Papists to multiply and enlarge the difference between the common Protestants, and those whom they call Puritans, to introduce and countenance such opinions and ceremonies as are fittest for accommodation with Popery, to increase and maintain ignorance, looseness, and prophaneness in the people. That of those three parties, Papists, Arminians, and Libertines, they might compose a body fit to act such counsels and resolutions, as were most conducive to their own ends.

"A fourth, to disaffect the King to Parliaments by flanders and false imputations, and by putting them upon other ways of supply, which in shew and appearance were fuller of advantage than the ordinary course of subsidies, though in truth they brought more loss than gain both to the King and people, and have caused the great distractions under which we both suffer.

"As in all compounded bodies the operations are qualified according to the predominant element, so in this mixt party, the jesuited counsels being most active and prevailing, may easily be discovered to have had the greatest sway in all their determinations, and if they be not prevented, are likely to devour the rest, or to turn them into their own nature.

"In the beginning of his Majesty's Reign, the Party begun to revive and flourish again, having been somewhat damp't by the breach with Spain in the last year of King James, and by his Majesty's marriage with France; the interests and counsels of that state being not so contrary to the good of Religion, and the prosperity of this Kingdom, as those of Spain; and the Papists of England having been ever more addicted to Spain than France, yet they still retained a purpose and resolution to weaken the Protestant parties in all parts, and even in France, whereby to make way for the change of Religion, which they intended at home.

"1. The first effect and evidence of their recovery and strength, was the dissolution of the Parliament at Oxford, after there had been given two Subsidies to his Majesty, and before they received relief in any one grievance, many other more miserable effects followed.

"2. The loss of the Rachel fleet, by the help of our shipping, set forth and delivered over to the French, in opposition to the advice of Parliament, (3.) which left that town without defence by sea, and made way, not only to the loss of that important place, but likewise to the loss of all the strength and security of the Protestant Religion in France.

RE M. (3.) It cannot properly be said that the seven ships lent by Charles I. to the King of France were delivered to the French, in opposition to the advice of Parliament, since the thing was done before the Parliament was acquainted with it. It is likewise a great aggravation, to impute the loss of the Rachel fleet, and of Rachel itself, to the aid of the seven English ships, which the Mariners of that Nation had deserted.

"3. The diverting his Majesty's course of wars from the West-Indies, which was the most facile and hopeful way for this Kingdom to prevail against the Spaniards, to an expenceful and unsuccessful attempt upon Cale, which was so ordered as if it had rather been intended to make us weary of war, than to prosper it. (4.)

RE M. (4.) This Accusation seems a little too far-fetched, since Elizabeth had taken both courses with success.

"4. The precipitate breach with France, by taking their ships to a great value, without making recompence to the English, whose goods were thereupon imbarred, and confiscated in that Kingdom.

"5. The peace with Spain, without consent of Parliament, contrary to the promise of King James to both Houses, whereby the Palatine's cause was deferred and left to chargeable and hopeless treaties, which, for the most part, were managed by those, who might justly be suspected to be no friends to that cause. (5.)

RE M. (5.) This Article contains three Accusations against the King, 1. of making peace with Spain without consent of Parliament; 2. of neglecting, in this peace, the interest of the Elector Palatine. 3. of treating of that Prince's affairs by suspected persons. As to the first, it is true, King James had promised not to make peace with Spain without the Parliament's approbation: But it was at a time when the Parliament began to supply him with money for the war, and engaged to enable him to continue it. But the face of affairs was changed, when Charles I. made peace. As to the second charge of neglecting the cause of the Elector Palatine, it is properly a cavil, for the King, having no money to continue the war against Spain, was not in condition to support the Elector's cause. All that can be said, is, that he would have had money from the Parliament, had he been willing to redress the grievances, I am ignorant of the foundation of the third accusation.

"6. The charging of the Kingdom with billeted Soldiers in all parts of it, and that concomitant design of German Hosts, that the Land might either submit with fear, or be enforced with rigour to such arbitrary contributions as should be required of them. (6.)

RE M. (6.) These two accusations are unanswerable. There was but too much reason to believe, that this was done on purpose to establish an arbitrary Government.

"7. The dissolving of the Parliament in the second year of his Majesty's reign, after a declaration of their intent to grant five subsidies. (7.)

RE M. (7.) This Parliament was dissolved to save the Duke of Buckingham.

"8. The exacting of the like proportion of five subsidies after the Parliament was dissolved, by commission of Loan; and divers Gentlemen and others imprisoned for not yielding to pay that Loan, whereby many of them contracted such sicknesses as cost them their lives.

"9. Great sums of money required and raised by Privy-Seals. (8.)

RE M. (8.) These articles were notoriously true. There is no justifying them, but by asserting, the King had a right to do whatever he did. But that is a great question.

"10. An unjust and pernicious attempt to extort great payments from the Subject by way of Exchequer, and a commission issued under the Seal for that purpose.

"11. The Petition of Right, which was granted in full Parliament, blasted, with an illegal declaration to make it destructive to itself, to the power of Parliament, to the liberty of the Subject, and to that purpose printed with it; and the Petition made of no use but to shew the bold and presumptuous injustice of such Ministers as durst break the Laws, and suppress the liberties of the Kingdom, after they had been so solemnly and evidently declared.

"12. Another Parliament dissolved 4. Car. 3; the privilege of Parliament broken, by imprisoning divers Members of the House, detaining them close prisoners for many months together, without the liberty of using books, pen, ink, or paper, denying them all the comforts of life, all means of preservation of health, not permitting 147. "permitting their wives to come to them, even in time of their sickness.

"13. And for the completing that cruelty, after many years spent in such miserable durance, depriving them of the necessary means of spiritual consolation; not suffering them to go abroad to enjoy God's ordinances in God's house, or God's Ministers to come to them to minister comfort to them in their private chambers.

"14. And to keep them still in this oppressed condition, not admitting them to be bailed according to law, yet vexing them with informations in inferior Courts, sentencing and fining some of them for matters done in Parliament; and extorting the payments of those fines from them, enforcing others to put in security of good behaviour before they could be released.

"15. The imprisonment of the rest, which refused to be bound, still continued, which might have been perpetual, if necessity had not the last year brought another Parliament to relieve them, of whom one (a) died, by the cruelty and harshness of his imprisonment, which would admit of no relaxation, notwithstanding the eminent danger of his life did sufficiently appear by the declaration of his Physician. And his release, or at least his refreshment, was fought by many humble Petitions. And his blood still cries either for vengeance or repentance, of those Ministers of state who have at once obstructed the course both of his Majesty's justice and mercy. (9.)

R. E. M. (9.) The rigour exercised upon these Members of Parliament is one of the strongest proofs of the design to establish arbitrary power. And therefore the Commons largely insist upon this article.

"16. Upon the dissolution of both these Parliaments, untrue and scandalous declarations were published to affect their proceedings, and some of their Members, unjustly; to make them odious, and colour the violence which was used against them. (10.) Proclamations set out to the same purpose; and to the great dejecting the hearts of the people, forbidding them even to speak of Parliaments.

R. E. M. (10.) If by these Declarations are meant, those published to signify the causes of the dissolution of these Parliaments, it may be said, that the Commons swerved from the respect due to the King, by terming them untrue and scandalous, since they were published in his name.

"17. After the breach of the Parliament in the fourth of his Majesty, injustice, oppression and violence, broke in upon us, without any restraint or moderation, and yet the first project was the great sums exacted through the whole Kingdom, for default of Knighthood, which seemed to have some colour and shadow of a Law, yet if it be rightly examined by that obsolete Law which was pretended for it, it will be found to be against all the rules of justice, both in respect of the persons charged, the proportion of the fines demanded, and the absurd and unreasonable manner of their proceedings.

"18. Tunnage and Poundage hath been received without colour or pretence of Law: Many other heavy impositions continued against Law; and some so unreasonable, that the sum of the charge exceeds the value of the goods.

"19. The book of Rates lately enhanced to a high portion; and such merchants that would not submit to their illegal and unreasonable payments, were vexed and oppressed above measure; and the ordinary course of justice, the common birth-right of the Subjects of England, wholly obstructed and taken from them.

"20. And although this was taken on pretence of guarding the seas, yet a new and unheard of tax of Ship-money was devised, and upon the same pretence. By both which there was charged upon the Subject near 700,000*l.* some years; and yet the Merchants have been left so naked to the violence of the Turkish pyrates, that many great ships of value, and thousands of his Majesty's Subjects, have been taken by them, and do still remain in miserable slavery.

"21. The enlargement of Forests, contrary to Charta de Foresta, and the composition thereupon.

"22. The exactions of Coat and Conduct money, and divers other military charges. (11.)

R. E. M. (11.) The King being engaged in a war against Scotland, ordered that every County should find a certain number of soldiers, and cloath and pay them, till they came to the place of the general rendezvous, on condition of being repaid another time. On this pretence it was agreed with the Counties, that they should supply the King with a certain sum proportionable to the number of soldiers each County was to cloath and pay, for which the King took the whole charge upon himself. This was called Coat and Conduct-money; that is to say, money for cloath-ing and conducting the Troops. But this money was never restored.

"23. The taking away the arms of the Trained-bands of divers Counties. (12.)

R. E. M. (12.) The King intending to make a magazine of arms in the Castle of Edinburgh, found no speedier way than to take, in some Counties, the arms of the Militia, and send them to Scotland. But it was pretended, that at the same time, his design was to disarm, under that pretence, such persons as were not well-affected to him. Accordingly, this is insinuated by the Remonstrance, in the following article concerning Powder.

"24. The desperate design of engrossing all the Gunpowder into one hand, keeping it in the Tower of London, and setting so high a rate upon it, that the poorer sort were not able to buy it; nor could any have it without licence; thereby to leave the several parts of the Kingdom destitute of their necessary defence; and by selling so dear that which was sold, to make an unlawful advantage of it, to the great charge and detriment of the Subject.

"25. The general destruction of the King's Timber, especially that in the Forest of Dean, sold to Papists, which was the best store-house of this Kingdom for the maintenance of our shipping. (13.)

R. E. M. (13.) These points are perhaps a little aggravated, at least in respect to the motives and consequences.

"26. The taking away of men's right under colour of the King's title to Land, between high and low water marks.

"27. The monopolies of soap, salt, wine, leather, sea-coal, and in a manner, of all things of most common and necessary use.

"28. The restraint of the liberties of the Subjects in their habitations, trades, and other interests.

"29. Their vexation and oppression by purveyors, clerks of the market, and salt petre men.

"30. The sale of pretended nuisances, buildings in and about London.

"31. Conversion of arable into pasture, continuance of pasture, under the name of Depopulation, have driven many millions out of the Subjects purses, without any considerable profit to his Majesty. (14.)

R. E. M. (14.) The woollen trade being the great source of the riches of England, the Subjects were enjoined by several Statutes, not to change pasture into arable land, for fear of lessening the flocks, and consequently the wool. In King Charles's reign, the offenders against these Statutes were strictly inquired after, not with a view to hinder the abuses, but to authorize them by a composition with the King.

"32. Large quantities of common and several grounds hath been taken from the Subject, by colour of the Statute of improvement, and by abuse of the Commission of Sewers, without their consent, and against it. (15.)

R. E. M. (15.) Commissioners of Sewers are such as by authority under the Great Seal, see drains and ditches well kept and maintained in marshy and fenny Countries, for the better conveyance of the water into the sea, and preserving grass upon the land for the feeding of flocks and herds. The Commons complain that this Commission was abused.

"33. And not only private interest, but also publick faith hath been broken, in seizing of the money and bullion in the mint, and the whole Kingdom like to be robbed at once, in that abominable project of brais money. (16.)

R. E. M. (16.) The King took but forty thousand pounds out of the Mint, which sum was afterwards repaid to the Proprietors.

"34. Great numbers of his Majesty's Subjects, for refusing those unlawful charges, have been vexed with long and expensive suits; some fined and censured, others committed to long and hard imprisonments and confinements, to the loss of health in many, of life in some; and others have had their houses broken up, their goods seized, some have been restrained from their lawful callings.

"35. Ships have been interrupted in their voyages, surprized at sea in hostile manner by projectors, as by a common enemy.

"36. Merchants prohibited to unlade their goods in such ports as were for their own advantage, and forced to bring them to those places which were much for the advantage of the monopolizers and projectors.

"37. The Court of Star-Chamber hath abounded in extravagant censures, not only for the maintenance and improvement of monopolies, and other unlawful taxes, but for divers other causes, where there hath

"been no offence, or very small; whereby his Majesty's Subjects have been oppressed by grievous fines, imprisonments, stigmatizing, mutilations, whippings, pillories, gags, confinements, banishments; after so rigid a manner, as hath not only deprived men of the society of their friends, exercise of their professions, comfort of books, use of paper and ink, but even violated that near union which God hath established betwixt men and their wives, by forced and constrained separation, whereby they have been bereaved of the comfort and conversation one of another for many years together, without hope of relief, if God had not, by his over-ruling Providence, given some interruption to the prevailing power and counsel of those, who were the authors and promoters of such peremptory and heady courses. (17.)

R.E.M. (17.) This whole article relates to the rigorous treatment of Prynne, Baylwick, and Burton, by the Star-Chamber.

"38. Judges have been put out of their places for refusing to do against their oaths and consciences: others have been so awed that they durst not do their duties, and the better to hold a rod over them, the clause, Quam diu se bene gesserit, was left out of their Patents, and a new clause, Durante bene placito, inserted.

"39. Lawyers have been checked for being faithful to their clients: solicitors and attorneys have been threatened, and some punished for following lawful suits. And by this means all the approaches to justice were interrupted and foreclosed.

"40. New oaths have been forced upon the Subject against law.

"41. New judicatories erected without law. The Council-table have by their orders offered to bind the Subjects in their freeholds, estates, suits and actions.

"42. The pretended court of the Earl Marshal was arbitrary and illegal in its being and proceedings.

"43. The Chancery, Exchequer-Chamber, Court of Wards, and other English Courts, have been grievous in exceeding their jurisdiction.

"44. The estate of many families weakened, and some ruined by excessive fines, exacted from them for compositions of Wardships.

"45. All leases of above one hundred years made to draw on Wardship contrary to law.

"46. Undue proceedings used in the finding of offices, to make the Jury find for the King.

"47. The Common-Law Courts, seeing all men more inclined to seek justice there, where it may be fitted to their own desires, are known frequently to forsake the rules of the Common-Law, and straying beyond their bounds, under pretence of equity, to do injustice. (18.)

R.E.M. (18.) The Laws of England are divided into Common-Law, and Statute-Law: the first is founded on ancient custom, &c. and the other on Acts of Parliament: From these Laws the Judges are not allowed to swerve either to the right or left (a) The Court of Chancery only may in some cases judge according to equity. Now the King's Courts in taking upon them to judge according to equity, and not according to strict Law, had exceeded their jurisdiction, in order to favour the Court.

"48. Titles of honour, judicial places, serjeantships at law, and other offices have been sold for great sums of money; whereby the common justice of the Kingdom hath been much endangered, not only by opening a way of employment, in places of great trust and advantage to men of weak parts, but also by giving occasion to bribery, extortion, partiality; it seldom happening that places ill-gotten are well used. (19.)

R.E.M. (19.) A Serjeant at Law [or of the Coif] Serviens ad legem, is the highest degree taken in that profession, as that of Doctor is in the Civil Law. One Court is peculiar to them, namely, the Court of Common-Pleas, though they are not restrained from pleading in any other Court. Out of these are chosen one or more King's Serjeants, to plead for him in all causes, especially in those of treason (b).

"49. Commissions have been granted for examining the excesses of Fees: And when great exactions have been discovered, compositions have been made with Delinquents, not only for the time past, but likewise for immunity, and security in offending for the time to come, which under colour of remedy, hath but confirmed and increased the Grievance to the Subject.

"50. The usual course of pricking Sheriffs, not observed, but many times Sheriffs made in an extraordinary way, sometimes as a punishment and charge unto them, (20.) sometimes such were pricked out as would be instruments to execute whatsoever they would have to be done.

R.E.M. (20.) To hinder them from being chosen to serve in Parliament, as Sir Edward Coke, [Sir Robert Philips, and Sir Thomas Wentworth.] 16.1.

"51. The Bishops and the rest of the Clergy, did triumph in the suspensions, excommunications, deprivations, and degradations of divers painful, learned, and pious Ministers, in the vexation and grievous oppressions of great numbers of his Majesty's good Subjects.

"52. The High-Commission grew to such excess of sharpness and severity, as was not much less than the Romish Inquisition, and yet in many cases, by the Archbishop's power, was made much more heavy, being assisted and strengthened by authority of the Council-table.

"53. The Bishops and their Courts were as eager in the country; although their jurisdiction could not reach so high in rigour and extremity of punishment, yet were they no less grievous in respect of the generality and multiplicity of vexations, which lighting upon the meaner sort of tradesmen and artificers, did impoverish many thousands;

"54. And so afflict and trouble others, that great numbers, to avoid their miseries, departed out of the Kingdom; some into New-England, and other parts of America, others into Holland:

"55. Where they have transported their manufactures of cloth; which is not only a loss by diminishing the present stock of the Kingdom, but a great mischief by impairing and endangering the loss of that peculiar trade of clothing, which hath been a plentiful fountain of wealth and honour to this nation.

"56. Those were fittest for Ecclesiastical preferments, and soonest obtained it, who were most officious in promoting Superstition, most virulent in railing against godliness and honestly. (21.)

R.E.M. (21.) By these are to be understood such as were most incited against Presbyterianism.

"57. The most public and solemn sermons before his Majesty, were, either to advance prerogative above Law, and decry the property of the Subject, or full of such kind of invectives;

"58. Whereby they might make those odious who sought to maintain the Religion, Laws, and Liberties of the Kingdom; and such men were sure to be weeded out of the Commission of the Peace, and out of all other employments of power in the government of the Country.

"59. Many noble persons were Counsellors in name, but the power and authority remained in a few of such as were most addicted to this party: whose resolutions and determinations were brought to the Table for countenance and execution, and not for debate and deliberation; and no man could offer to oppose them without disgrace and hazard to himself.

"60. Nay, all those that did not wholly concur, and actively contribute to the furtherance of their designs, though, otherwise, persons of never so great honour and abilities, were so far from being employed in any place of trust and power, that they were neglected, discountenanced, and upon all occasions injured and oppressed.

"61. This faction was grown to that height and entrenchment of power, that now they began to think of finishing of their work, which consisted of these three parts.

"62. I. The Government must be set free from all restraint of Laws concerning our persons and estates.

"63. II. There must be a conjunction betwixt Papists and Protestants in doctrine, discipline, and ceremonies, and only it must not yet be called Popery.

"64. III. The Puritans, under which name they include all those that desire to preserve the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, and to maintain Religion in the power of its, must be either rooted out of the Kingdom with force, or driven out with fear.

"65. For the effecting of this, it was thought necessary to reduce Scotland to such Popish superstitions and innovations, as might make them apt to join with England in that great change which was intended.

"66. Whereupon new Canons and a new Liturgy were preft upon them; and when they refused to admit of them, an army was raised to force them to it, towards which the Clergy and the Papists were very forward in their contribution.

"67. The Scots likewise raised an army for their defence.

"68. And when both armies were come together, and ready for a bloody encounter, his Majesty's own gracious disposition, and the counsel of the English Nobility, and dutiful submission of the Scots, did so far prevail against the evil counsel of others, that a Pacification was made,

(a) The Author in this Remark has confounded, in the Original, the Common and Statute Law, making them to be the same.

(b) The Author has committed likewise some mistakes in this Remark, which are corrected in the Translation.

1641. "and his Majesty returned with peace and much honour to London.

"69. The unexpected reconciliation was most acceptable to all the Kingdom except to the malignant party; whereof the Archbishop and the Earl of Strafford being heads, they and their faction began to inveigh against the peace, and to aggravate the proceedings of the States, which so incensed his Majesty, that he forthwith prepared again for war.

"70. And such was their confidence, that having corrupted and disaffected the whole frame and government of the Kingdom, they did now hope to corrupt that which was the only means to restore all to a right frame and temper again.

"71. To which end they persuaded his Majesty to call a Parliament, not to seek counsel and advice of them, but to draw countenance and supply from them, and to engage the whole Kingdom in their quarrel.

"72. And in the mean time, continued all their unjust levies of money, resolving either to make the Parliament pliant to their will, and to establish mischief by a law, or else to break it, and with more colour to go on by violence, to take what they could not obtain by consent. The ground alleged for the justification of this war was this:

"73. That the undutiful demands of the Parliaments in Scotland was a sufficient reason for his Majesty to take arms against them, without hearing the reason of those demands, and thereupon a new army was prepared against them; their ships were seized in all parts both of England and Ireland, and at sea; their Petitions rejected, their commissioners refused audience.

"74. This whole Kingdom most miserably disaffected with levies of men and money; and imprisonments of those who denied to submit to those levies.

"75. The Earl of Strafford passed into Ireland, caused the Parliament there to declare against the Scots, to give four subsidies towards that war; and to engage themselves, their lives and fortunes for the prosecution of it; and gave directions for an army of eight thousand foot, and one thousand Horse, to be levied there, which were for the most part Papists.

"76. The Parliament met upon the 13th of April 1640. The Earl of Strafford, and Archbishop of Canterbury, with their party, so prevailed with his Majesty, that the House of Commons was pressed to yield a supply for maintenance of the war with Scotland, before they had provided any relief for the great and pressing grievances of the People; which being against the fundamental privilege and proceeding of Parliament, was yet in humble respect to his Majesty so far admitted, as that they agreed to take the matter of supply into consideration, and two several days it was debated.

"77. Twelve Subsidies were demanded for the release of Ship-money alone: A third day was appointed for conclusion, when the heads of that party began to fear, the People might close with the King, in satisfying his desires of money: But that which, they were like to blast their malicious designs against Scotland, finding them very much indisposed to give any countenance to that war.

"78. Thereupon they wickedly advised the King to break off the Parliament, and to return to the ways of confusion, in which their own evil intentions were most like to prosper and succeed. (22).

REMARK. (22). The Lord Clarendon, then a member of the House of Commons, affirms, that the House was very well inclined to satisfy the King, if he would have had a little patience, and that he repented afterwards his precipitation. This confirms what is said here, that the Parliament was dissolved, for some private ends of those who most influenced the King's Council.

"79. After the Parliament ended, the 5th of May 1640, this party grew so bold, as to counsel the King to supply himself out of his Subjects estates, by his own power, at his own will, without their consent.

"80. The very next day, some Members of both Houses had their studies and cabinets, yea their pockets searched: Another of them not long after was committed close prisoner, for not delivering some Petitions which he received by authority of that House.

"81. And if harsher courses were intended (as was reported) it is very probable, that the sickness of the Earl of Strafford, and the tumultuous rising in Southwark and about Lambeth, were the causes that such violent intentions were not brought to execution.

"82. A false and scandalous declaration against the House of Commons was published in his Majesty's name, which yet wrought little effect with the People, but only to manifest the impudence of those who were authors of it.

"83. A forced loan of money was attempted in the city of London.

"84. The Lord-mayor and Aldermen in their several Wards, enjoined to bring in a list of the names of such persons as they judged fit to lend, and of the sum they should lend, and such Aldermen as refused so to do were committed to prison.

"85. The Archbishop, and the other Bishops and Clergy continued the Convocation, and by a new commission turned it into a Provincial Synod, in which, by an unheard-of presumption, they made Canons that contain in them many matters, contrary to the King's Prerogative; to the fundamental Laws and Statutes of the realm; to the right of Parliaments; to the property and liberty of the Subject; and matters tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence; thereby establishing their own usurpations, justifying their Altar-worship, and those other superstitious innovations, which they formerly introduced without warrant of Law.

"86. They imposed a new oath upon divers of his Majesty's Subjects both Ecclesiastical and Lay, for maintenance of their own tyranny, and laid a great tax upon the Clergy for supply of his Majesty, and generally they shewed themselves very affectionate to the war with Scotland, which was by some of them styled Bellum Episcopale, and a prayer composed, and enjoined to be read in Churches, calling the Scots rebels, to put the two nations in blood, and make them irreconcilable.

"87. All those pretended Canons and Constitutions were armed with the several censures of suspension, excommunication, deprivation, by which they would have thrust out all the good Ministers, and most of the well-affected people of the Kingdom, and left an easy passage to their own design of reconciliation with Rome. (23).

REMARK. (23). The Commons go doubtless too far, when they impute to the whole Convocation of 1640, the design of restoring Popery. This is not at all likely, supposing it were true, that some of the Bishops had formed such a project, which was never well proved (a).

"88. The Popish party enjoyed such exemptions from Penal Laws, as amounted to a Toleration, besides many other encouragements and court-favours.

"89. They had a Secretary of State, Sir Francis Windebank, a powerful agent for speeding all their desires.

"90. A Pope's Nuncio residing here, to act and govern them according to such influences as he received from Rome, and to intercede for them with the most powerful concurrence of the foreign Princes of that Religion.

"91. By his authority the Papists of all sorts, Nobility, Gentry, and Clergy were, convoked after the manner of a Parliament.

"92. New jurisdictions were erected of Romish Archbishops, taxes levied, another state moulded within this state independent in Government, contrary in interest and affection, secretly corrupting the ignorant or negligent professors of our Religion, and closely uniting and combining themselves against such as were found in this posture, waiting for an opportunity by force to destroy those whom they could not hope to seduce.

"93. For the effecting whereof, they were strengthened with arms and munition, encouraged by superstitious prayers, enjoined by the Nuncio, to be weekly made for the prosperity of some great design.

"94. And such power had they at Court, that secretly a commission was issued out, or intended to be issued to some great man of that profession, for the levying of soldiers, and to command and employ them according to private instructions, which we doubt were framed for the advantage of those who were the contrivers of them.

"95. His Majesty's treasure was consumed, his revenue anticipated.

"96. His servants and officers compelled to lend great sums of money.

"97. Multitudes were called to the Council-table, who were tired with long attendances there for refusing illegal payments.

"98. The prisons were filled with their commitments: many of the Sheriffs summoned into the Star-Chamber; and some imprisoned for not being quick enough in levying the Ship-money; the people languished under grief and fear; no visible hope being left but in desperation.

"99. They

(a) It is observable, that this very Convocation censured Goodman, Bishop of Gloster, for favouring Popery.

" 99. The Nobility began to be weary of their silence and patience, and sensible of the duty and trust which belongs to them; and thereupon some of the most ancient of them did petition his Majesty at such a time, when evil counsellors were so strong, that they had occasion to expect more hazard to themselves, than redress of those public evils for which they interceded.

" 100. Whilst the Kingdom was in this agitation and distemper, the Scots restrained in their trades, impoverished by the loss of many of their ships, bereaved of all possibility of satisfying his Majesty by any naked supplications, entered with a powerful army into the Kingdom, and without any hostile act or spoil in the country they passed, more than forcing a passage over the Tyne at Newburne near Newcastle; possessed themselves of Newcastle; and had a fair opportunity to press on farther upon the King's army.

" 101. But duty and reverence to his Majesty, and brotherly love to the English Nation, made them stay there, whereby the King had leisure to entertain better counsels.

" 102. Wherein God so blessed and directed him, that he summoned the great Council of Peers to meet at Torh upon the 24th of September, and there declared a Parliament, to begin the third of November then following.

" 103. The Scots, the first day of the great Council, presented an humble Petition to his Majesty, whereupon the treaty was appointed at Rippon.

" 104. A present cessation of arms agreed upon, and the full conclusion of all differences referred to the wisdom and care of the Parliament. (24.)

REM. (24.) The Commons suppose, that as the Scots had petitioned the King to redress their Grievances with the advice of the Parliament of England; and as on that occasion the King had called a Parliament, this was a tacit consent of both Parties to leave things to the Parliament of England. But this is only a supposition; for there was no agreement to refer matters to the Parliament.

" 105. At our first meeting, all opposition seemed to vanish, the mischiefs were so evident, which those evil counsellors produced, that no man durst stand up to defend them, yet the work itself afforded difficulty enough.

" 106. The multiplied evils and corruptions of sixteen years, strengthened by custom and authority, and the concurrent Interest of many powerful Delinquents, were now to be brought to judgment and reformation.

" 107. The King's household was to be provided for; they had brought him to that want, that he could not supply his ordinary and necessary expences without the assistance of his People.

" 108. Two armies were to be paid, which amounted very near to eighty thousand pounds a month.

" 109. The People were to be tenderly charged, having been formerly exhausted with many burthenome projects.

" 110. The difficulties seemed to be insuperable, which by the divine Providence we have overcome. The contrarieties incompatible, which yet in a great measure we have reconciled.

" 111. Six subsidies have been granted, and a Bill of Poll-money (a), which if it be duly levied, may equal six subsidies more, in all six hundred thousand pounds.

" 112. Besides, we have contracted a debt to the Scots of two hundred and twenty thousand pounds; yet God hath so blessed the endeavours of this Parliament, that the Kingdom is a great gainer by all these charges.

" 113. The Ship-money is abolished, which cost the Kingdom above two hundred thousand pounds a year.

" 114. The Coat and Conduct-money, and other military charges are taken away, which in many Counties amounted to little less than the Ship-money.

" 115. The Monopolies are all suppressed, whereof some few did prejudice the Subject above a million yearly.

" 116. The Soap, an hundred thousand pounds.

" 117. The Wine, three hundred thousand pounds.

" 118. The Leather must needs exceed both, and Salt could be no less than that.

" 119. Besides the inferior Monopolies, which if they could be exactly computed, would make up a great sum.

" 120. That which is more beneficial than all this, is, that the root of these evils is taken away, which was the arbitrary power pretended to be in his Majesty, of taxing the Subject, or charging their estates without consent in Parliament, which is now declared to be against Law, by the judgment of both Houses, and likewise by an Act of Parliament.

" 121. Another step of great advantage is this, the living grievances, the evil counsellors and actors of these mischiefs have been so quelled.

" 122. By the justice done upon the Earl of Strafford, the flight of the Lord Finch, and Secretary Windbank.

" 123. The accusation and imprisonment of the Archbishop of Canterbury, of Judge Berkley; And,

" 124. The impeachment of divers other Bishops and Judges, that it is like not only to be an ease to the present times, but a preservation to the future.

" 125. The discontinuance of Parliaments is prevented by the Bill for a Triennial Parliament, and the abrupt dissolution of this Parliament by another Bill, by which it is provided, it shall not be dissolved or adjourned without the consent of both Houses.

" 126. Which two Laws well considered, may be thought more advantageous than all the former, because they secure a full operation of the present remedy, and afford a perpetual spring of remedies for the future.

" 127. The Star-Chamber;

" 128. The High-Commission;

" 129. The Courts of the President and Council in the North, were so many forges of misery, and oppression, and violence, and are all taken away, whereby men are more secured in their persons, liberties, and estates, than they could by any law or example, for the regulation of those Courts of terror of the Judges.

" 130. The immoderate power of the Council-table, and the excessive abuse of that power is so ordered and restrained, that we may well hope, that no such things as were frequently done by them, to the prejudice of the public Liberty, will appear in future times but only in stories, to give us and our posterity more occasion to praise God for his Majesty's goodness, and the faithful endeavours of this Parliament.

" 131. The Canons and power of Canon-making are blasted by the votes of both Houses.

" 132. The exorbitant power of Bishops and their Courts are much abated, by some provisions in the Bill against the High-Commission Courts, the authors of the many innovations in Doctrine and Ceremonies.

" 133. The Ministers that have been scandalous in their lives, have been so terrified by just complaints and accusations, that we may well hope they will be more modest for the time to come; either inwardly convicted by the sight of their own folly, or outwardly restrained by the fear of punishment.

" 134. The Forests are by a good Law reduced to their right bounds.

" 135. The encroachments and oppressions of the Stannery Courts (b), the extortions of the Clerk of the market.

" 136. And the compulsion of the Subject, to receive the order of Knighthood against his will, paying of fines for not receiving it; and the vexatious proceedings thereupon for levying of those fines, are by other beneficial laws reformed and prevented.

" 137. Many excellent laws and provisions are in preparation for removing the inordinate power, vexation and usurpations of Bishops; for reforming the pride and idleness of many of the Clergy; for easing the people of unnecessary ceremonies in Religion; for censuring and removing unworthy and unprofitable Ministers, and for maintaining godly and diligent preachers through the Kingdom.

" 138. Other things of main importance for the good of this Kingdom are in proposition, though little could hitherto be done in regard of the many other more pressing businesses, which yet before the end of this Session we hope may receive some progress and perfection.

" 139. The establishing and ordering the King's Revenue, that so the abuse of officers, and superfluity of expences may be cut off, and the necessary disbursements for his Majesty's honour, the defence and government of the Kingdom, may more certainly be provided for.

" 140. The regulating of Courts of Justice, and abridging both the delays and charges of Law-suits.

" 141. The settling of some good courses for preventing the exportation of gold and silver, and the inequality of exchanges betwixt us and other nations, for the advancing of native commodities, increase of our manufactures, and well-balancing of trade, whereby the stock of the Kingdom may be increased, or at least kept from impairing, as through neglect heretofore it hath done for many years last past.

" 142. Improving the Herring-fishing upon our own coasts, which will be of mighty use in the employment of the poor, and a plentiful nursery of manners, for enabling the Kingdom in any great action.

(a) And it was according to the following proportion. A Duke paid 100^l. a Marquis 50^l. a Knight his Bath-house 20^l. Esquires, 10^l. every Gentleman that could spend 100^l. 10^l.

(b) Courts, wherein Assize, relating to the Tyne, and Tin mines, are decided. So called from the Latin word Stannum, Tin.

1641.

" 143. The oppositions, obstructions, and other difficulties wherewith we have been encountered, and which still lie in our way with some strength, and much obstinacy, are these; the malignant party, whom we have formerly described to be the actors and promoters of all our misery, that have taken heart again:

" 144. They have been able to prefer some of their own factors and agents to degrees of honour, to places of trust and employment, even during the Parliament: " 145. They have endeavoured to work in his Majesty ill impressions and opinions of our proceedings, as if we had altogether done our own work, and not his; and had obtained from him many things very prejudicial to the Crown, both in respect of prerogative and profit.

" 146. To wipe out this slander, we think good only to say thus much; that all that we have done is for his Majesty, his greatness, honour, and support, when we yield to give twenty five thousand pounds a month for the relief of the northern counties; this was given to the King, for he was bound to protect his Subjects.

" 147. They were his Majesty's evil counsellors, and their ill instruments, that were actors in those grievances which brought in the Scots.

" 148. And if his Majesty please to force those who were the authors of this war, to make satisfaction, as he might justly and easily do, it seems very reasonable, that the people might well be excused from taking upon them this burden, being altogether innocent, and free from being any cause of it.

" 149. When we undertook the charge of the army, which cost above 50,000 l. a month, was not this given to the King? Was it not his Majesty's army? Were not all the commanders under contract with his Majesty at higher rates, and greater wages than ordinary:

" 150. And have not we taken upon us to discharge all the brotherly assistance of three hundred thousand pounds, which we gave the Scots? Was it not toward repair of those damages and losses which they received from the King's Ships, and from his Ministers?

" 151. These three particulars amount to above eleven hundred thousand pounds.

" 152. Besides his Majesty hath received, by impositions upon merchandize, at least four hundred thousand pounds.

" 153. So that his Majesty hath had out of the Subjects purse, since the Parliament began, one million and a half; and yet these men can be so impudent, as to tell his Majesty, that we have done nothing for him.

" 154. As to the second branch of this slander, we acknowledge with much thankfulness, that his Majesty hath passed more good Bills to the advantage of the Subjects, than have been in many ages.

" 155. But withal, we cannot forget that those venomous counsels did manifest themselves in some endeavours to hinder these good Acts.

" 156. And for both Houses of Parliament we may with truth and modesty say thus much: That we have ever been careful not to desire any thing that should weaken the Crown, either in just profit or useful power.

" 157. The Triennial Parliament for the matter of it, doth not extend to so much, as by Law we ought to have required, there being two Statutes still in force for a Parliament to be once a year (25.), and for the manner of it, it is in the King's power, that it shall never take effect, if he, by a timely summons, shall prevent any other way of assembling. (26).

REM. (25). But these Statutes, by disuse, were grown obsolete, like that of Edward II., on which the King proceeded to compel People to receive the order of Knighthood.

REM. (26). The Commons might have said, that he was himself the cause of this Act, for not calling a Parliament in twelve years.

" 158. In the Bill for continuance of this present Parliament, there seems to be some restraint of the royal power in dissolving of Parliaments, not to take it out of the Crown, but to suspend the execution of it for this time and occasion only; which was so necessary for the King's own security, and the public peace, that without it we could not have undertaken any of these great charges, but must have left both the armies to disorder, and confusion, and the whole Kingdom to blood and rapine. (27).

REM. (27). The Commons understand here more than they express. Their aim is to shew, that without this Act, the King would not have failed to dissolve the Parliament; consequently the Peace with Scotland would not have been concluded, and the two armies would have ravaged the Kingdom.

" 159. The Star-Chamber was much more fruitful in " oppression than in profit, the great fines being for the most part given away, and the rest stalled at long times.

" 160. The fines of the High-Commission were in themselves unjust, and seldom or never came into the King's purse. These four Bills are particularly and more specially intanced.

" 161. In the rest there will not be found so much as a shadow of prejudice to the Crown.

" 162. They have sought to diminish our reputation with the People, and to bring them out of love with Parliaments.

" 163. The aspersions which they have attempted this way have been such as these;

" 164. That we have spent much time and done little, especially in those grievances which concern Religion.

" 165. That the Parliament is a burthen to the Kingdom, by the abundance of protections which hinder justice and trade (28.), and by many subsidies granted, much more heavy than any formerly endured.

REM. (28). Every Member of Parliament had a right to grant protections to his servants and dependents, so that they cannot be prosecuted in any Courts. It is certain, this right was abused by many Members, in granting protections to persons without any lawful foundation, nay, some even sold them.

" 166. To which there is a ready answer, if the time spent in this Parliament, be considered in relation backward to the long growth and deep root of those grievances which we have removed, to the powerful supports of those Delinquents which we have pursued, to the great necessities and other charges of the Commonwealth, for which we have provided;

" 167. Or if it be considered in relation forward to many advantages, which not only the present, but future ages are like to reap by the good Laws, and other proceedings in this Parliament, we doubt not but it will be thought by all indifferent judgments, that our time hath been much better employed, than in a far greater proportion of time in many former Parliaments put together, and the charges which have been laid upon the Subjects, and the other inconveniencies which they have born, will seem very light in respect of the benefit they have and may receive.

" 168. And for the matter of protection, the Parliament is so sensible of it, that therein they intended to give them whatsoever ease may stand with honour and justice, and are in a way of passing a Bill to give them satisfaction.

" 169. They have sought by many subtle practices to cause jealousies and divisions betwixt us and our brethren of Scotland, by slandering their proceedings and intentions toward us, and by secret endeavours to inflame and incense them and us one against another.

" 170. They have had such a party of Bishops and Popish Lords in the House of Peers, as hath caused much opposition and delay in the prosecution of Delinquents, hindered the proceedings of divers good Bills passed in the Commons House, concerning the reformation of sundry great abuses and corruptions both in Church and State.

" 171. They have laboured to seduce and corrupt some of the Commons House, to draw them into conspiracies and combinations against the liberty of the Parliament.

" 172. And by their instruments and agents, they have attempt to disaffect and discontent his Majesty's army; and to engage it for the maintenance of their wicked and traitorous designs; the keeping up of Bishops in votes and functions, and by force to compel the Parliament to order, limit and dispose their proceedings, in such manner, as might best concur with the intentions of this dangerous and potent faction.

" 173. And when one mischievous design and attempt of theirs, to bring on the army against the Parliament, and the City of London, hath been discovered and prevented;

" 174. They presently undertook another of the same damnable nature, with this addition to it, to endeavour to make the Scottish army neutral, whilst the English army, which they had laboured to corrupt and in venom against us, by their false and slanderous suggestions, should execute their malice, to the subversion of our Religion, and the dissolution of our Government.

" 175. Thus they have been continually practising to disturb the peace, and plotting the destruction even of all the King's dominions; and have employed their emissaries, and agents in them, all for the promoting their devilish designs, which the vigilancy of those who were well affected, hath still discovered and defeated, before they were ripe for execution in England and Scotland.

" 176. Only

“ 176. Only in Ireland, which was farther off, they have had time and opportunity to mould and prepare their work, and had brought it to that perfection, that they had possessed themselves of that whole Kingdom, totally subverted the Government of it, root out Religion, and destroyed all the Protestants, whom the conscience of their duty to God, their King and Country, would not have permitted to join with them, if by God's wonderful providence, their main enterprise upon the City and Castle of Dublin had not been detected and prevented upon the very eve before it should have been executed.

“ 177. Notwithstanding they have, in other parts of that Kingdom, broken out into open rebellion, surprizing towns and castles, committed murders, and rapes, and other villanies, and shaken off all bounds of obedience to his Majesty and the Laws of the realm. (29.)

REM. (29.) The Commons, in these two last Articles, consider the malignant party of England as the principal authors of the Irish Rebellion, and artfully confound whatever had been done in England for fifteen years, and the massacre of Ireland in 1641, under the same idea, as proceeding from the same source, which was never well proved.

“ 178. And in general have kindled such a fire, as nothing but God's infinite blessing upon the wisdom and endeavours of this State will be able to quench.

“ 179. And certainly had not God, in his great mercy unto this Land, discovered and confounded their former designs, we had been the prologue to this tragedy in Ireland, and had by this been made the lamentable spectacle of misery and confusion.

“ 180. And now what hope have we but in God, when, as the only means of our subsistence and power of Reformation is under him in the Parliament?

“ 181. But what can we the Commons, without the conjunction of the House of Lords; and what conjunction can we expect there, when the Bishops and recusant Lords are so numerous, and prevalent, that they are able to cross, and interrupt our best endeavours for Reformation, and by that means give advantage to this malignant party, to traduce our proceedings?

“ 182. They infuse into the People, that we mean to abolish all Church-government, and leave every man to his own fancy, for the service and worship of God, absolving him of that obedience which he owes under God unto his Majesty; whom we know to be intrusted with the Ecclesiastical Law, as well as with the Temporal, to regulate all the Members of the Church of England, by such rule of order and discipline, as are established by Parliament; which is his great Council, in all affairs both in Church and State. (30.)

REM. (30.) It is true, the Commons declare here, that their intention is not to set up an independency in matter of Religion. But as to what concerns the government of the Church they speak obscurely, because it was not yet time to declare themselves more openly. They are contented with asserting, that the King ought to take the Parliament's advice in the affairs of the Church, a maxim they intended to make great use of.

“ 183. We confess our intention is, and our endeavours have been, to reduce within bounds that exorbitant power, which the Prelates have assumed unto themselves, so contrary both to the word of God, and to the Laws of the Land; to which end we passed the Bill for the removing them from their temporal power and employments; that so the better they might with meekness apply themselves to the discharge of their functions; which Bill themselves oppose, and were the principal instruments of crossing it.

“ 184. And we do here declare, That it is far from our purpose or desire, to let loose the golden reins of discipline and government in the Church, to leave private persons, or particular congregations, to take up what form of divine service they please; for we hold it requisite, that there should be throughout the whole realm a conformity to that order which the Laws enjoin according to the word of God. (31.) And we desire to unburthen the consciences of men of needless and superstitious ceremonies, suppress innovations, and take away the monuments of idolatry.

REM. (31.) Great use was afterwards made of this restriction, according to the word of God, to introduce greater alterations than those mentioned in this article.

“ 185. And the better to effect the intended Reformation, we desire there may be a general Synod of the most grave, pious, learned, and judicious Divines of this island; assisted with some from foreign parts, professing the same Religion with us; who may consider of all things necessary for the peace and good government of the Church, and represent the results of their consultations unto the Parliament, to be there allowed of and confirmed, and receive the stamp of authority; thereby to find passage and obedience throughout the Kingdom. (32.)

REM. (32.) The Commons discover here more clearly their intentions, in that, 1. It does not appear that they would admit Bishops into this Synod. 2. In that they would have it to consist of Divines of the Island, and consequently of Scots, who were all Presbyterians, and of some foreign Ministers who were too too.

“ 186. They have maliciously charged us, that we intend to destroy and discourage learning; whereas it is our chiefest care and desire to advance it; and to provide a competent maintenance for conscientious and preaching Ministers throughout the Kingdom, which will be a great encouragement to scholars, and a certain means, whereby the want, meanness, and ignorance, to which a great part of the Clergy is now subject, will be prevented.

“ 187. And we intended likewise to reform and purge the fountains of learning, the two Universities, that the streams flowing from thence may be clear and pure, and an honour and comfort to the whole land. (33.)

REM. (33.) It is certain, at the time this Remonstrance was published, the resolution of abolishing the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy was already taken, though it was not yet openly declared. Accordingly, the design to purge the two Universities was executed, by turning out the Heads and Professors of the Church of England, and putting in Presbyterians.

“ 188. They have strained to blast our proceedings in Parliament, by wresting the interpretations of our orders from their genuine intention.

“ 189. They tell the people, that our meddling with the power of Episcopacy, hath caused sectaries and conventicles, when idolatry and popish ceremonies introduced into the Church by the command of the Bishops, have not only debared the People from thence, but expelled them from the Kingdom.

“ 190. Thus with Eliah, we are called by this malignant party the troublers of the State, and still while we endeavour to reform their abuses, they make us the authors of those mischiefs we study to prevent.

“ 191. For the perfecting of the work begun, and removing all future impediments, we conceive these courses will be very effectual, seeing the Religion of the Papists hath such principles as do certainly tend to the destruction and extirpation of all Protestants, when they shall have opportunity to effect it.

“ 192. It is necessary in the first place to keep them in such condition, as that they may not be able to do us any hurt, and for avoiding of such connivance and favour as hath heretofore been shewed unto them.

“ 193. That his Majesty be pleased to grant a standing commission to some choice men named in Parliament, who may take notice of their increase, their counsels and proceedings, and use all due means by execution of the Laws, to prevent all mischievous designs against the peace and safety of this Kingdom.

“ 194. That some good course be taken to discover the counterfeit and false conformity of Papists to the Church, by colour whereof, persons very much disaffected to the true Religion, have been admitted into places of greatest trust and authority in the Kingdom.

“ 195. For the better preservation of the Laws and liberties of the Kingdom, that all the illegal grievances and exactions be prevented and punished at the Sessions and Assizes.

“ 196. And that Judges and Justices be very careful to give this in charge to the Grand Juries, and both the Sheriff and Justices to be sworn to the due execution of the Petition of Right, and other Laws.

“ 197. That his Majesty be humbly petitioned by both Houses, to employ such counsellors, ambassadors, and other Ministers in managing his business at home and abroad, as the Parliament may have cause to confide in, without which we cannot give his Majesty such supplies for support of his own estate, nor such assistance to the Protestant party beyond the sea, as is desired.

“ 198. It may often fall out, that the Commons may have just cause to take exceptions at some men for being Counsellors, and yet not charge those men with crimes, for there be grounds of diffidence which lie not in proof.

“ 199. There are others, which though they may be proved, yet are not legally criminal.

“ 200. To be a known favourer of Papists, or to have been very forward in defending or countenancing some great offenders questioned in Parliament; or to speak contemptuously of either Houses of Parliament, or parliamentary proceedings: (34.)

REM. (34.) It is not unlikely the Commons meant here the Lord Digby, Son to the Earl of Bristol.

"201. Or such as are factors or agents for any foreign Prince of another Religion; such as are justly suspected to get Counsellors places, or any other of trust, concerning publick employment for money; for all these and divers others, we may have great reason to be earnest with his Majesty, not to put his great affairs into such hands, though we may be unwilling to proceed against them in any legal way of charge or impeachment.

"202. That all Counsellors of State may be sworn to observe those laws which concern the Subject in his liberty, that they may likewise take an oath not to receive, or give reward or pension from any foreign Prince, but such as they shall within some reasonable time discover to the Lords of his Majesty's Council.

"203. And although they should wickedly forswear themselves, yet it may herein do good to make them known to be false and perjured to those who employed them, and thereby bring them into as little credit with them as with us.

"204. That his Majesty may have cause to be in love with good counsel and good men, by shewing him, in an humble and dutiful manner, how full of advantage it would be to himself, to see his own estate settled in a plentiful condition to support his honour; to see his people united in ways of duty to him, and endeavours of the publick good; to see happiness, wealth, peace and safety derived to his own Kingdom, and procured to his allies by the influence of his own power and Government."

It is easy to perceive, after reading this Remonstrance or Declaration, that it was a real Manifesto against the King, under the name of the Counsellors, Ministers, and Magistrates. And therefore, before we proceed, it is reasonable to shew the Reader the King's answer to the Petition, which accompanied the Remonstrance, and then to the Remonstrance itself.

His Majesty's Answer to the Petition, which accompanied the Declaration presented to him at Hampton-Court, December 1, 1641.

Rushworth,
IV. p. 452.
Nation,
T. II. 744.

"WE having received from you, soon after our return out of Scotland, a long Petition, consisting of many desires of great moment, together with a Declaration of a very unusual nature annexed therunto, we had taken some time to consider of it, as befitting us in a matter of that consequence, being confident that your own reason and regard to us, as well as our express intimation, by our Controller, to that purpose, would have refrained you from the publishing of it, till such time as you should have received our answer to it; but much against our expectation, finding the contrary, that the said Declaration is already abroad in print, by directions from your House, as appears by the printed copy, we must let you know, that we are very sensible of the disrespect.

"Notwithstanding it is our intention, that no failing on your part shall make us fail in ours, of giving all due satisfaction to the desires of our people in a parliamentary way; and therefore we send you this answer to your Petition, reserving our self in point of the Declaration, which we think unparliamentary, and shall take a course to do that which we shall think fit in prudence and honour.

"To the Petition we say, That although there are divers things in the preamble of it, which we are so far from admitting, that we profess we cannot at all understand them, as of a wicked and malignant party prevalent in the Government; of some of that party admitted to our Privy-Council, and to other employments of trust, and nearest to us and our children; of endeavours to sow among the people false scandals and imputations, to blemish and disgrace the proceedings of the Parliament: All, or any of which, did we know of, we should be as ready to remedy and punish, as you to complain of; so that the prayers of your Petition are grounded upon such premises, as we must in no wise admit; yet notwithstanding, we are pleased to give this answer to you. (1.)

R.E.M. (1.) This is general answer of the King was not capable of combating the particular facts, whereby the Commons pretended to prove, in the Remonstrance, that for several years past, the Court or malignant party had endeavoured to establish an arbitrary Government.

"To the first, concerning Religion, consisting of several branches, we say, that for preserving the peace and safety of this Kingdom from the designs of the Popish party, we have, and will still concur with all the just desires of our people in a parliamentary way: (2.) That for the depriving of the Bishops of their Votes in Parliament, we would have you consider, that their right is grounded upon the fundamental law of the Kingdom, and Constitution of Parliament: This we would have you consider; but since you desire our concurrence No 63. VOL. II.

"herein in a Parliamentary way, we will give no further answer at this time.

R.E.M. (2.) It is true, the King had never rejected the Petitions presented to him on this occasion by the Parliament, but had always granted whatever was desired. But then it is no less true, that his promises in this respect had never been executed. Wherefore the Parliament did not complain of want of concurrence, but of want of performance. So the King's answer as to his concurrence was not properly to the purpose.

"As for the abridging of the inordinate power of the Clergy, we conceive that the taking away of the High-Commission-Court hath well moderated that; but if there continue any usurpations or excesses in their jurisdictions, we therein neither have, nor will, protect them. (3.)

R.E.M. (3.) It would have been very difficult to agree with the King upon what should be considered as usurpations or excesses in the jurisdiction of the Clergy. So the King properly bound himself to nothing by this general promise.

"Unto that clause which concerneth corruptions (as you stile them) in Religion, in Church-Government, and in discipline, and the removing of such necessary Ceremonies as weak consciences might check; that for any illegal innovations which may have crept in, we shall willingly concur in the removal of them: That if our Parliament shall advise us to call a National Synod, which may duly examine such ceremonies as give just cause of offence to any, we shall take into consideration, and apply ourself to give due satisfaction therein; (4.) but we are very sorry to hear in such general terms, Corruption in Religion objected, since we are persuaded in our conscience, that no Church can be found upon the Earth that professeth the true Religion with more purity of doctrine than the Church of England doth, nor where the government and discipline are jointly more beautiful, and free from superstition, than as they are here established by law; which by the grace of God we will with constancy maintain (while we live) in their purity and glory, not only against all invasions of Popery, but also from the irreverence of those many Schismatics and Separatists, wherewith of late this Kingdom and this City abounds, to the great dishonour and hazard both of Church and State, for the suppression of whom we require your timely aid and active assistance.

R.E.M. (4.) Another general answer which signifies nothing.

"To the second prayer of the Petition, concerning the removal and choice of Counsellors, we know not any of our Council to whom the character set forth in the Petition can belong: That by those whom we had exposed to trial, we have already given you sufficient testimony, that there is no man so near unto us in place or affection, whom we will not leave to the justice of the law, if you shall bring a particular charge, and sufficient proofs against him; and of this we do again assure you, but in the mean time we wish you to forbear such general aspersions, as may reflect upon all our Council, since you name none in particular.

"That for the choice of our Counsellors and Ministers of State, it were to debar us that natural liberty all Freeman have; and as it is the undoubted right of the Crown of England, to call such persons to our secret Councils, to publick employment, and our particular service, as we shall think fit; so we are, and ever shall be very careful, to make election of such persons in those places of trust, as shall have given good testimonies of their abilities and integrity, and against whom there can be no just cause of exception, whereon reasonably to ground a diffidence; and to choices of this nature, we assure you that the mediation of the nearest unto us hath always concurred. (5.)

R.E.M. (5.) He means the Queen.

"To the third prayer of your Petition concerning Ireland, we understand your desire of not alienating the forfeited Lands thereof, to proceed from much care and love, and likewise that it may be a resolution very fit for us to take; but whether it be seasonable to declare resolutions of that nature, before the events of a war be seen, that we much doubt of. Howsoever we cannot but thank you for this care, and your cheerful engagement for the suppression of that Rebellion; upon the speedy effecting whereof, the glory of God in the Protestant profession, the safety of the British there, our honour, and that of the Nation so much depends; all the interests of this Kingdom being so involved in that business, we cannot but quicken your affections therein, and shall desire you to frame your counsels to give such expedition to the work, as the nature thereof, and the pressures in point of time require; and whereof you are put 1641. " put in mind by the daily insolence and increase of those " Rebels.

" For conclusion; your promise to apply your selves to " such courses as may support our Royal estate with " honour and plenty at home, and with power and repu" tation abroad, is that which we have ever promised
" our self, both from your loyalties and affections, and " also for what we have already done, and shall daily go
" adding unto, for the comfort and happiness of our " People."

The answer to the Remonstrance did not appear till some time after; for as far as I can conjecture, it was not sent to the Commons before January 1641-2. I shall however insert it in this place, as well not to divide this matter, as that the answer may be read before the Remonstrance is forgot.

The King's Declaration in answer to the Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom.

" Although we do not believe that our House of " Commons intended, by their Remonstrance of the " State of the Kingdom, to put us to any apology, either " for our past or present actions: notwithstanding since " they have thought it so very necessary (upon their ob" servation of the present distempers) to publish the same,
" for the satisfaction of all our loving Subjects, we have " thought it very suitable to the duty of our place (with " which God hath trusted us) to do our part to so good
" a work, in which we shall not think it below our " kingly dignity to defend to any particular, which " may compose and settle the affections of our meanest
" Subject, since we are so conscious to our self of such " upright intentions and endeavours, and only of such (for " which we give God thanks) for the peace and happiness
" of our Kingdom, in which the prosperity of our Subjects
" must be included, that we with from our heart, that " even our most secret thoughts were published to their " view and examination: Though we must confess, we " cannot but be very sorry in this conjuncture of time,
" (when the unhappiness of this Kingdom is so generally " understood abroad) there should be such a necessity of " publishing so many particulars, from which we pray,
" no inconveniences may ensue, that were not intended."

" We shall in few words pass over that part of " the narrative, wherein the misfortunes of this Kingdom,
" from our first entering to the Crown to the beginning " of this Parliament, are remembered in so sensible expres" sions. (1.) And that other which acknowledgeth the " many good Laws passed by our grace and favour this " Parliament, for the security of our People; of which " we shall only say thus much, that as we have not re" fused to pass any Bill presented to us by our Parliament,
" for redress of those grievances mentioned in the Remon" strance; so we have not had a greater motive for the " passing those Laws than our own resolution (grounded
" upon our observation, and understanding the state of our " Kingdom) to have freed our Subjects, for the future,
" from those pressures which were grievous to them if " those Laws had not been propounded, (2.) which there" fore we shall as inviolably maintain, as we look to have " our own rights preserved, not doubting but that all our " loving Subjects will look on those remedies, with that " full gratitude and affection, that even the memory of " what they have formerly undergone, by the accidents
" and necessities of those times, will not be unpleasant
" to them: And possibly in a pious sense of God's blessing " upon this nation (how little share soever we shall have
" of the acknowledgment) they will confess they have " enjoyed a great measure of happiness (even these last
" sixteen years) both in peace and plenty, not only com" paratively in respect of their neighbours, but even of " those times which were justly accounted fortunate. The " fears and jealousies which may make some impression
" in the minds of our People, we will suppose may be " of two sorts; either for Religion, or Liberty and their " civil interest. The fears for Religion may haply be,
" not only as ours here established may be invaded by the " Romish Party, but as it is accompanied with some cere" monies, at which some tender consciences really are,
" or pretend to be scandalized; for of any other which " have been used, without any legal warrant or injunction,
" and already are, or speedily may be, abolished, we shall " not speak."

REMARK (1.) The King could not more ingenuously own what is said in the Remonstrance, concerning the first fifteen years of his Reign, than by entirely passing it over without answer.

REMARK (2.) This is also a confession that grievances were justly complained of. The King says, his resolution was to redress them, and it was not possible to convict him of the contrary. But after all, he was believed but by few 1641.

" Concerning Religion, as there may be any suspicion
" of favour or inclination to the Papists, we are willing " to declare to all the world, that as we have been from " our childhood brought up in, and professed the Religion
" now established in this Kingdom, so it is well known,
" we have (not contented simply with the principles of our " education) given a good proportion of our time and pains,
" to the examination of the grounds of this Religion, as " it is different from that of Rome, and are from our soul
" so fully satisfied and assured that it is the most pure and " agreeable to the sacred word of God, of any Religion
" now professed in the christian world: that as we believe
" we can maintain the same by unanswerable reasons, so " we hope we should readily seal to it by the effusion of " our blood, if it pleased God to call us to that sacrifice.
" And therefore nothing can be so acceptable unto us, as " any proposition which may contribute to the advance" ment of it here, or the propagation of it abroad, being " the only means to draw down a blessing from God upon " our selves and this nation. And we have been extreme" ly unfortunate, if this profession of ours be wanting to " our People: our constant practice in our own person,
" having always been (without ostentation) as much to the " evidence of our care and duty herein, as we could pos" sibly tell how to express. (3.)

REMARK (3.) The Remonstrance did not accuse the King of being a Papist in his heart, but of having countenanced the Catholics, by not executing the Laws against them.
He clears himself here from being inclined to the Romish Religion, and leaves the consequence to be drawn, that since he is persuaded of the truth of the Protestant Religion, it is not possible he should encourage the Roman. But his conduct had shown that this consequence did not necessarily follow, since it was notorious, he had countenanced the Papists, from the beginning of his reign, whether out of complaisance to the Queen, or from some political views.

" For differences among our selves, for matters indif" ferent in their own nature concerning Religion, we shall,
" in tenderness to any number of our loving Subjects,
" very willingly comply with the advice of our Parliament,
" that some Law may be made for the exemption of " tender consciences from punishment, or prosecution for " such ceremonies, and in such cases, which by the judg" ment of most men, are held to be matters indifferent, " and of some to be absolutely unlawful. Provided that
" this case be attempted and pursued with that modesty,
" temper and submission, that in the mean time the peace
" and quiet of the Kingdom be not disturbed, the decency
" and comeliness of God's service discontinued, nor the " pious, sober, and devout actions of those reverend " Persons who were the first labourers in the blessed Re" formation, or of that time, be scandalized and defamed. (4.)
" For we cannot, without grief of heart, and without " some tax upon our self, and our ministers, for the not " execution of our Laws, look upon the bold licence of " some men, in printing of pamphlets, in preaching and " printing of sermons, so full of bitterness and malice against
" the present Government, against the Laws
" established, so full of sedition against our self, and the " peace of the Kingdom, that we are many times amazed
" to consider by what eyes these things are seen, and by " what ears they are heard. And therefore we have good " cause to command, as we have done, and hereby do, all
" our Judges and Ministers of Justice, our Attorney and " Solicitor-General, and the rest of our learned Council, to " proceed with all speed against such, and their abettors,
" who either by writing or words, have so boldly and " maliciously violated the Laws, disturbed the Peace of " the Commonwealth, and as much as in them lies,
" shaken the very foundation upon which that peace and " happiness is founded and constituted. And we doubt " not but all our loving Subjects will be very sensible,
" that this base, virulent demeanour, is a fit prologue to
" nothing but confusion; and if not very seasonably
" punished and prevented, will not only be a blemish to " that wholesome accommodation we intend, but an " unpeackable scandal and imputation, even upon the " profession and Religion of this our Kingdom of Eng" land."

REMARK (4.) The King was not in the wrong to support the established worship, and to regard as an indigenence whatever should be granted to tender consciences.
But after all, this indulgence was reduced to a very small matter, if we consider all the limitations contained in this article.

" Concerning the civil Liberties and Interests of our " Subjects, we shall need to say the less, having erected
" so many lasting monuments of our princely and fatherly
" care of our People, in those many excellent Laws, " passed by us this Parliament, which in truth (with very " much content to our self,) we conceive to be so large
" and

"and ample, that very many sober men have very little left to with for.

"We understood well the Right, and pretences of Right, we departed from, in the confenting to the Bills of the Triennial Parliament, for the continuance of this present Parliament, and in the preamble to the Bill of Tunnage and Poundage. The matter of which having begot so many disturbances in late Parliaments, we were willing to remove, that no interest of ours might hereafter break that correspondence, abundantly contenting our self, with an assurance (which we still have) that we should be repaired and supplied by a just proportion of confidence, bounty and obedience of our People. In the Bills for the taking away the High-Commission and Star-Chamber Courts, we believe we had given that real satisfaction, that all jealousies and apprehensions of arbitrary prebends under the civil or ecclesiastical State, would easily have been abandoned, especially when they saw all possible doubts secured by the visitation of a Triennial Parliament.

"These and others of no mean consideration, we had rather should be valued in the hearts and affections of our People, than in any mention of our own; not doubting, but as we have taken all these occasions to render their condition most comfortable and happy, so they will always, in a grateful and dutiful relation, be ready with equal tenderness and alacrity to advance our rights, and preserve our honour, upon which their own security and subsistence so much depends. And we will be so careful, that no particular shall be presented unto us, for the completing and establishing that security, to which we will not with the same readiness contribute our best assistance.

"If these resolutions be the effects of our present counsels (and we take God to witness, that they are such, and that all our loving Subjects may confidently expect the benefit of them from us,) certainly no ill design upon the publick can accompany such resolution, neither will there be greater cause of suspicion of any Persons preferred by us to degrees of honour, and places of trust and employment since this Parliament. And we must confess, that amongst our misfortunes, we reckon it not the least, that having not retained in our service, nor protected any one person, against whom our Parliament hath excepted during the whole sitting of it, and having in all that time scarce vouchsafed to any man an instance of our grace and favour, but to such who were under some eminent character of estimation among our People, there should so soon be any misunderstanding or jealousy of their fidelity and uprightness, especially in a time when we take all occasions to declare, that we conceive our self only capable of being served by honest men, and in honest ways. However, if in truth we have been mistaken in such our election, the particular shall be no sooner discovered to us, either by our own observation, or other certain information, than we will leave them to publick justice, under the marks of our displeasure.

"If notwithstanding this, any malignant party shall take heart, and be willing to sacrifice the peace and happiness of their country to their own sinister ends and ambitions, under what pretence of Religion and conscience soever; if they shall endeavour to lessen our reputation and interest, and to weaken our lawful power and authority with our good Subjects; if they shall go about by discountenancing the present Laws to loosen the bands of Government, that all disorder and confusion may break in upon us, we doubt not, but God in his good time will discover them unto us; and the wisdom and courage of our High-Court of Parliament, join with us in their suppression and punishment.

"Having now said all that we can to express the clearness and uprightness of our intentions to our People, and done all we can to manifest those intentions, we cannot but confidently believe, all our good Subjects will acknowledge our part to be fully performed, both in deeds past, and present resolutions, to do whatsoever with justice may be required of us, and that their quiet and prosperity depends now wholly upon themselves, and is in their own power, by yielding all obedience and due reverence to the Law, which is the inheritance of every Subject, and the only security he can have for his life, liberty, or estate, and the which being neglected or disesteemed (under what specious shews soever) a very great measure of infelicity, if not an irreparable confusion, must without doubt fall upon them. And we doubt not, it will be the most acceptable declaration a King can make to his Subjects, that for our part, we are resolved not only duly to observe the Laws our self, but to maintain them against what opposition soever, though with the hazard of our Being. (5.)

RE M. (5.) Unhappily for the King, these general promises, to which he could give what sense he thought proper, produced not the effect upon the Commons he expected, or rather they produced the quite contrary, and increased their distrust. This the Reader will be convinced of, when he comes to see what had passed, probably, before this Declaration was published.

"And our hope is, that not only the loyalty and good affections of all our loving Subjects, will concur with us in the constant preserving a good understanding between us and our People, but at this time, their own and our interest, and compassion of the lamentable condition of our poor Protestant Subjects in Ireland, will invite them to a fair intelligence and unity amongst themselves; that so we may with one heart, intend the relieving and recovering that unhappy Kingdom, where those barbarous rebels practise such inhuman and unheard of outrages upon our miserable People, that no Christian ear can hear without horror, nor story parallel. And as we look upon this as the greatest affliction it hath pleased God to lay upon us, so our unhappiness is increased, in that, by the distempers at home, so early remedies have not been applied to those growing evils, as the expectation and necessity there requires, though for our part, as we did upon the first notice acquaint our Parliament of Scotland, (where we then were) with that rebellion, requiring their aid and assistance, and gave like speedy intimation and recommendation to our Parliament here; so since our return hither, we have been forward to all things which have been proposed to us towards that work, and have lately our self offered (by a message to our House of Peers, and communicated to our House of Commons) to take upon us the care to raise speedily ten thousand English Volunteers for that service, if the House of Commons shall declare, that they will pay them (6); which particulars we are (in a manner) necessitated to publish, since we are informed, that the malice of some persons have whispered it abroad, that no speedier advancing of the business, hath proceeded from some want of alacrity in us to this great work; whereas we acknowledge it a high crime against Almighty God, and inexcusable to our good Subjects of our three Kingdoms, if we did not to the utmost employ all our powers and faculties to the speediest and most effectual assistance and protection of that distressed People.

RE M. (6.) It appears by this passage, that this answer was not published till after the King's offer of levying ten thousand men for Ireland, that is to say, in January 1641-2.

"And we shall now conjure all our good Subjects (of what degree soever) by all the bonds of loves duty, or obedience, that are precious to good men, to join with us for the recovery of the peace of that Kingdom, and the preservation of the peace of this, to remove all their doubts and fears, which may interrupt their affection to us, and all their jealousies and apprehensions, which may lessen their charity to each other, and then (if the sins of this nation have not prepared an inevitable judgment for us all) God will yet make us a great and glorious King, over a free and happy People."

The bare reading of this Declaration sufficiently shows, the King had no intention to give a particular answer to the Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom, which contained so many different articles, untouched by the King's declaration. And perhaps he would never have given any answer, if his enemies had not triumphed on his silence. He thought proper therefore to publish this Declaration, that he might say he had answered the Remonstrance, and not with design to answer it indeed; and besides, he published it not till long after the Remonstrance was received. Mean while, the Commons publishing this Paper against his will, made a deep impression on his mind, and convinced him; they had some grand design, since they had so little regard for him.

It was not very strange; that the King should be highly displeased with such a Remonstrance, which was properly Effect of but a series of reproaches for his past conduct, and against the Remonstrance his Government; with a Remonstrance, not directed to himself, but to the publick, the authors whereof only meant to incense the People against him, and which was made at a time, when it seemed to be most unnecessary. Accordingly, the beginning of the breach between the King and the Parliament, is properly to be dated from this time, though, on both sides, some measures were yet kept.

Next day, the second of December, the King coming Refuseth to the Parliament, the Speaker presented to him the Bill Refuseth for Tunnage and Poundage for some months only, wherein the King expressly owned, he had till then levied these Duties without a legal power. He made, on this occasion, a fine Speech, full of his Majesty's praises for his goodness and affection to his People. After which, the King spake in the following manner to both Houses,

The King's Speech to both Houses,
Dec. 2.
Rothworth,
IV. p. 434.
Nelson,
T. II. 708.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Think it fit, after so long absence, at this first occasion to speak a few words unto you: But it is in no ways in answer to Mr. Speaker's learned Speech.

"Albeit I have staid longer than I expected to have done when I went away, yet in this I have kept my promise with you, that I have made all the haste back again, that the settling of my Scotch affairs could any ways permit. In which I have had so good success, that I will confidently affirm to you, that I have left that nation a most peaceable and contented People; so that although I have a little misreckoned in time, yet I was not deceived in my end.

"But if I have deceived your expectations a little in the time of my return, I am assured, that my expectation is as much and more deceived, in the condition wherein I hoped to have found some business at my return. For that since before my going I settled the liberties of my Subjects, and gave the Laws a free and orderly course, I expected to have found my People reaping the fruits of these benefits, by living in quietness and satisfaction of mind: But instead of this, I find them disturbed with jealousies, frights, and alarms of dangerous designs and plots; in consequence of which, guards have been set to defend both Houses. I say not this as in doubt, that my Subjects' affections are any way lessened unto me in this time of my absence, for I cannot but remember, to my great comfort, the joyful reception I had now at my entry into London; but rather, as I hope, that my presence will easily disperse these fears: For I bring as perfect and true affections to my People, as ever Prince did, or as good Subjects can possibly desire. And I am so far from repenting me of any act I have done in this session for the good of my People, that I protest, if it were to do again, I would do it; and will yet grant what else can be justly desired, for satisfaction in point of Liberties, or in maintenance of the true Religion that is here established.

"Now I have but one particular to recommend unto you at this time, it is Ireland; for which, though I doubt not your care, yet methinks the preparations for it go but slowly on. The occasion is the fitter for me now to mention, because of the arrival of two Lords from Scotland, who come intrusted from my Council there (who now by Act of Parliament have full power for that purpose) to answer that demand, which it pleased both Houses to make me by way of Petition, that met me at Berwick; and which the Duke of Richmond sent back by my command, to my Scottish Council. Therefore my desire is, that both Houses would appoint a select Committee to end this business with these Noblemen.

"I must conclude in telling you, that I seek my People's happiness: For their flourishing is my greatest glory, and their affections my greatest strength."

"It was not without great reason that the King resolved to testify an extreme zeal for the public good, since the Remonstrance of the Commons plainly taught him, that endeavours were using to make him forfeit the love of the people. It was therefore necessary to countermine the designs of his enemies, by repeated assurances of a great affection for his people, and by intimating, he had entirely changed his principles and maxims. But herein he had one great disadvantage, in that, for his future behaviour, he could give no other security than his word, which, his enemies pretended to demonstrate, was not to be relied on. They chiefly urged, that though the King had solemnly given his assent to the Petition of Right, he had never executed what he promised. The consequence they drew from this non-performance was so much the stronger, as the King had nothing to oppose to it but bare promises, which were of no more force than those he had made with regard to that Petition.

"As the King had earnestly recommended to the Parliament, the consideration of the affairs of Ireland, both Houses immediately appointed a Committee to treat with the Scots about succours (1). The Commons in particular passionately desired to negotiate with Scotland. In their present belief, that the King was willing to engage them to send an army into Ireland, in order to be more at ease in England, they could not find a more effectual way to break his measures, than to employ Scottish Troops in the relief of that Kingdom. As they had already taken the resolution, though secretly, of deposing the King of great part of his power, they easily forelaw, that a breach would infallibly follow, and then they should want the Troops, the King had a mind to engage them to send into Ireland.

After the Remonstrance, every thing manifestly tended to a rupture between the King and the Parliament, and the Commons lost no opportunity to insuffle suspicions into the people against the King. To this end, Daniel O'Neal, who was concerned in the plot to seduce the army, was voted guilty of a second attempt, in [June, or] July last, to perwade the chief officers of the army to declare for the King, against the Parliament. This tended to show, that the King had not relinquished his project, to make use of force to awe the Parliament.

On the other hand, the Rebels of Ireland having [by the Lord Castelnagh] presented to the Lords Justices of that Kingdom, a Letter in the nature of a Remonstrance, wherein they demanded the free exercise of their Religion, and a repeal of all Laws to the contrary, the Commons made a great noise about it. They knew the Lord Castelnagh, with the Lord Taaff, were on their way to England, with propositions to be offered to the King concerning means for procuring the peace of Ireland. So, fearing, or pretending to fear, the King would grant liberty of conscience to the Irish Papists, they desired a conference with the Lords. After which, it was solemnly declared by both Houses, that they would never consent to any toleration of the Popish Religion in Ireland, [or any other his Majesty's Dominions.] It is easy to see how much this tended to breed suspicions of the King.

If 'tis supposed, as I have insinuated, that the aim of the Commons, or at least of the greatest part of the House, was to put it out of the King's power to govern for the future, as he had governed before this Parliament, and that, to prepare the people for this change, it was necessary to fill them with fears and suspicions, the motives of all their proceedings, and the King's sad situation, will be perfectly understood. His Subjects were prejudiced against him, and he had given but too much occasion. Every step taken by the Commons tended to increase this prejudice, and the King, to remove it, could alledge only the sincerity of his intentions, of which many people were not convinced. This gave his enemies an advantage, which they did not fail on all occasions to improve. Nay, they descended even to the meanest trifles, to cherish the people's fears. For upon information, that amongst some barrels of Soap, sent by a Merchant of London to Dorchester, there was found a barrel of Gun-powder, the House appointed a Committee (2) to make a strict inquiry, as into a thing of the greatest consequence.

About the same time, another affair happened, which gave some advantage against the King. The 8th of December, he sent to acquaint both Houses, that seven Priests (3) having been condemned that week, the French Ambassador had desired him to change the sentence of death, into that of banishment, upon which he desired to have their advice. Some days after, the Commons voted, that the seven Priests should be executed, and the Lords concurring with this vote, both Houses petitioned the King to order the execution. The King replied, he would banish the seven Priests, if both Houses would give their consent. As they did not think proper to answer, the King took occasion from their silence, to suspend the execution. Two months after, the King communicated a letter to them, which Secretary Nicholas had received from Venice, wherein he was told, that the Pope threatened to send an army into Ireland, if the Priests were executed. Upon this menace, both Houses prayed the King once more to execute the seven Priests. But he thought not proper to grant their desire. His reason was, the fear of reprisals, and that this rigour might be extremely prejudicial to the English Protestants in Ireland, who should fall into the hands of the rebels. This reason was so much the weaker, as it served not only for the present case, but also for all that should offer hereafter, and tended to render the Laws of no effect. Besides, the Irish having already massacred above forty thousand English Protestants without any cause, the fear of reprisals from them seems to have been a weak motive for pardoning these Priests. Accordingly, it was generally thought to be owing to the solicitations of the Queen. Be this as it will, the Priests were not executed, for though, afterwards, the King left it to both Houses to save or put them to death, they did not think fit either to pardon or execute. All this was extremely prejudicial to the King, since, at the very time that he solemnly protested, he was resolved to execute the Laws, he granted his protection to these seven Priests, legally convicted, and had no regard to the instances of both Houses.

1641. At this time, I mean in December 1641, two affairs successively employed the House of Commons, namely, the succours for Ireland, and the accusation presented to the Lords against the Bishops. I shall only speak of the first at present.

The King and Parliament equally granted the necessity of relieving Ireland, and all the advices from thence were a demonstration of it. The Irish army was at the gates of Dublin, and had cut in pieces a body of troops sent to Draghead. So, in all likelihood, the Lords-Justices, with their few troops, could not long resist the rebels. The Scotch Commissioners that were come to London to treat with the Parliament, had offered an aid of five thousand men, who could easily be sent from Scotland into the North of Ireland, to make a diversion, and the Commons had prevailed with them to treat for ten thousand. The design of the Commons was to employ only Scotch troops in the reduction of Ireland, that England might not be unprovided. The King did not refuse the assistance of Scotland, but would have England send into Ireland the like number of English forces, on pretence, that there was danger of the Scots seizing upon Ireland when the Irish should be subdued. He had found means to gain the Peers, so that when the motion was made to the Lords, for sending ten thousand Scots into Ireland, they consented to it, provided the same number of English were also sent thither.

The Scotch Commissioners complaining by a memorial, that in a fortnight they had no positive answer to their offers, the Commons pressed the Lords to dispatch the affair, declaring, if they neglected it, the whole blame would fall upon them. They farther declared, that unless the Bill for pressing of soldiers passed, it was impossible for England to raise troops for this service. Whereupon the Lords debated the three following questions, which were all resolved in the negative.

1. Whether this House shall consent to send ten thousand Scots into Ireland, before it can be ascertained that ten thousand English will be sent thither also?

2. Whether this House shall consent to send ten thousand Scots before the Bill for pressing be passed?

3. Whether this House shall join with the Commons, in sending now ten thousand Scots into Ireland?

The Commons replied to these votes in a conference, that for the certainty their Lordships desire of sending ten thousand English into Ireland, the Commons were not used to be capitulated with: That their actions are free, as well without conditions as capitulations; and desire it may be so no more: That they had already given sufficient certainty by a vote communicated to their Lordships, and see no necessity of voting it again: That they desire their Lordships would vote the sending ten thousand Scots, without any relation to the ten thousand English, and that speedily, the preservation of Ireland depending upon it: That they have the more reason to desire this, as the English troops cannot go, unless the Bill for pressing passes. But this was not capable of making the Lords depart from their former resolutions.

Mean time, the Commons, who had already committed to prison the Lords Coffelough and Taff, (sent to the King with propositions about procuring the peace of Ireland) caused all their Papers to be examined, in their distrust of the King, and no doubt, in expectation of finding some thing which might do him a prejudice (1).

At the same time, the King acquainted the Lords, that he would engage to raise ten thousand men for Ireland, if the Commons would promise to pay them (2). But they were so far from accepting this proposition, knowing the King meant to grant the commissions, and would give them to such officers only as should be at his devotion. So the Commons chose rather to hazard the entire loss of Ireland, than send thither ten thousand English in such a juncture; and the Lords chose rather to run the risk of seeing all the English driven out of that Kingdom, than of seeing the Scots in condition to seize it. The King perfectly knew the motive of the Commons proceedings, whilst they were not ignorant, that the Lords acted wholly by the King's direction.

Mean time, the assistance for Ireland being still retarded by these quarrels, the Commons appointed a Committee to examine, from whence came the obstacles that occurred in this affair. It was really difficult for those who were not acquainted with the secret motives of the King and Commons, to know where the blame lay, that Ireland was not relieved, since they seemed equally desirous that a speedy aid should be sent thither. The King's friends said, his Majesty's offer to raise ten thousand men, provided the Commons would engage to pay them, was a clear evidence, that the obstructions did not proceed from him. His enemies, on the contrary, affirmed, that the refusal of the Lords, or rather of the King who directed them, to accept of the aid of ten thousand Scots, on a frivolous pretence, plainly showed, that the difficulties did not come from the House of Commons, since they were very ready to promise to pay these auxiliaries. For my part, I am of opinion, that both King and Commons thought less seriously of assisting Ireland, than of drawing from the rebellion private advantages, with regard to their difference. The King wished the Parliament would send a strong army into Ireland, that they might find it more difficult to raise forces in case of a breach with him, of which there was but too much appearance. The Commons, on their part, had prevailed with the Scots to offer ten thousand men, in the belief, that if they were accepted, they should be freed from the trouble and danger of sending an English army into Ireland, and if they were refused, the delay of relief would be imputed to the King.

However this be, the House, upon the report of the Committee, found that one great obstruction of relief to Ireland, was, that the Irish had not been declared rebels by Proclamation. Wherefore, on the 1st of January 1641-2, the King published a Proclamation, wherein the Irish were expressly called traitors and rebels. But there were only forty copies printed; which were all sent to Secretary Nicholas, according to an order received by the Printer, to this effect:

It is his Majesty's pleasure, That you forthwith print on very good Paper, and send unto me, for his Majesty's service, forty copies of the Proclamation inclosed, leaving convenient space for his Majesty to sign above, and to affix the Privy Signet underneath. And his Majesty's express command is, That you print not above the said number of forty copies, and forbear to make any further publication of them till his pleasure be further signified.

For his Majesty's

Printer (3).

ED. NICHOLAS.

It will hereafter be seen, what use the Commons made of this order, the original whereof they had in their hands, and the King's answer.

I have already observed, that since the King's return from Scotland, there were between him and the Commons seeds of division, which threatened an approaching rupture. This appeared on all occasions, and the mutual distrust continually increased; but with this difference, that the Commons did not take the least step, but what tended to their end of filling the People with fears and jealousies; whereas the King having yet formed no project, managed according to the present emergencies, without proposing to himself a fixed and certain end, which was a great disadvantage to him. Shortly after his return from Scotland, upon notice that there was to be a tumultuous concourse of People at Westminster, he sent a writ to the Sheriff to set a guard near the Parliament. The Commons took offence at it, and after some inquiry to show it was done by the King's order, dismissed the guard.

Two days after, the King published a Proclamation, strictly commanding, that divine service should be performed in all the Churches of England and Wales, according to the Laws and Statutes of the realm. This Proclamation, which indeed contained nothing contrary to Law; was however unseasonable, when the Commons publicly showed, that in the Laws concerning divine service, there were things offensive to the consciences of many people. But the King had the misfortune to forget sometimes the situation of his affairs, and remember only his former state, when his Proclamations met with a ready compliance. He could easily see, that this would be at least of no use, and consequently he should not have published it at such a juncture. But he gave his enemies a much greater advantage against him, in another affair, which created him no small mortification.

The Commons had voted, as I said, that a body of troops should be sent into Ireland. But as they were extremely jealous of the King, they fought an expedient to hinder him from being concerned in the raising of these forces. They were apprehensive, if these levies were made in the usual manner, that is, by lifting volunteers, these troops would be too much at the King's devotion. This expedient was to levy soldiers by way of compulsion, called in England pressing, and to pass an Act for that purpose. A Bill was accordingly brought in, and sent up to the Lords. Very likely, there was some clause in this

(1) The Lord Dillon of Coffelough was plied upon by the Irish Lords to carry over their desires to his Majesty concerning the means of quenching the flames of the Rebellion. Accordingly he embarked, in company with the Lord Taff, and at Ware their Papers were seized by directions from the Parliament, and their Persons committed; but afterwards they found means to escape, and waited upon his Majesty. Byssworth's Tom. 4. [P. 413]

641-2. Bill contrary to the Prerogative Royal, to hinder the King from being concerned in levying these troops (1). The King, having notice of it, came to the Parliament, and made the following Speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's Speech in the Parliament.
Dec. 4.
Rushworth IV. p. 457.
Nelson, T. II. p. 757.
“THE last time I was in this place, and the last thing that I recommended unto you was the business of Ireland; whereby I was in good hope that I should not have needed again to have put you in mind of that business. But still seeing the slow proceedings therein, and the daily dispatches that I have out of Ireland, of the lamentable estate of my Protestant Subjects there, I cannot but again earnestly recommend the dispatch of that expedition unto you; for it is the chief business that at this time I take to heart, and there cannot almighty be any business that I can have more care of.

“I might now take up some of your time in expressing my detestation of rebellions in general, and of this in particular; but knowing that deeds and not declarations must suppress this great infolency, I do here in a word offer you whatsoever my powers, pains or industry can contribute to this good and necessary work of reducing the Irish nation to their true and wonted obedience.

“And that nothing may be omitted on my part, I must here take notice of the Bill for pressing of soldiers, now depending among you, my Lords; concerning which, I here declare, that in case it come so to me, as it may not infringe or diminish my Prerogative, I will pass it. And further, seeing there is a dispute raised, (I being little beholding to him whosoever at this time began it) concerning the bounds of this ancient and undoubted Prerogative; to avoid further debate at this time, I offer that the Bill may pass with a Salvo Jure both for King and People, leaving such debates to a time that may better bear them. If this be not accepted, the fault is not mine that this Bill pass not, but theirs that refuse so fair an offer.

“To conclude, I conjure you by all that is or can be dear to you or me, that laying aside all disputes, you go on cheerfully and speedily for the reducing of Ireland.”

Though it clearly appeared, that in this Speech the King had no intention to violate the privilege of Parliament, but only to remove the obstacles which occurred on account of this Bill, both Houses were equally offended. They appointed a joint Committee to examine the King's Speech, and upon their report, the House of Lords unanimously voted,

Notes of the Lords.
Nelson, T. II. p. 757.
741.

1. That the privileges of Parliament were broken by his Majesty's taking notice of the Bill for pressing of soldiers, being in agitation in both Houses, and not agreed on.

2. That his Majesty in propounding a limitation and provisional clause to be added to the Bill, before it was presented unto him by the consent of both Houses, was a breach of the privilege of Parliament.

3. That his Majesty expressing his displeasure against some persons, for matters moved in the Parliament, during the debate and preparation of that Bill, was a breach of the privilege of Parliament.

These votes were also readily passed in the House of Commons, after which, both Houses united in a solemn Declaration, importing,

Declaration of both Houses.
Rushworth IV. p. 458.
Nelson, T. II. p. 757.

“That the King ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation or debate in either House of Parliament, but by their information and agreement: And that his Majesty ought not to propound any condition, provision, or limitation to any Bill or Act in debate, or preparation in either Houses of Parliament; or to manifest or declare his consent or dissent, approbation or dislike of the same, before it be presented to his Majesty in due course of Parliament; and that every particular Member of either House hath free liberty of speech to propound or debate any matter according to the order and course of Parliament: And that his Majesty ought not to conceive displeasure against any man for such opinions and propositions as shall be delivered in such debate, it belonging to the several Houses of Parliament respectively to judge and determine such errors and offences in words or actions, as shall be committed by any of their Members, in the handling or debating any matters depending: And that his Majesty will be pleased to declare the authors of this mis-information and evil counsel (2).”

Pursuant to this Declaration, both Houses presented to the King a more extensive Petition, which the King within few days answered in writing. The strength of his answer consisted in, that he had no intention to infringe the privilege of Parliament, and meant only to hasten the relief of Ireland. Both Houses were satisfied with this explanation, and the affair was carried no farther. But there still remained upon the King, a blemish for violating the privilege of Parliament, which was then of great consequence. This shows, the King had not then about him any very able counsellors. For if they had perceived the Commons intention, since the re-assembling of the Parliament, they would have been careful not to advise the King to take so many not only unnecessary steps, but such as gave his enemies great advantages. Of this nature was the Proclamation concerning divine service. In the same rank I place also the great zeal he expressed for the Church of England, which served only to alienate still farther from him all the adherents of the Commons, and to show them what they were to expect, if he should be restored to his former state. In a word, nothing could be more unfavourable than this last Speech to both Houses, as if the bare threat of not passing the Bill was sufficient to awe them, whereas, at least in regard to the Commons, it was a very strong argument to cause them to insist upon their demand. Besides, the breach of Privilege must have been evident, since there was not a single Member in both Houses, but what thought the King had violated it by his proposition.

Six or seven days after, the King gave a fresh occasion of complaint, by removing Sir William Balfour Lieutenant of the Tower from his place, with whom he had no reason to be pleased, on account of his evidence concerning the design of promoting the Earl of Strafford's escape. Every one saw, this was the sole cause of Balfour's disgrace. But perhaps his removal would not have been of so ill consequence to the King, had he not trusted that important place to Colonel Lunford, known to be a man of profligate manners, and fit for any purpose. This change made the Commons believe, the King designed to secure the Tower, in order to awe the City and Parliament. As their jealousy of him was very great, and as, besides, it is certain, they sought occasions to persuade the People, the King had ill designs, they failed not to improve the present.

The same day that Lunford was put in possession of the Tower, a great number of Londoners, some of whom were Common-Council-men, presented a Petition to the Lower House, representing, “That the whole State is deeply interested in the safe-custody of the Tower, but more especially the City of London: That Colonel Lunford is a man outlawed, and most notorious for outrages, and therefore fit for any dangerous attempt. For which reason the Petitioners, and many more who have intelligence of his having the office of Lieutenant bestowed on him, are put into such a height of fear and jealousy, as makes them restless till they have represented the same to the House of Commons, humbly desiring them to take this affair into such consideration as may secure both the City and Kingdom.”

It cannot be denied, that the King made a very ill choice in bestowing this post on Lunford, and thereby gave occasion for disadvantageous suspicions. Besides, it seems to be almost inexorable, to give the command of the Tower to a person of so ill a character, at a time when his enemies lost no opportunity to inspire the People with jealousies. The most favorable thing that can be said for the King is, that there being but few persons who would be at his devotion, for fear of the indignation of the Commons, he thought himself obliged to chuse for Lieutenant of the Tower, one less scrupulous, and of a desperate fortune, who would depend on him, and it was not easy to find many such.

The Commons having taken into consideration the Petition presented to them, desired a conference with the Lords, where they represented, “That Colonel Lunford is an unfit person for so great a trust, as the Lieutenancy of the Tower. But if his Majesty think cause that there should be a Lieutenant of the Tower, the same being already under the command of the Earl of Newport (3), who is Constable thereof by his Majesty's appointment, then that Sir John Corniers may be recommended to his Majesty for that place.” The Lords answered, they could not concur with the Commons in an address to the King to remove Colonel Lunford, because they conceived the same would be an intrenchment upon his Majesty's Prerogative.

The Commons, vexed at the refusal of the Lords, una-

Upon which both Houses relating to do nothing till this manifest Breach should be repaired by passing the Bill, the King was compelled to pass it, as they had prepared it.

1641-2. nimmously voted, "That Colonel Lunsford was unfit to be Lieutenant of the Tower, as being a person the Commons could not confide in." At the same time they made a declaration, showing their reasons of fear and distrust, as the conspiracy to seduce the army, a former plot of possessing the Tower, the Irish Rebellion, and the continual delays and interruptions they received in the House of Peers, by reason of the great number of Bishops and Popish Lords; and therefore they held themselves bound in conscience to protest, that they were innocent of the blood which was like to be spilt, and the confusions which might overwhelm the State, if Lunsford were continued in his charge. Moreover, they hoped that such of the Lords as had the same apprehensions, would likewise take some course to make the same known to his Majesty. This Declaration being communicated to the Lords, it was resolved by the majority of votes, that the debate thereof should be adjourned till next Monday. But two and twenty Lords entered their Protest against that vote.

The same day the Commons sent and desired the Earl of Newport, to reside within the Tower as Constable, and to take the custody of that place.

Besides the inhabitants of London, whose Petition had occupied the Commons declaration, the Apprentices had flocked together in great numbers, and presented a Petition to the King, praying him to concur with the Commons in rooting out Papists, Innovators, Bishops, as having all combined to subvert the Government, and introduce Popery.

On the morrow, the 26th of December, being Sunday, the Lord-Mayor, [Sir Richard Gurney] seeing the Apprentices begin to re-assemble, and knowing they intended to go the next day to Whitehall, for an answer to their Petition, waited upon the King to inform him of it. He represented withal, that great mischiefs might ensue if Lunsford was not removed, adding, the people of London were resolved to attempt the Tower, to put him out. Whereupon the King that same evening took the keys from Lunsford, but at the same time discharged the Earl of Newport of the Constableness of the Tower.

The reason, or perhaps the pretence of that Earl's disgrace was, that the King had been told, that at a meeting at Kenington, whilst he was in Scotland, the Earl of Newport, upon discourse of some plots in that Kingdom should say, if there be such a plot, yet there are his wife and children. But the Earl hearing such a rumour had reached the Queen, waited upon her Majesty, and with many protestations assured her, that never any such words were spoken, nor the least thought conceived of any such thing, with which the Queen seemed to rest satisfied. Nevertheless, several months after, and the same day Sir William Balfour was removed from the Lieutenantancy of the Tower, the King asked him, whether he had heard any debate at Kenington, about seizing upon the Queen and her Children. The Earl strongly denied it; to which the King replied, That he was sorry for his Lordship's memory. This is what the Earl of Newport positively affirmed himself in the House of Peers.

The Lords being convinced, that the King, upon a false rumour, had entertained suspicions of the Earl of Newport (1), espoused his cause, and presented a Petition to the King, praying him to declare the reporter of those words. The Earl of Bath, the 30th of December, reported his Majesty's answer as follows:

"It is true, that I have heard rumours of some proposition that should have been made at Kenington, for the seizing of the persons of my wife and children; and in things of so high a nature, it may be fit for any Prince to enquire, even where he hath no belief nor persuasion of the thing; so I have asked Newport some questions concerning that business, but far from that way of expressing a belief of the thing, which Newport hath had the boldness and confidence to affirm; which I could easily make appear, but that I think it beneath me, to contest with any particular person. But let this suffice, that I assure you, I neither did nor do give credit to any such rumour. As for telling the name of him who informed me, I do stick to the answer which I gave to your last Petition upon the like particular.

What colour soever the King put upon his behaviour to the Earl of Newport, it plainly appeared, that he had quarrelled with that Lord, on purpose to remove him from the Constableness of the Tower, at the very time he was desired by the Commons to reside there. This did not help to cure the Commons suspicions.

I have already mentioned the Project formed by the leaders and managers of the House of Commons against the King, namely, the despoiling him of great part of his power. To compels this end, it was necessary to remove the obstacles which incessantly occurred in the House of Peers, where the Bishops and Popish Lords were always able, by the number of their Voices, to oppose the execution of this design. Hitherto the Commons had endeavoured in vain to exclude the Bishops from the Upper-House, and there was no likelihood that their solicitations would produce any greater effect for the future. They were therefore, either to relinquish their project, or take more effectual methods to obtain by force what would never have been obtained by fair means. I am very sensible, some will take it ill that I positively affirm, the tumults I am going to speak of, were the effect of the intrigues of the contrary party to the King, and that several pretend it was all owing to accident, and the discontents of the People. The Reader will be able to judge, when he has seen what passed in the latter end of December.

On Monday the 27th of this month, there was a great concourse of people at Westminster, where they who had presented the Petition of the Londoners, the Apprentices, and an infinite number of others, flocked on pretence of waiting for the King's and the Parliament's answer. Among these multitudes, many were heard to cry aloud, No Bishops! No Bishops! This corresponded with the Petition of the Apprentices. The Bishop of Lincoln [Dr. Williams,] lately nominated to the See of York (2), coming with the Earl of Dover to the House of Peers, and observing a youth to cry out louder than the rest against Bishops, flew to him and seized him, in order to have him committed to prison. But the people rescued the youth, and gathering about the Bishop, hemmed him in, that he could not stir, so that he was like to be pressed to death. But at last, they let him go, still crying out as loud as they could, No Bishops!

At the same time, three or four officers, who had served in the late army against the Scots, walking near Westminster-Hall, one of them, Captain David Hide, drew his sword, saying, he would cut the throats of those Round-headed clogg'd-ear'd Dogs that bawled against the Bishops. But the other officers refusing to second him, he was apprehended by the Citizens, and brought before the House of Commons and sent to prison. There is no other known origin of the name of Roundheads, which from that time was given to the Parliamentarians (3).

The same day Colonel Lunsford, with thirty or forty officers coming through Westminster-Hall, and meeting the multitudes, drew their swords and wounded some twenty Apprentices and Citizens. The News being carried into the City, great numbers of Apprentices and others, ran to Westminster with swords and staves, which caused a dreadful uproar both in London and Westminster. The Lord Mayor, to prevent any farther disorders, commanded the City gates to be shut, and put the trained-bands in arms, whilst, on the other hand, the King ordered some of the Militia of Middlesex and Westminster to come by turns and guard his person.

The Lords seeing so great a tumult, ordered the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, to command the people to depart to their homes. But the people answered they could not, because Lunsford, with other swordsmen, lay in wait for them in Westminster-Hall, and had already wounded several. Whereupon the Lords appointed a Committee to examine, what warrant Lunsford and the other officers had to come to Westminster, and likewise what notice had been given to any others to come in multitudes about the Parliament-House. They tried once more to send away the people, but not succeeding, desired the Commons to join with them in publishing a Declaration against tumults, and in petitioning the King for a guard. The Commons answered, it was now so late, that they had not time to take this request into consideration. Mean while, upon information that some of the people were sent to prison, they appointed a Committee to examine by whose authority they were imprisoned, with power to release them, if it was thought proper. A clear evidence that this tumult was not disagreeable to the Commons (4).

On the morrow, the 28th, the tumult continued in the same manner as the day before, and the Commons made no more haste to appease it. On the contrary, they adjourned the debate of the Lords request till next day. At last, on the 29th, the populace being again assembled, Whereupon they agreed to concur in a Petition to the King. See Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 463.

1641-2. they acquaint the Lords that they were ready to join in all lawful ways and means to appease the tumults, but for printing a Declaration, it was a matter that would require some farther deliberation (1).

It is very evident, the Commons did not desire these tumults should be so soon ended, especially if what is said of Mr. Pym, one of the leading Members, be true. For it is affirmed, he answered to one that perswaded him to endeavour to prevent these tumultuous assemblies, God forbid the people should be hindered from obtaining their just desires. Indeed the House in general cannot be accused of taking any resolution to encourage these tumults. However it is but too probable, not to say certain, that they were caused by the intrigues and direction of some of the Leaders of the opposite party to the King.

To be satisfied of this truth, a man need only consider, what was the situation of affairs at the end of December 1641. The redress of grievances was no longer the point, that was now completed without any opposition from the King. He could therefore affirm, that his consent to the Acts passed in this Parliament, was the effect of his love for his people, with as much reason as his enemies could say, it was only by compulsion and dissimulation. It is certain, that after the King's return from Scotland, there were in the Parliament many Members who wished the reform might be carried no farther, perswaded as they were, that what was already done sufficed for the safety of the Kingdom, and prevention of an arbitrary Government for the future. This was the prevailing opinion in the House of Peers, chiefly because of the Bishops and Popish Lords, who always made the balance incline to the King's side, when this capital point was directly or indirectly in question.

It was otherwise in the House of Commons. Most of the Members, not contenting themselves with having redressed the grievances, were also for lessening the royal authority, and putting it out of the King's power to govern for the future, as he had done before this Parliament. Some acted out of pure distrust of the King's sincerity: Others out of fear of being exposed to his resentment, if he should ever be in a condition to make them feel the effects of it. Besides these two motives, the Presbyterians, had a third, namely, to alter the Government of the Church, which they plainly saw could be never effected, but by disabling the King to oppose it. All these Members were united in the project of depriving the King of good part of his power. But there was a great difference between them with respect to the animosity against the King, and the zeal wherewith they pursued the execution of their design. The Presbyterians were the most passionate; whilst the others, who acted only from motives of distrust and jealousy, behaved with less warmth. They could not without a sort of remorse, contribute to the throwing of the whole Kingdom into confusion, upon the foundation of a bare distrust, or of a fear, to which it was impossible to apply any remedy. This had caused great debates in the House about the Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom. Many considered it as unnecessary, and others supported it, because they saw no surer means to beg a rupture between the King and Parliament; rupture without which they looked upon themselves as undone, for without it, they could not hope to execute their projects. Oliver Cromwell, who as yet made no figure in the House, told the Lord Falkland, "That if the Remonstrance had been rejected, he would have sold all he had the next morning and never seen England more."

After this Remonstrance was presented to the King, his enemies lost no opportunity to cherish the fears and jealousies of the People, in which they had a double view. First, they prepared them for the change they were meditating, by intimating, the absolute necessity of diminishing the King's power. Secondly, by provoking the King, they hoped to engage him in some violent measures, proper to confirm the suspicions they were striving to infuse into the People, in which they succeeded but too well, the King being so unfortunate, as not to have any able Council about him, who might warn him of the snares that were laid for him. However, they were still very far from their end, by reason of the obstacles they met with in the House of Peers, where the Bishops and popish Lords broke all their measures.

Probably, this sort of contest between the two Houses would have lasted much longer, if the tumultuous concurrence of the Londoners about Westminster, had not come very seasonably to frighten the Bishops and popish Lords, as will be seen presently. When therefore such multitudes are seen flocking to Westminster, exclaiming against the Bishops and Catholic Lords, insulting the Peers of the King's party, in a word, acting so agreeably to the desires and intentions of the Commons, one can hardly help thinking, they were countenanced and encouraged by some of the Members of that House; and the rather, as there can be no other probable reason assigned of so sudden a commotion.

As to the justice of the project, formed by the Commons, to disable the King from doing for the future, what he had done for fifteen years, it is a question not easily to be decided. The point is to know, whether, at the time I am speaking of, in restoring the King to all his rights, there was just ground to confide in him, without any fear of his abusing his power for the future. But there is so much to be said, on both sides of the question, that the impartial must be at a loss, and the more, as the thing is to know perfectly what the King's intention was, which no man can discover. It is therefore upon bare conjectures that some decide, that, after the King's concessions in this Parliament, in favour of his Subjects, it was reasonable to rely on his word; and that others affirm, it was imprudent to consider the King's assent to the Acts, as a proof of his intention to govern according to Law, since this assent was not altogether voluntary. On this question run all the Papers which were afterwards published, either by the King or the Parliament.

The tumults still continuing about the Parliament-house, and the Commons not appearing very urgent to appease them, twelve Bishops met at the Archbishop of York's, to consult together upon what was to be done. Here, by the advice of the Archbishop, they resolved to go no more to the House of Peers, but present to the King and the Lords the following Protestation (2).

To the King's most excellent Majesty, and the Lords and Peers, now assembled in Parliament, The humble Petition and Protestation of all the Bishops and Prelates now called by his Majesty's Writs to attend the Parliament, and present about London and Westminster for that service.

"THAT whereas the Petitioners are called up by several and respective Writs, and under great penalties, to attend in Parliament, and have a clear and indubitate right to vote in Bills, and other matters whatsoever, debatable in Parliament, by the ancient customs, laws and statutes of this realm, and ought to be protected by your Majesty, quietly to attend and prosecute that great service.

"They humbly remonstrate and protest before God, your Majesty, and the noble Lords and Peers, now assembled in Parliament, that as they have an indubitate right to sit and vote in the House of the Lords, so are they (if they may be protected from force and violence) most ready and willing to perform their duties accordingly. And that they do abominate all actions and opinions tending to Popery, and the maintenance thereof; as also all propension and inclination to any malignant party, or any other side or party whatsoever, to the which their own reason and consciences shall not move them to adhere.

"But whereas they have been at several times violently menaced, affronted, and assaulted by multitudes of people, in their coming to perform their services in that honourable House; and lately chased away, and put in danger of their lives, and can find no redress or protection, upon sundry complaints made to both Houses in these particulars.

"They likewise humbly protest before your Majesty, and the noble House of Peers, That saving unto themselves all their rights and interest of sitting and voting in the House at other times, they dare not sit or vote in the House of Peers, until your Majesty shall further secure them from all affronts, indignities, and dangers in the premises.

"Lastly, whereas their fears are not built upon fantasies and conceits, but upon such grounds and objects, as may well terrify men of good resolutions, and much constancy, they do in all duty and humility, protest before your Majesty, and the Peers of that most honourable House of Parliament, against all laws, orders, votes, resolutions, and determinations, as in themselves null, and of none effect; which in their absence, since the 27th of this instant month of December 1641, have already passed; as likewise, against all such as shall hereafter pass in that most honourable House, during the

"And humbly beseeching your most excellent Majesty to command the Clerk of that House of Peers, to enter this their Petition and Protestation amongst his Records,"

It must be observed, that among these twelve Bishops, there were nine of the thirteen accused by the Commons, on account of the Canons of the late Convocation.

It is manifest, this Protestation tended to dissolve the Parliament, without the King's interposing. For if, according to the Protestation, the House of Peers could do nothing but what in its self was null, without the concurrence of the Bishops, it was no less certain, that the House of Commons could do nothing valid without the concurrence of the Peers; whence it followed, that the Parliament was become useless, or suspended, in the intention of the Bishops by this Protestation. It appears also, that the King had the same thought, by his haste to communicate the Protestation to the Lords, probably, before his Council had examined it. Very likely, he imagined, the Lords would espouse the cause of the Bishops, as making, according to his notion, a third Estate of Parliament, and that this affair might occasion the dissolution of the Parliament. But he found that this House of Peers, hitherto so favourable to him, was no longer in the same dispositions, since the Bishops and popish Lords were frightened away by the tumults. The majority of voices not being now for the King, the House looked upon this Protestation with a very different eye from what the King expected. They desired a conference with the Commons, where the Lord-Keeper told them in the name of all the Peers, "That this Protestation containing matters of dangerous consequence, extending to the deep trenching upon the fundamental privileges and being of Parliaments, the Lords had thought fit to communicate to the Commons, as a thing of great and general concernment."

The Commons had no sooner received the report of this conference, but they immediately resolved to accuse the twelve Bishops of High-Treason, for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws and the very being of Parliaments. This resolution ought not to seem strange, after having seen how the Commons stood affected to the Bishops. They took care not to lose to fair an opportunity, of freeing themselves from the obstacles they continually met with from the Bishops in the Upper-house, and besides, the Lords seemed disposed to come into their measures. So, that very moment, Mr. Glyn was sent to the House of Peers, to accuse in form the twelve Bishops of High-Treason, and to desire they might be put into safe custody (1). Whereupon, the Lords ordered the Black-Rod to bring the twelve Bishops to the Bar of their House, which was done by eight a'clock at night, and ten of them were committed to the Tower, Moreton Bishop of Durham, and Wright Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, in regard of their age, remaining with the Black-Rod.

On the morrow, the 31st of December, the Commons sent and desired the Lords to take into consideration the Bill sent up some months since for taking away the Bishops votes, to which the Lords answered, They would take the same into consideration in convenient time (2).

The same day the Commons sent a Committee to the King, to represent to him, "That the House was under great apprehensions, by reason of a malignant party, who were continually forming pernicious designs: Nay, that some of them had imbrued their hands in the blood of his subjects, at the gates of his Palace, and in the face, and at the doors of the Parliament. That therefore they humbly besought his Majesty, that they might "have a guard [out of the City] commanded by the Earl of Essex, of whose fidelity there could be no suspicion."

As the populace of London were dispersed, and the officers still kept about Westminster, the House was under some apprehension of insults from these reformados, and particularly Lunsford, who was a desperate man. So, the King desiring to have this message in writing, which had been delivered by word of mouth only, and not returning an answer the same day, the Commons ordered, that thirty or forty Halberts should be brought into the House, for their better security.

Their fear was further increased, upon notice, that the young Gentlemen of the Inns of Court were assembled, and gone to Whitehall, to offer their service to the King, who had received them very graciously, and ordered them to be handsomely entertained at tables provided for them.

The King, on his part, was not without uneasiness. He was afraid, the tumultuous concourse of the People would be renewed on New-year's day; and therefore sent orders to the Common Council of London, to take good measures for prevention of the like disorders, as had happened on the foregoing days, in which he was punctually obeyed.

The Parliament having adjourned from Friday till Monday, because the morrow was New-year's day (3), and the next day, Sunday, it was the 3d of January before the King returned an answer to the Commons message concerning a guard, which was to this effect:

"That it was with great grief of heart, that he found the Commons, instead of reaping the fruits of his grace and affection to his People, should suffer jealousies, distrusts and fears, to be so prevalent among them, as to induce them to declare unto him in so high a measure as they had done: That he was wholly ignorant of the grounds of their apprehensions; but if he had any knowledge or belief of the least design in any, of violence against them, he would pursue them with the same severity and detestation, as he would do the greatest attempt upon his Crown. And he engaged solemnly, on the word of a King, that the security of all and every of them, from violence, was, and should ever be, as much his care, as the preservation of himself and his children. And if this general assurance should not suffice to remove their apprehensions, he would command such a guard to wait upon them, as he would be responsible for to him, who had charged him with the safety and protection of his subjects."

Before we proceed, it will be necessary to show exactly the situation of the King's affairs, in the beginning of the year 1641-2. There was in the House of Commons a strong party, who were labouring to deprive the King of good part of his prerogatives, some through fear or distrust, others for more hidden designs. But these last took care not to discover their intentions. They pretended to act only upon the same motives of distrust, which influenced the first, in expectation of engaging them by degrees to second them in their projects. For this reason, they lost no opportunity to inflame this distrust of the King, by aggravating whatever could be blamed in his Government, during the first fifteen years of his Reign, and by referring all his actions, since the beginning of this Parliament, to the same principles by which he had governed before. In a word, their aim was to show, that the King was still the same, and had not altered his maxims: That his condescension for the Parliament had been forced, and full of dissimulation: That he only waited for a proper season to return to his old courses, and when once he was restored to his authority, he would use it, to be revenged of those by whom he thought himself injured, and to take just measures to establish an arbitrary Government.

Indeed, as all these things depended upon the King's secret intention, they could not be evidently proved; but however, such indications were given, as served to make impression on many people. It was observed, that the King always talked of his assent to the Acts of this Parliament, as being of pure grace and not of justice; from whence it was easy to infer, that he reserved to himself the power of revoking them when he should find occasion: That there was but too much reason to suspect he was concerned in the Irish Rebellion, considering in what juncture of time it

(1) The Lord Clarendon says, the Bishops Friends took too great offence at this indiscreet Protestation, that though they desired to preserve their Function, they had no compassion or regard of their Persons, or what became of them; inasmuch as in the whole Debate, there was only one Gentleman who spoke in their behalf, and said, "He did not believe they were guilty of High-Treason; but that they were stark mad, and therefore desired they might be sent to Bedlam." Tom. 1. p. 279.

(2) Not long before this, the King had filled in the following manner, some Seats that were vacant. Dr. Prideaux was made Bishop of Worcester, Dr. Henry of Litch, Dr. Brownrigg of Evesham, Dr. Henry King of Chester, and Mr. Westfield of Bristol. The Commons were, it seems, thereupon much troubled, that at a time when they desired to take away the dis, the King should presume to make new Bishops. About the same time, Lucas Garry, Viscount Falkland was made Secretary of State, in the room of Sir Henry Jermyn, and Sir John Culpeper, one of the Knights of the Shine for Kent, Chancellor of the Exchequer; they were also sworn of the Privy Council, and Mr. Edward Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, was now admitted into the King's Favour. Clarendon, Tom. 1. p. 239, 269. Harwich, p. 194.

(3) In England, where the Old Style is used, the year begins the 25th of March. This Style is made use of in all publick Acts, Deeds, Writings, Histories, and elsewhere. But however, in the Dates, the difference of the two Styles is set down from the 1st of January, to the 25th of March, in this manner, 1641-2, that is, the year 1641 according to the Old, and the year 1642 according to the New Style. So the 1st of January is acknowledged for the first day of the year according to the New Style. Rapin.

1641-2. consider as High-Treason, the inviting them into the Kingdom, supposing he had been able to prove his assertion?

All this shows, the King had been very ill-advised when he undertook this affair at such a juncture. Accordingly there is not a single Historian, even among those that are most devoted to him, but what owns at least, it was a most imprudent and unseasonable step.

The Peers examine the Regularity of the King's Proceedings. Rushworth, IV. p. 474. Nalson, T. II. p. 812. After the reading of the articles of accusation, the Lord Kimbolton stood up and prayed, that as he had a public charge, he might have a public clearing. But the Peers proceeded not so hastily as the King expected. The first thing they did, was to appoint a committee to examine the regularity of this accusation, and to search the records, whether there ever had been any such proceeding before, and whether an accusation against a Peer might be brought into their House by the Attorney-general. As to the accusation against the five Commoners, they did not so much as take it into consideration, whether they should receive it, but contented themselves with acquainting that House, that some of their Members were accused of High-Treason by the Attorney-general.

The Papers, &c. of the Parties accused are laid up by the King. The Commons take off the Seals. Order of the Court. Nalson, T. II. p. 813. Rushworth, IV. p. 474. 476. At the same time the Commons were informed, that several persons (1) were at Mr. Hollis's and Mr. Pym's, sealing up their trunks, doors, and papers. The same thing was done in the houses of the three other parties accused. Whereupon the Commons ordered their Sergeant to break open the seals, and apprehend those that put them on. Moreover they passed an order, "that if any persons whatever should come to the lodgings of any Member of the House, and there offer to seal the doors, trunks, or papers, that then such Member should require the assistance of the Constable to keep such persons in safe custody, till the House should give further order. That if any person should offer to arrest or detain any Member, without first acquainting the House therewith, it was lawful for such Member to stand upon his guard of defence, and for any person to assist him, according to the Protestation taken to defend the Privileges of Parliament.

Conference between the two Houses. Nalson, T. II. p. 814. Presently after, the Commons represented to the Lords in a conference, that the King had ordered the trunks, chambers, and studies of several of their Members to be sealed up, and had set a guard in a warlike manner at White-Hall. And therefore they desired, that such a guard might be placed about the Parliament also as should be approved by both Houses, or else to join with them to adjourn to a place of safety. During this conference, a Sergeant at Arms came to the House of Commons from the King, and required the five Members, accused by his Majesty. The Sergeant being ordered to withdraw, the Commons appointed some of their Members (2) to wait upon the King, and acquaint him, "That his Message was a matter of great consequence, that it concerns the privilege of Parliament, and of all the Commons of England: That they will take it into consideration, and attend his Majesty with an answer, with as much speed as the greatness of the business will permit: And in the mean time the five Members shall be ready to answer any legal charge made against them." Then they dismissed the Sergeant who had brought the message.

The Parties accused are ordered to attend daily on the House. Resolution of the Peers agreeable to the Commons request. Rushworth, IV. p. 475. At the same time they enjoined the five Members to give their daily attendance on the House.

Mean while, the Peers had made an order, to open the doors and trunks of the Members of both Houses which were sealed, and resolved to join with the Commons in a Petition to the King, for such a guard as both Houses should approve of. They had ordered moreover, that two of their body, with some Members of the Commons, should go and represent to the King, that the privileges of Parliament had been violated.

The next morning, January the 4th, the Lord Falkland reported the King's answer to the message of the Commons concerning the breach of Privilege. He said, the King asked him, whether the House did expect an answer? and before the Lord Falkland replied, told him, he would send an answer to-morrow as soon as the House was set. In the mean time he bid him acquaint the House, that the Sergeant had done nothing but what he had directions from himself to do.

Report of the King's Answer. P. 476. Presently after this report, the Commons sent and desired a conference with the Lords, to acquaint them, that there was a scandalous Paper published, containing Articles of High-Treason against the Lord Kimbolton, &c. and to desire that they would concur in punishing the authors and publishers thereof.

Then the Gentlemen of the Inns of Court, who offered themselves to be a guard to his Majesty, were sent to and examined, upon a rumour that they were bid to be ready the 4th of January. Those of Lincoln's-Inn answered, "That last week they went to White-hall to offer their service to the King, upon hearing that his person was in danger. That yesternight, they had received a message from his Majesty by Sir William Killigrew and Sir William Flemming, that they should keep with in to-morrow, and be ready at an hour's warning if the King should have occasion to use them. That they brought to them likewise a paper of articles of accusation against the Lord Kimbolton and five Members of the House of Commons. That they had only an intent to defend the King's person, and would do their utmost also to defend the Parliament; being not able to make any distinction between the King and his Parliament." The Gentlemen of the other Inns answered to the same effect (3).

In the afternoon the five accused Members came into the House according as they were enjoined. They were no sooner in their places, but one Captain Langrish informed the House, that the King was coming with a guard of military men, commanders and soldiers (4). As there was room to believe, the King intended to seize the five Members, they were immediately ordered to depart the House. They were hardly gone out when the King appeared, and going up to the chair he said, By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I must borrow your chair a little. When he was in the chair he looked round to see if he could discern any of the five Members, and then made the following Speech to the House, his guard waiting at the door.

Gentlemen,

I Am sorry for this occasion of coming unto you: Yesterday I sent a Sergeant at Arms upon a very important occasion, to apprehend some that by my command were accused of High-Treason; whereunto I did expect obedience, and not a message. And I must declare unto you here, that albeit no King that ever was in England, shall be more careful of your Privileges, to maintain them to the uttermost of his power, than I shall be; yet you must know, that in cases of Treason, no person hath a privilege. And therefore I am come to know if any of these persons that were accused are here: For I must tell you, Gentlemen, that so long as these persons that I have accused (for no slight crime, but for Treason) are here, I cannot expect that this House will be in the right way that I do heartily wish it: Therefore I am come to tell you, that I must have them wheresoever I find them. Well, since I see all the birds are flown, I do expect from you, that you shall send them unto me, as soon as they return hither. But I assure you, on the word of a King, I never did intend any force, but I shall proceed against them in a legal and fair way, for I never meant any other.

And now since I see I cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit occasion to repeat what I have said formerly, that whosoever I have done in favour, and to the good of my Subjects, I do mean to maintain it.

I will trouble you no more, but tell you I do expect as soon as they come to the House, you will send them to me; otherwise I must take my own course to find them.

The King was no sooner gone, but many members cried out aloud, so as he might hear them, Privilege! Privilege! and forthwith the House adjourned till the next day at one o' Clock.

The Commons assembling on the morrow, the 5th of January, at the appointed hour, immediately voted, that the King had violated the privileges of the House, and that they could not sit any longer there, without a full vindication of so high a breach, and a guard for the safety of their persons. Then it was resolved to adjourn till the 11th of the same Month, and a Committee of twenty four was appointed, during the adjournment to sit at Guild-Hall, and to consider of all things concerning the good and safety of the City and Kingdom, and particularly how their privileges might be vindicated, and their persons secured (5). The Committee for the Irish affairs was ordered likewise to sit at the same place during the adjournment. That done, a message was sent to the Lords, to acquaint them with what had passed the day before, with their adjournment and Committee appointed to sit at Guild-Hall.

1641-2. The same day the King, having ordered the Lord Mayor to assemble the Common-Council, came to Guild-Hall. As he passed along the streets, he had the mortification to hear people cry, Privileges of Parliament! Nay, one Henry Walker [an Ironmonger and Pamphleteer,] was so insolent as to throw into his coach a Paper, wherein was written, To your Tents, O Israel. His Majesty being come to Guild-Hall, made the following Speech to the Common-Council.

Gentlemen,

I Am come to demand such persons as I have already accused of High Treason, and do believe are shrouded in the City. I hope no good man will keep them from me; their offences are Treason, and misdemeanours of an high nature. I desire your loving assistance herein, that they may be brought to a legal trial.

And whereas there are divers suspicions raised, that I am a favourer of the Popish Religion; I do profess, in the name of a King, that I did and ever will, and that to the utmost of my power, be a prosecutor of all such as shall any ways oppose the Laws and Statutes of this Kingdom, either Papists or Separatists; and not only so, but I will maintain and defend that true Protestant Religion which my Father did profess, and I will continue in it during my life.

The King seems to have forgot the situation of his affairs, and to imagine he was still in the same state as before the war with Scotland. Certainly he could not be ignorant that the City of London was not very well affected to him, nor had reason to be so. He believed however they would espouse his cause against the Parliament, and deliver up the five Members, of which there was not the least probability. On the other hand, he could be still less ignorant, that it was chiefly in London that the Presbyterians were numerous and powerful, and yet he affected to say, he would maintain and defend the Protestant Religion which the King his Father had professed, and prosecute to the utmost of his power as well Separatists as Papists. I own I cannot see the necessity or use of such a declaration, before the Common-Council of a City much more inclined to Presbyterianism than to the Church of England, as it manifestly appeared shortly after.

Mean while, the Committee which sat at Guild-Hall, were diligently taking informations of what passed the 4th of January, and preparing matters for their report to the House against their meeting. The Committee was informed, that Sir John Byron, who was made Lieutenant of the Tower, in the room of Lunsford, had sent to Whitehall one hundred arms, and two Barrels of powder. Rushworth, who relates this particular, affirms, that the matter being farther inquired into, was found to be true. But I cannot tell whether we may give entire credit to his testimony, though what he says is not improbable.

On the 7th, the City of London presented a Petition to the King, which plainly showed they were more inclined to the Parliament than to him. "They represented their great fears and distractions, by reason of the progress of the Rebels in Ireland, fomented by the Papists in England, and their adherents: The want of aid to suppress them, and the intimations received from abroad and at home, of a design to extirpate the Protestants: The putting out persons of honour and trust from being Constable and Lieutenant of the Tower: The preparations there lately made: The fortifying of Whitehall in an unusual manner: The endeavours used to the Inns of Court: The calling divers Cannoneers into the Tower: The discovery of divers fireworks in the hands of a Papist: The misunderstanding betwixt his Majesty and Parliament, by reason of misinformation: His Majesty's late going to the House of Commons, attended with a great multitude of armed men, besides his ordinary guard, for the apprehending of divers Members, contrary to the privileges of Parliament."

This Petition was very capable to show the King, how much he was mistaken in his opinion, that the City of London was well disposed in his favour. He returned however a very mild answer to each of the articles, to this effect.

"That as for the business of Ireland, there was nothing on his part unoffered or undone; and he hoped, by the speedy advice and assistance of his Parliament, that great and necessary work would be put in a sure forwardness, to which he would contribute all his power.

"For the Tower; he wondered, that having removed a servant of good trust and reputation from that charge, only to satisfy the fears of the City, and put in another of unquestionable reputation and known ability, the petitioners should still entertain those fears: And what ever preparations were there made, it was with as great an eye of safety and advantage to the City as to his own person.

"For the fortifying of Whitehall with men and munition; he doubted not, but the petitioners had observed the strange provocation he had received to entertain that guard; and if any Citizens were wounded or ill treated, he was confidently assured, that it happened by their own evil and corrupt demeanours.

"That he knew no other endeavours to the Inns of Court than a gracious intention; that he received the tender of their loyal and dutiful affections, with very good approbation and acceptance, and an encouragement given them to continue the same upon all occasions.

"For his going to the House of Commons; he was verily persuaded, that if the petitioners knew the clear grounds upon which those persons stood accused of High-Treason, they would believe his going thither was an act of grace and favour to that House, and the most peaceable way of having that necessary service, for the apprehension of those persons, performed; especially, if such orders had been made, which he was not willing to believe, for the resistance of all lawful authority as were disapproved of. And for the proceedings against those persons, he ever intended the same should be with all justice and favour, according to the Laws of the realm. He concluded with these words, "And this extraordinary way of satisfying a Petition of so unusual a nature, his Majesty is considerably thankful, and has thought the greatest instance can be given of his Majesty's clear intentions to his Subjects, and of the singular estimation he hath of the good affections of this City, which he believes in gratitude will never be wanting to his just commands and service."

On the morning, the 8th of January, the King published Jan. 8. a Proclamation, commanding all Magistrates and Officers of justice, to apprehend the accused Members, and carry them to the Tower.

Whilst the Committee was assembled at Guild-Hall, they took the information of two witnesses, who deposed, IV. p. 432. That they heard Captain Hyde say things, which showed, he had some ill design against the House of Commons.

Then it was resolved, that the Sheriffs of London and Refusal of Middlesex should raise the Posse Comitatus for their safe coming to Westminster, the day the Parliament should meet. Whereupon the Watermen (1) came and tendered their service, to guard the Committee by water to the Parliament-house, which was accepted of. But the offer of the Apprentices to accompany them by land was refused.

Mean while, the Committee of twenty four having appointed a Sub-committee to examine the affairs in question, they made their report, January the 10th, of what resolutions had been taken; namely,

That the publishing several articles of High-Treason against the Lord Kimbolton, and the five Members of the House of Commons, was a high breach of the privileges of Parliament, a seditious Act, tending to the subversion of the peace of the Kingdom.

That the privileges of Parliament, so violated and broken, could not be fully and sufficiently vindicated, unless his Majesty would be pleased to discover the names of those persons who advised him to seal the chambers and studies of the accused Members; to send a Sergeant at arms to the House of Commons to demand them; to issue warrants under his own hand to apprehend them; to come in person to the House; to publish the articles of accusation in the form of a Proclamation, to the end such pernicious counsellors might receive condign punishment.

The Committee of twenty four resolving to return on the morrow to the Parliament with a numerous guard, the King thought not proper to be exposed to the danger of receiving some affront from the populace; and therefore chose to withdraw to Hampton-Court, and two days after to Windsor.

January the 11th, the Commons being assembled at Westminster, the Committee of twenty four came thither by water, conducted by great numbers of seamen and others, whilst the train'd-bands of London marched through the City in arms, to guard them also by land.

Then it was that the King found he had taken wrong measures, and that his imprudent proceedings could not but grieve him, and ruin his affairs. He repented of what he had done, and wished he could appease the disorder raised by himself. To this end, the next day, January the 12th, he sent the following message to both Houses:

His Majesty taking notice, that some conceive it disputable whether his proceedings against the Lord Kimbolton, Hollis, Sir Arthur Hasleig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hasleig, Mr. Strode, be legal and agreeable to the privileges

(1) Rushworth says, it was divers Mariners and Seamen, who brought a Petition, signed by a thousand hands. Two. 4. p. 432.

1641-2. liament; and being very desirous to give satisfaction to all men, in all matters that may seem to have relation to privilege, is pleased to waive his former proceedings, and all doubts by this means being settled, when the minds of men are composed, his Majesty will proceed thereupon in an unquestionable way, and assures his Parliament, that upon all occasions he will be as careful of their privileges, as of his life or his Crown.

Had there not been a settled design against the King, this message would have been capable to pacify all, since he plainly shewed, he repented of what he had done, and in some measure confessed his fault. But he had given his enemies too great an advantage, for them to neglect to improve it. I have observed, there were many Members in both Houses, not yet determined to join with those who sought only to throw all into disorder and confusion. Some began to discover the designs of the Presbyterians. Others had scruples, which they could not overcome, when they considered, that the destruction of the Kingdom would be endangered, by a bare distrust which could not be well-grounded. But their doubts were changed into certainty, after what the King had lately done. Before the accusation of the six Members, it was doubtful, whether the King thought of being revenged of those who had offended him: but this accusation rendered this intention very probable. It was doubtful whether his condescension for the Parliament was constrained: but this accusation discovered, that he believed himself deprived of part of his lawful authority, and considered what the Parliament had done with respect to himself, as High-Treason. For if the depriving him of part of his authority was treason, those who had voted for triennial Parliaments, and the continuance of this, could not be innocent. If the endeavouring to render the King odious to his people was treason, certainly the six Members were not alone guilty. If the inviting the Scotch army into England was treason, how could the House of Commons clear themselves after having rewarded the Scots for their invasion, with a present of three hundred thousand pounds? If it was treason to endeavour to subvert the rights, and the very being of Parliaments, both Houses were guilty of this crime, when they assumed by an Act, the power of not being dissolved or prorogued without their own consent, since this was altering the nature of Parliaments. If raising tumults was treason, the countenancing and encouraging these same tumults was no less so, and of this the whole House of Commons was guilty. In short, the charge against these particular Members for conspiring to levy, and for actually levying, war against the King, necessarily aimed at the whole House, who had countenanced the tumultuous assemblies, set themselves a guard, and provided themselves with arms.

These things put those upon considering, who till then had preserved some good-will for the King, and entertained equitable thoughts of him. They plainly saw what judgment the King made of the Parliament's actions, tho' he attacked but six Members. The shallow artifice of throwing upon a few the fault of the whole House, had been proper with regard to former Parliaments, whilst the King was maffer. But it was ineffectual with the present Parliament, and at such a juncture. After the redress of past grievances, the point was to know, whether the King's word was to be relied on, and he resorted to his natural state. Many were of this sentiment, as they could not imagine, that after what had passed in this Parliament, the King would endeavour to govern for the future as he had done before. They could not resolve, from a bare motive of fear and distrust, to alter the constitution of the Government, by abridging the King's power. Others maintained, that the King's condescension was all dissimulation, and his word not to be relied on. These men, to bring the rest to their opinion, were forced to use various artifices, to aggravate and misinterpret the King's actions, and nevertheless, were not yet able to compass their ends. But by the accusation of the six Members, the King himself supplied them with arguments, which were not easy to answer. They had no more occasion to use signs and conjectures to prove what they advanced, since the King gave them himself such evident proof. So it may be said, the King never followed more pernicious advice, than that lately given him. If the Lord Digby, as it is said, was his Counsellor, it may be affirmed, that he threw him into a precipice, from whence it was not possible ever to extricate himself.

From that time, the question was not to know, Whether it was necessary to limit the regal power, but to know within what bounds it should be confin'd; they who had hitherto been most moderate, having entirely lost their doubts concerning the King's sincerity. So the party which was most opposite to him, being grown very superior in both Houses, and meeting with little opposition, they who wished to do the King service, thought it safest, either to absent themselves from the Parliament, or to keep silence, in the expectation of an opportunity to serve him effectually.

No. 64. VOL. II.

ally, if affairs should take a new turn, and thereby the opposite party became still more powerful.

It is therefore evident, that in the present disposition of the Parliament, the King's last message was not a sufficient means to oblige his enemies to alter their measures. Especially, as by this message he did not desist from the accusation, but only from the manner of proceeding, though it was easy to perceive, he took this method only to come off with the less dishonour. Accordingly, the Commons did not much regard it. The 17th of January, they came to the like resolutions with those taken by the Committee in London, and digested them into a declaration. They only added, the depositions of some witnesses concerning the number of armed men, who attended the King when he came to the House, and who, according to these depositions, were about five hundred; concerning the insolent behaviour of some of the officers who accompanied his Majesty; and the words they used at the door of the House, which seemed to denote, that they waited only for a signal to fall upon the Members. There is no question, all these things were highly aggravated: but these aggravations were subservient to the end proposed by the Commons. They declared, however, "That they meant not to screen their Members, when accused of treason or misdemeanour, and prosecuted according to law and the privileges of Parliament: On the contrary, they should be always ready to bring them to a speedy and due trial; being sensible, that it equally imported them, as well to see justice done against criminals, as to defend the just rights and liberties of the Subjects and Parliament of England."

Before this declaration was published, the King had sent the following message to both Houses, which shewed how desirous he was of giving them content, and ending this unfortunate affair:

His Majesty being no less tender of the privileges of Parliament, and thinking himself no less concerned that they be not broken, and that they be asserted and vindicated whenever they are so, than the Parliament itself, hath thought fit to add to his last message this profession; That in all his proceedings against the Lord Kimbolton, and the rest of the Nation, accused Members, he had never the least intention of violating the least privilege of Parliament: And in case any doubt of breach of privilege remains, will be willing to clear that, and assert those by any reasonable way that his Parliament shall advise him to; upon confidence of which, he no way doubts his Parliament will forthwith lay by all jealousies, and apply themselves to the publick and pressing affairs, and especially to those of Ireland, wherein the good of this Kingdom and the true Religion (which shall ever be his Majesty's first care) are so highly and so nearly concerned. And his Majesty assures himself, that his care of the privileges will encrease their tenderness of his lawful prerogative, which are so necessary to the mutual defence of each other; and both which will be the foundation of a perpetual perfect intelligence between his Majesty and Parliament, and of the happiness and prosperity of his people.

This message (for the reason before given) was not capable of satisfying the Commons. On the contrary, the next day they caused Sir Edward Herbert the Attorney-General to be examined at the Bar of the House of Lords. His answers being sent to the Commons, they ordered him to be accused of several high crimes and misdemeanours, that is to say, of having violated the privileges of Parliament, in exhibiting to the House of Lords the articles he received from the King's own hand, with an express command to exhibit them.

Two days after, both Houses petitioned his Majesty, that they might be informed what proof there was against the six Members, to the end they might speedily be proceeded against [in a parliamentary way.] The King answered, "he thought it unusual or unfit to discover what proof was against them, before he was certain of the Jan. 21. way he was to proceed, lest a new mistake should breed more delays. That it should therefore be resolved, whether his Majesty was bound in respect of privilege, to proceed against them by impeachment in Parliament; or whether he was at liberty to prefer an indictment at common law, in the usual way, or have his choice of either."

This answer could not but embarrass the two Houses, since the King was willing to follow their directions in the prosecution of the six Members. Accordingly, they thought not proper to resolve upon either of the ways proposed by the King. They contented themselves with replying in a second Petition, "that finding there was still no legal and parliamentary proceedings against the accused Members, they thought it their duty, once more to beseech his Majesty, to inform the Parliament what proof there was against them, that they might be called to a legal trial, it being the undoubted right and privilege of the Commons."

1641-2. "vilege of Parliament, that no Member can be proceeded against without the consent of Parliament."

The King plainly perceiving, there would be no end, and that new difficulties would be perpetually flatted, endeavoured to terminate the affair at once by the following answer.

IV. p. 492. That as he once conceived that he had ground enough to accuse them, so now his Majesty finds as good cause wholly to desert any prosecution of them. And for a farther testimony of his Majesty's real intention towards all his loving Subjects, (some of whom haply may be involved in some unknowing and unwilling errors) for the better composing and settling of all fears and jealousies of what kind soever, his Majesty is ready to grant as free and general a pardon for the full contentment of all his loving Subjects, as shall by the approbation of both Houses of Parliament be thought convenient for that purpose.

Parliament. It was not difficult to perceive, the King offered this general pardon only to have it said, that the six Members were exempted from the rigour of the law by virtue of the pardon. But the Parliament not being satisfied with the King's offer, addressed a third petition to him, desiring, that, according to two Acts of the 37th and 38th years of the reign of Edward III (1), his Majesty would be pleased to send the persons, that had made suggestion or information to him of the crimes of the six Members to the Parliament, that so the rights and privileges of Parliament might be vindicated, which of justice ought not to be denied.

The King returning no answer to this petition, the affair rested here, except that in April following, the House of Peers gave sentence against the Attorney-General, declaring him incapable of all offices, but that of Attorney-General, and committing him to the prison of the Fleet during the pleasure of the House.

Tho' this affair seemed to be ended, the King was upbraided with it afterwards a thousand times. But before I finish it entirely, I believe it will not be amiss to make some remarks on this subject, that I may not be obliged to resume it hereafter.

Though the Commons made a great noise about the breach of their privileges, that was not the thing which most incensed them. Their great grievance was, that the King had chosen, to accuse of High-Treason, five Members of the House, who were the chief leaders and directors. So, to accuse these five Members was, as I observed, to accuse the whole House. Now if the King did believe the House guilty of treason, for having done what he accused but five Members of, what assurance could there be, that he would religiously observe his promises, which, in his opinion, were extorted from him by traitors? There was reason therefore to suspect, that the King had some grand design, and before the execution, was willing to secure those who were most capable to obstruct it, as well by their abilities as by their great credit in the Parliament and with the people. This is the impression made by this unreasonable accusation on the Members of the Parliament. And to this contributed also the King's zeal to seize the five Members, even to his coming in person to the House of Commons to apprehend them, which no King of England had ever done before him. Nay, very likely, had they been in the House, and made any resistance, he would have employed armed men, who attended him to the number of about five hundred, to carry them away. This was sufficient to incense against him those who had hitherto considered as a doubtful point, whether his promises were to be relied on. It could not be conceived, that at a time when the moderate Members began to unite in his favour, to establish a solid peace, he should be induced to an action so odious, and so destructive of it, had he not intended to subdue the Parliament by force. Thus the complaints of both Houses about the breach of their privileges, was properly only a pretence to cover the true reason of their fears. As this reason was not of sufficient evidence to convince the People, who could regard it but as a bare suspicion, they insisted only upon their privileges, till they should engage the King to declare himself more openly. Their real aim was therefore to oblige the King to take some new step, that might shew the People, it was not without cause that the King was accused of having ill designs. This certainly was the motive of the Parliament's petition, to be informed of the proofs before the way of proceeding should be resolved. This was a snare laid for the King, to engage him to produce proofs of a crime, whereof the whole Parliament was no less guilty than the Members accused, and thereby the people would have been convinced, that he aimed at the Parliament itself. But the King avoided the snare, by dropping the prosecution rather than be obliged to produce proofs, which must have been prejudicial to him, after missing his aim. It was not the breach of privilege, but the King's secret intention, that was chiefly in question. By his late proceedings he had given occasion to think, that a rupture between him and the Parliament was not very remote, since he had destroyed the confidence, on which alone peace and a good understanding could be founded. In this light must the accusation of the six Members be viewed, and not as a separate fact relating only to the privileges of Parliament. It is therefore very needless, in my opinion, that some have undertaken to discuss exactly this question, whether the two Houses could lawfully refuse sending to prison their Members accused of High-Treason? However, I shall briefly speak to this point for the Reader's information. It is certain, the Privileges of Parliament do not extend to crimes of High-Treason, and in such cases the Commons have no more right than the Peers. But it is also an undoubted maxim, that no Member can be proceeded against without the consent of his House. When a Peer is accused, it belongs to the House of Lords to examine, whether the prosecution ought to be continued to, and in case of consent, whether the Party accused is to be confined or left free to answer the accusation. The Lords are determined to one or other, by the nature or circumstances of the Crime. It is the same with respect to the Members of the Lower-House. In the present case, the Commons thought there was no reason to send the Members accused to prison, because the accusation was too general. The King pretended, on the contrary, that upon a bare accusation, under colour that it was for High-Treason, he had power to apprehend the accused, without the consent of their House, and to commit them to the Tower. It is easy to perceive, the King carried this principle a little too far, that the Privileges of Parliament take not place in cases of High-Treason, since he extended it to a bare accusation of Treason. But a bare accusation cannot deprive the Houses of Parliament, of the right to examine, if there be reason to consent to the prosecution, whether by direct proof, probable signs, or public evidence. Otherwise, the King might have pitched upon, not only five, but a hundred Members of the Lower-House, and sent them to prison, upon the bare accusation of Treason, which would render the privileges of Parliament entirely useless. Nevertheless the King acted as if his right had been undeniable, tho' that was, at least, the point in question. I shall not undertake to illustrate this point any farther, which has difficulties, the solution whereof depends on the knowledge of the laws and customs of England. I shall only add, that the King did himself a very great injury by this unreasonable step, and that his enemies received by it advantages, which in the end occasioned his ruin.

1641-2. The Commons continued to express an extreme distrust of the King. This distrust daily increased, till at last it produced an entire rupture.

January the 12th, the Commons sent an order to Sir John Byron, Lieutenant of the Tower, to come and answer to such questions as should be put to him, concerning the arms and ammunition sent to Whitehall, the day the King came to the House of Commons. But he excused himself, for that he had the King's express warrant not to go out of the Tower.

The King had answered the Petition of both Houses concerning a guard, that he would appoint one or two hundred men out of the trained-bands of the City (such as the Lord-Mayor should be answerable for to him) under the command of [Robert Bertie] Earl of Lindsey. But the Commons refused this offer, and ordered, that two companies of the trained-bands should every day attend upon the House as a guard, under the command of Sergeant Major Skippon.

The Parliament's distrust of the King was daily inflamed by successive accidents, which the King's enemies knew how to improve. Whilst things were in this state, the Parliament received information, that the Lord Digby, Colonel Lunford, and other disbanded officers were at Kingston upon Thames, with about two hundred Horse. Whereupon it was ordered by both Houses, that the Sheriffs, calling to their assistance the trained-bands of the several Counties of England and Wales, should suppress all unlawful assemblies gathered together to the disturbance of the peace of the Kingdom. They were afraid, the King intended to secure Portsmouth, and perhaps, their fears were not groundless. However that be, they sent an order to Colonel Goring, Governor of Portsmouth, requiring

(1) By these Acts it was enacted, that, "If any Person whatsoever make Suggestion to the King himself of any Crime committed by any other Person ought to be sent with the Suggestion before the Chancellor or Keeper of the Great Seal, the Treasurer or the Great Chamberlain, the Justice of the Peace, or the Sheriff, which if he cannot prove, he is to be imprisoned till he hath satisfied the Party accused of his charges, or a fine of 200 l. to be paid to the King." Again, by another Statute, it was enacted, that, "If any Person shall accuse any other Person of any Crime, and shall not be able to prove the same, he shall be imprisoned till he hath satisfied the Party accused of his charges, or a fine of 200 l. to be paid to the King."

1641-2. him not to deliver up the town, nor receive any forces into it, but by his Majesty's authority signified by both Houses of Parliament. At the same time the Lords sent an express order to the Lord Digby, to give his attendance in the House. But he thought fit to withdraw out of the Kingdom (1). There had now been information, that he was the person who advised the King to accuse the Six Members of Parliament. Besides, the Commons were exasperated against him, on account of his Speech against the Bill of Attainder of the Earl of Stratford, whilst he was member of that House; so that the least pretence was sufficient to draw their resentment upon him.

The Commons made great noise about the Kingston affair, to persuade the People his Majesty intended to secure Portsmouth. Nay, they caused several witnesses to be examined, but this affair was carried no farther. They were contented with sending for Admiral Pennington, who reported that the Lord Digby had shown him a warrant under the King's own hand, to convey him safely into France or Holland, and that he durst not disobey the order.

The Parliament's fears about Portsmouth made them think of Hull, a very important place in the County of York. The Commons instead of concealing, affected rather to discover, their fears. Wherefore they sent a message to the Lords, that there was at Hull a magazine of arms for sixteen thousand men, and ammunition proportionable. That the town being weakly garrisoned [and the adjacent country full of Papists and disaffected persons] they desired their concurrence in an order, that some of the trained-bands of Yorkshire should be put into Hull, under the command of Sir John Hatham, Member of the House of Commons, with orders not to deliver up the place, or magazine, without the King's authority signified by both Houses. To this the Lords readily consenting, young Hatham, son to Sir John, was sent immediately to Hull to execute this order, till his Father should be ready to take the Government of that place.

Nothing shows more clearly the Parliament's distrust, than this order about Hull, since it could not be but upon the supposition of an urgent necessity, that they could pretend to place Governors in the towns, and it was also this necessity that they desired to insinuate to the People. However, the sequel shewed, the Parliament had reason to take this precaution (2).

Since the accusation of the Six Members, scarce a day had passed but the Parliament expressed their suspicions of the King, so that every thing manifestly tended to a rupture. The better to persuade the People that both Houses were apprehensive of some violence from the King, and not safe at Westminster, a Bill was passed to enable them to adjourn to any place they pleased.

They ordered likewise the Earl of Newport, Master of the Ordnance, and the Lieutenant of the Tower, not to suffer any cannon or ammunition to be carried from thence. And for the better safe-guard of the Tower, the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex were ordered to set a sufficient guard both by land and water about it. The same day the Commons caused some great saddles to be seized, that were to be sent to Kingston.

Moreover, Mr. Bagshaw of Windfor, Member of the House of Commons, informed them, that last night as he was going to Windfor (where the King then was) he saw divers troops of Horse, and that there came thither a wagon loaded with ammunition, and another wagon loaded with the same, was sent from thence to Portsmouth. Adding, there were at Windfor four hundred Horse, with about forty officers. Whereupon Skippen was ordered to detach some Horsemen towards Windfor for intelligence. But in all appearance there was no great discovery made, since nothing more was said of it.

After that, the Commons desired the Lords to join with them in a petition to the King, for the removal of Sir John Byron from the Lieutenantancy of the Tower, and offered their reasons. But the Lords thought fit to decline it.

Mean while, the Lords being informed by the Earl of Essex, that the King had laid his commands upon him and the Earl of Holland, to attend his Majesty at Hampton-Court as Lord-Chamberlain, and Groom of the Stole, they would not dispense with their absence, alleging that their attendance in Parliament about the high affairs of the realm, was truer service to his Majesty, than any they could do him at Court. The King soon after removed both these Lords from their places (3).

During these differences between the King and the Parliament, Ireland remained unassisted. The Commons would not pay ten thousand men, who should be levied by the King's commissions. They pretended, these troops should be raised by way of pressing, in order to chuse such for soldiers as should be least attached to the King, and that the King should not be concerned in the levies. The Bill for pressing had been sent up to the Lords, who had not yet passed it, of which the Commons very much complained. At last, the Scotch Commissioners seeing, that the differences between the King and the Parliament retarded the conclusion of the treaty for which they were sent, be- thought themselves of offering their mediation to the King and both Houses, to procure an agreement. But the King was offended at their offer, because they had not first communicated their intentions to him in private. The two Houses on the contrary, thanked them for this mark of their affection.

Mean while, the Committee for the Irish affairs finding, that Kingdom wanted a speedy assistance, and that the treaty for the ten thousand Scots was not likely to be concluded soon enough, made a proposal to the Scotch Commissioners, that the Scots should send into Ireland two thousand five hundred men, who were ready, till the treaty for the ten thousand should be ended; to which the Commissioners of Scotland agreed. To that purpose, they propounded certain conditions, which were approved by both Houses. But the King objected to one of the conditions, which was, that Carriek Fergus, a sea-port in the north of Ireland, should be delivered to the Scots. He said, it was too great a trust for auxiliary forces. Nevertheless, seeing the Parliament willing to confide in the Scots, he thought he should not refuse his confidence to his native Subjects. It must be observed, that the King and Commons expressed an equal desire to assist Ireland, but each would have it in their own way. The King wished to have an English army sent thither, and blamed the Commons for not hastening the levies. The Commons, on their side, suspected, that the King's aim was to leave England unprovided of men, arms and ammunition, and therefore insisted upon the Treaty of Scotland for ten thousand men; and charged the King with being the sole cause of the obstacles to the conclusion of the treaty. Nay, they plainly intimated, that though the King seemed to preis the relief of Ireland, he had no real intention that Kingdom should be relieved. Necessity however obliged the King and both Houses to accept at length of the two thousand five hundred Scots, who were sent into the north of Ireland, where they did good service.

The Commons ceased not to shew openly their distrust of the King. This was absolutely necessary to the execution of the designs of those who had then the chief management of the affairs of the House. But it does not follow, because it was necessary to make known this distrust, that therefore it was not real. The leading men of this party did not believe indeed they had reason to trust the King, and whilst, it was their interest to shew the publick the grounds of their distrust. This they did in a solemn manner by means of a Speech spoken by Mr. Pym at a conference with the Lords. This Speech deserves to be inserted at length, because it shews by what steps the Commons endeavoured to compals their ends.

My Lords,

I Am commanded by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, Mr. Pym's assembled for the Commons in Parliament, to present to your Lordships divers Petitions, which they have received from several parts concerning the state of the Kingdom: Whereunto they are chiefly moved by that constant affection which they have always expressed, of maintaining a firm union and good correspondence with your Lordships; wherein they have ever found much advantage, and contentment; but never held it more important and necessary, than at this time, wherein the wisdom and resolution of Parliament have as many great dangers and difficulties to pass through, as ever heretofore.

We are united in the publick trust, which is derived from the Commonwealth, in the common duty and obligation whereby God doth bind us to the discharge of that trust; and the Commons desire to impart to your Lordships, whatsoever information or intelligence, whatsoever encouragement or assistance they have received from those several Counties which they represent, that so likewise we may be united in the same intentions and endeavours of improving all to the service of his Majesty, and the common good of the Kingdom.

The petitions which I am directed to communicate to your Lordships, are four; from London, Middlesex, Essex, and Hertfordshire. We have received many more, but it would

(1) And Sir Thomas Lansford was committed to the Tower. Whitlock, p. 34.
(2) A Committee was also appointed to draw up a Letter, or other Declaration, to be presented to the Lords, and by both Houses to be published in print, and sent into all parts of the Kingdom, advising them with all expedition to be in a readiness, and good posture of defence, upon all occasions, to defend their several Counties from Invasion by Papists, or other ill affected Persons. Nelson, Tom. II. p. 847, 850, &c.
(3) The Lord Clarendon says, That the Earl of Essex refused to go, and was for that purpose making himself ready, when the Earl of Holland came to him, and privately dissuaded him, that it they went, they should be both murdered at Hampton-Court. Tom. I. p. 397.

1641-2. take up too much time, and be too great a trouble to peruse all: And in these four, you may perceive the effect and sense of all: First, I am to desire your Lordships to hear them read, and then I shall pursue my instructions in propounding some observations out of them.

The Petition of the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London.

Sheweth,

THAT the Committee of this honourable House, upon Saturday the 22d of this instant January, sent a message to the petitioners, for the loan of one hundred thousand pounds, or of so much thereof as could conveniently be forthwith raised, for levying of forces to suppress the rebels in Ireland: To which message something was then answered, and a further answer in writing promised.

In performance whereof, they humbly present the answer following, together with the reason thereof, desiring that the same (being the best that for the present they are able to give) may favourably be accepted.

As this answer is very long, and contains several particulars not absolutely necessary, I shall content myself with inserting here what is most material.

That how feasible soever they were of the great miseries of their brethren in Ireland, and of the imminent danger, not only of the total loss of that Kingdom, but of the ruin of this also, if that of Ireland should be lost; yet they are compelled to declare, That they have no power to raise any sums by way of tax for any foreign use; and that they have no means to do it, otherwise than by the immediate personal consent of every particular lender, which they cannot hope to obtain, in regard of these Obstructions following.

1. That immediately before the Parliament, and since, divers great sums for the service of the King and Kingdom, have been already lent by the Citizens of London, besides 50,000*l.* for the supply of Ireland in particular; a great part whereof some of the lenders were compelled to borrow, and cannot to this day repay.

2. That such part of those moneys as should have been repaid out of the Poll-money and Subsidies, is not yet done.

3. That the said sum of fifty thousand pounds, lent for Ireland, was hastened and speedily paid, upon account of the urgent necessities of that Kingdom; and yet no considerable forces are sent thither to this day.

4. The general withholding of very great sums of money from the petitioners, and many others, doth render divers persons of good estate and credit, hardly able to go on with trade, or to pay their debts, and maintain their charge.

5. The refusing to accept the offers of Scotland, to send ten thousand men into Ireland, discourageth most men from lending any money, were they never so able.

6. The not passing the Bill for pressing of Soldiers puts many men into fears, that there may be some design there to lose Ireland, and to consume this Kingdom in the losing of Ireland, than to preserve either the one or the other; for that it cannot be conceived, that the rebels (being grown so powerful) will be suppressed by volunteers (1).

7. The slow issuing of Commissions to those, who being in Ireland, or going thither, are willing to enter the field against the rebels, disables them from doing any effectual execution upon the enemy, unless in their own defence; and so all the monies that have been, or may be sent thither, are exhausted to maintain our forces, to do little or nothing worthy of them, rather than employed to chastise the rebels: By means whereof, those rebels are so much emboldened, that they boast they will extirpate the British nation there, and then make England the seat of war.

8. The not disarming of Papists here in England, after many discoveries of their treacheries and bloody designs; the great decays of fortifications, block-houses, and other sea-forts; the not managing of them, nor furnishing them with ordnance and ammunition; the not placing all of them in such hands, in whom the Parliament may confide; and the not settling this Kingdom in a posture of defence, in times of so many fears and jealousies of foreign invasions, and intestine conspiracies; the not removing the present Lieutenant of the Tower, and putting such a person into that place, as may be well approved of by the Parliament, notwithstanding standing the earnest Petitions exhibited to the House of Commons for that purpose, which hath produced a forbearance to bring bullion into the Tower, in this time of scarcity of monies; all which cannot but overthrow Trading more and more, and make monies yet more scarce in the City and Kingdom.

9. The King's ships are not fitted and employed, as the present condition of this Kingdom and Ireland requires, but some of them for conveying away of delinquents (2).

10. The not questioning those many thousands of unknown persons, who are sheltered in Covent-Garden, and thereabouts, which do not employ themselves in any lawful calling, and it is very probable, lie in a readiness to adventure upon some desperate attempt.

11. The misunderstanding between the King and the Parliament; the not vindicating the privileges of Parliament; the not suppressing of protections; the not punishing of delinquents; and the not executing of all Priests and Jesuits legally condemned, while others, contrary to privilege of Parliament, have been charged with treason.

12. By means of the premises, there is such decay of trading, and such scarcity of money, as it is likely, in very short time, to cast innumerable multitudes of poor artificers into such a depth of poverty and extremity, as may enforce them upon some dangerous and desperate attempts.

These are the evils under which the Petitioners do exceedingly labour and languish, which they humbly conceive to have sprung from the employing of ill-affected persons in places of trust and honour in the State, and near to the sacred person of his Majesty; and that these evils are still continued by means of the votes of Bishops and popish Lords in the House of Peers.

The Petitioners of the County of Essex thanked the Commons for their extraordinary care, representing to them withal, that they were still apprehensive of a great stop of reformation in matters of Religion, and of the whole Kingdom's being in great danger from the Papists: nor could they expect any redress, unless the Bishops and popish Lords were removed out of the House of Peers.

The Petitioners of the County of Hertford prayed, that the Papists might be [fully] disarmed; the Kingdom put into a posture of defence; the forts and strong places committed to such hands, as the Parliament might confide in; the privileges of Parliament repaired; endeavours used to take away the votes of popish Lords and Bishops; Ireland speedily relieved; Delinquents brought to further punishment; prebends and grievances in Church and State removed; and whatever shall be amiss reformed.

My Lords,

IN these four Petitions you may hear the voice, or rather the cry of all England, and you cannot wonder if the urgency, the extremity, of the condition wherein we are, do produce some earnestness and vehemency of expression more than ordinary; the agony, terror, and perplexity in which the Kingdom labours is universal, all parts are affected with it; and therefore in these, you may observe the groans and miserable complaints of all. Divers reasons may be given, why those diseases which are epidemical, are more dangerous than others: The cause of such diseases is universal and supernatural, not from an evil constitution, or evil diet, or any other accident; and such causes work with more vigour and efficacy, than those which are particular and inferior.

2. In such diseases there is a communicative quality, whereby the malignity of them is multiplied and enforced.

3. They have a converting, transforming power, that turns other diseases and evil affections of mens bodies into their own nature.

4. The common and epidemical disease wherein this Commonwealth lies now gasping, hath a superior and universal cause from the evil counsels and designs of those, who under his Majesty bear the greatest sway in Government.

2. It hath a contagious and infectious quality, whereby it is diffused and disperseth through all parts of the Kingdom.

3. It is apt to take in the discontents, evil affections and designs of particular persons, to encrease and fortify itself.

I shall take occasion, from several branches of those Petitions which your Lordships have heard, to observe:

1. The variety of dangers to which this Kingdom is now subject.

(1) They would inflame by this, that an Army raised in the usual manner by the King's Commissions, would be very unfit to reduce Ireland, because the King did not wish the Rebels to be subdued. Rapin.

(2) They mean the Lord Digby. Rapin.

1671-2. "2. The manifold distempers which are the cause of those dangers.

"3. The multiplicity of those evil influences, which are the causes of those distempers.

"The first danger is from enemies abroad: This may seem a needless and impertinent observation at this time, seeing we are at peace with all nations about us: But (my Lords) you may be pleased to consider, that the safety of the Kingdom ought not to depend upon the will and disposition of our neighbours, but upon our own strength and provision: Betwixt States there are often sudden changes from peace to war, according to occasion and advantage: All the States of Christendom are now armed, and we have no reason to believe, but that those of greatest power have an evil eye upon us in respect of our Religion: And if their private differences should be composed, how dangerously, how speedily might those great armies, and other preparations now ready, be applied to some enterprise and attempt against us? And if there were no other cause, this were sufficient to make us stand upon our guard; but there are divers more especial symptoms of dangers of this kind. We may perceive, by several advertisements from abroad, that they did foresee our dangers many months before they broke out; they could foretell the time and manner of them, which is a clear evidence, they held intelligence with those which were the contrivers and workers of the present troubles. We have many dangerous traitors and fugitives now in other parts, who can discover the weakness and distemper of the Kingdom; who hold intelligence with the ill-affected party here, and by all cunning and subtle practices, endeavour to incite and provoke other Princes against us. Some of the Ministers of our neighbour Princes, may be justly suspected to have had a more immediate hand and operation in the insurrection and rebellion of Ireland; many of the Commanders, and most of the Soldiers levied for the service of Spain, are now joined with the rebels there; and those Irish Friers which were employed by the Spanish Ambassador, for the making of those levies, are known to have been the chief incendiaries of this rebellion, and are still very active in the prosecution and encouragement of it. The rebels have a ready and speedy supply from some of our neighbours. Two convoys of munition and arms we are certainly informed of; one from Dunkirk, the other from Nantes in Brittany; and certainly those that are so forward to enable others to hurt us, will not forbear to hurt us themselves, as soon as they shall have means and opportunity to do it.

"Another danger is from the Papist and ill-affected party at home. The Papists here are acted by the same principles with those in Ireland, many of the most active of them have lately been there; which argues an intercourse and communication of Council. They have still store of arms and munition at their disposing, notwithstanding all our endeavours to disarm them; they have a free resort to the City and to the Court; they want no opportunity to consult together; they have the same or greater encouragement from above, and from about (1), than ever, in respect of the example and success of the rebels in Ireland, and the great confusions and divisions which by their cunning and subtle practices are raised and fomented amongst our selves at home.

"A third danger is of tumults and insurrections of the meaner sort of people, by reason of their ill vent of cloth and other manufactures, whereby great multitudes are set on work, who live for the most part by their daily gettings, and will, in a very short time, be brought to great extremity, if not employed: Nothing is more sharp and pressing than necessity and want; what they cannot buy they will take, and from them the like necessity will quickly be derived to the farmers and husbandmen; and so grow higher, and involve all in an equality of misery and distress, if it be not prevented. And at this time such tumults will be dangerous, because the Kingdom is full of disbanded soldiers and officers, which will be ready to head and to animate the multitude to commit violence with more strength and advantage; and if they once grow into a body, it will be much more difficult to reduce them into order again, because necessity and want, which are the cause of this disturbance, will still encrease as the effects do encrease.

"A fourth danger is from the rebels in Ireland, not only in the respect of that Kingdom, but in respect of this. They have seized upon the body of that Kingdom already; they abound in men of very able bodies; they encrease in arms and munition; they have great hopes of supplies from abroad, of encouragement here, and are "free of good entertainment from the papist party, so that they begin to speak already there of transporting themselves hither, and making this Kingdom the seat of the war. The distemper which hath produced these dangers is various and exceeding violent. Whatsoever nature is hindered in her operations and faculties, distempers will necessarily follow.

"The obstructions which have brought us into this distemper, are very many, so that we cannot wonder at this strength and malignity of it. Some of the chiefest of these obstructions I shall endeavour to remember.

"1. The obstruction of Reformation in matters of Religion: No grievances are sharper than those that press upon the tender consciences of men; and there was never Church or State afflicted with more grievances of this kind, than we have been. And though they are, by the wisdom of this Parliament, partly eased and diminished, yet many still remain; and as long as the Bishops and the corrupt part of the Clergy continue in their power, there will be little hopes of freedom, either from the sense of those which continue, or the fear of those which are removed. And of this obstruction, (my Lords,) I must clear the Commons, we are in no part guilty of it; some good Bills have passed us, and others are in preparation, which might have been passed before this, if we had not found such ill success in the other. Whatsoever mischief this obstruction shall produce, we are free from it; we may have our part in the misery, we can have no part in the guilt or dishonour.

"2. An obstruction in Trade: It is the trade that brings food and nourishment to the Kingdom: It is that which preserves and encreases the stock of the whole, and distributes a convenient portion of maintenance to every part of it; therefore such an obstruction as this must needs be dangerous; the freedom of trade being so necessary, the benefit so important, as that it gives life, strength, and beauty to the whole body of the Commonwealth; but I must protest, the House of Commons have given no cause to this obstruction; we have eased trade of many burthens and heavy taxes, which are taken off; we have freed it from many hard restraints by patents and monopolies; we have been willing to part with our own privileges to give encouragement; we have sought to put the merchants into security and confidence in respect to the Tower of London, that so they might be invited to bring in their ballion to the mint, as heretofore they have done; and we are no way guilty of the troubles, the fears, and publick dangers which make men withdraw their stocks, and to keep their money by them, to be ready for such sudden exigents, as in these great distractions we have too much cause to expect.

"3. The obstructions in the relief of Ireland. It must needs be accounted a great shame and dishonour to this Kingdom, that our neighbours have shewed themselves more forward to supply the rebels, than we have been to relieve our distressed brethren and fellow subjects. But I must declare, that we are altogether innocent of any neglect herein. As soon as the first news of the Rebellion came over, we undertook the war, not by way of supply and aid, as in former rebellions the Subjects have used to do, but we undertook the whole charge of it, and we suffered not twenty four hours to pass, before we agreed to a great levy of money and men, to be employed against the rebels, even in a larger proportion than the Lords Justices and Council there did desire; and from time to time we have done all for the furtherance thereof, though in the midst of many distractions and diversions; but the want of commission for levying of men, for issuing arms, and divers other impediments, have been the causes of that obstruction; and I wish we had not only found impediments to our selves, but also encouragements to them. Many of the chief Commanders, now in the head of the Rebels, after we had, with your Lordships concurrence, stoped the ports against the Irish Papists, have been suffered to pass by his Majesty's immediate warrant, much to the discouragement of the Lords Justices and the Council there, and thus procured, as we believe, by some evil instrument too near his regal person, without his Majesty's knowledge and intentions.

"4. The Obstruction in Prosecution of Delinquents: Many we have already brought unto your Lordships; divers others we have been discouraged to transmit; such difficult proceedings have we met withal; such terrors and discouragement have been cast upon our selves and our witnesses, and those who have shewed themselves their friends and patrons, have found it the most ready way to preferment (2); yea his Majesty's own

(1) That is to say, from the King, Queen, and Ministry. Rapin.

(2) The Lord Deputy is chiefly meant. Rapin.

"hand hath been obtained, his Majesty's ships been employed for the transporting of divers of those who have fled from the justice of the Parliament (1).

"5. A general obstruction and interruption of the proceedings of Parliament, by those manifold designs of violence (which through God's mercy we have escaped) by the great and frequent breaches of Privilege, by the subtle endeavours to raise parties in our House, and jealousies betwixt the two Houses.

"6. The obstruction in providing for the Defence of the Kingdom, that we might be enabled to resist a foreign enemy, to suppress all civil insurrections; and what a pressing necessity there is of this, the exceeding great decays in the navy, in the forts, in the power of ordering the Militia of the Kingdom, and means of furnishing them with munition, are sufficient evidences, known to none better than to your Lordships; and what endeavour we have used to remove them (but hitherto without the success and concurrence which we expect,) and where the stop hath been, and upon what good grounds, we may claim our own innocence and faithfulness in this, we desire no other witnesses but your selves.

"Lastly, I come to the evil influences which have caused this distemper, and I shall content my self to mention some few of those which are most apparent and important.

"1. In the first place, I shall remember the evil counsels about the King, whereof we have often complained. Diseases of the brain are most dangerous; because from thence sense and motion are derived to the whole body. The malignity of evil counsels will quickly be infused into all parts of the State. None can doubt but we have exceedingly laboured under most dangerous and mischievous counsels. This evil influence hath been the cause of the preparation of war with Scotland, of the procuring a rebellion in Ireland, of corrupting Religion, suppressing the liberty of this Kingdom, and of many fearful and horrid attempts, to the subverting the very being of Parliaments, which was the only hopeful means of opposing and preventing all the rest: And this doth appear to be a most predominant evil of the time; whereat we need not wonder, when we consider how counsellors have been preferred and prepared. And I appeal to your Lordships own consciences, whether the giving, and the countenancing of evil counsels, hath not been almost the only way to further advancement.

"2. The Discouragement of good Counsels. Divers honest and approved counsellors have been put from their places; others so discountenanced, as that the way of favour hath been shut against them, and that of danger and destruction only open to them.

"3. The great power that an interested and factious party hath in the Parliament, by the continuance of the votes of the Bishops and Popish Lords in your Lordships House; and the taking in of others both out of the House of Commons, and otherwise, to increase their strength.

"4. The fomenting and cherishing of a malignant party throughout the whole Kingdom.

"5. The manifold jealousies betwixt the King, his Parliament, and good Subjects, whereby his protection and favour hath in a great measure been withheld from them; their inclinations and resolution to serve and assist him, hath been very much hindered and interrupted: we have often suffered under the misinterpretation of good actions, and false imputation of evil, which we never intended. So that we may justly purge our selves from all guilt of being authors of this jealousy and misunderstanding: We have been and are still ready to serve his Majesty with our lives and fortunes, with as much cheerfulness and earnestness of affection, as ever any subjects were, and we doubt not but our proceedings will so manifest this, that we shall be as clear in the apprehension of the world, as we are in the testimony of our own consciences.

"I am now come to a conclusion, and I have nothing to propound to your Lordships by way of request or desire from the House of Commons. I doubt not but your judgments will tell you what is to be done; your consciences, your honours, your interest will call upon you for the doing of it; the Commons will be glad to have your help and concurrence in saving of the Kingdom; but if they should fail of it, it should not discourage them in doing their duty. And whether the Kingdom be lost or saved (as through God's blessing I hope it will be) they shall be sorry, that the story of this present Parliament should tell posterity, that in so great a danger and extremity, the House of Commons should be informed to save the Kingdom alone, and that "the House of Peers should have no part in the Honour of the preservation of it, you having so great an interest in the good success of those endeavours, in respect of your great estates, and high degrees of Nobility.

"My Lords, Consider what the present necessities and dangers of the Commonwealth require, what the Commons have reason to expect, to what endeavours and counsels the concurrent desires of all the People do invite you: So that applying your selves to the preservation of the King and Kingdom, I may be bold to assure you, in the name of all the Commons of England, that you shall be bravely seconded."

I thought proper to insert this whole Speech, because the resolution taken by the Commons to divest the King of great part of his Prerogatives, which they termed saving the Kingdom, manifestly appears in it. In the next place, is seen here the plan they were forming, under colour of applying a cure to the epidemical disease, whose dangers, causes and evils influences were methodically described by Mr. Pym. Though he did not explain the manner of curing it, 'twas easy to infer from his Speech, that it was necessary to prevent the dangers, remove the causes, and apply strong antidotes against the evil influences which inflamed the disease.

The first remark I shall make on this Speech, is, that it was a preparative to dispose the People to see, without surprise, the violent remedies which were intended to be used to remove a disease, that was industriously represented as almost incurable. It would be easy to show, that all the subsequent proceedings of the Commons were intimated in this long Speech, if I was not apprehensive it would lead me too far.

I shall add another remark, no less important and requisite: And that is, if the projects of the Commons had been founded only upon idle notions and chimæras, they would never have met with so many adherents ready and eager to accomplish them. Had the people of England been never oppressed, vain would have been the endeavours to persuade them to think so. Had not the King attempted to establish an arbitrary power, had not his Ministers, his Counsellors, all persons in public offices, helped to execute this design, how would it have been possible to convince the people of its reality? If the Bishops and High-Commission had not abused their power, if in order to be farther removed from the Presbyterians, they had not introduced ceremonies and innovations, wherein there was but too much affectation of imitating the Romish Religion, never could the people have been persuaded that there was a design to introduce Popery. Had the King always strictly kept his word, how would it have been practicable to inspire the People with so great a distrust of him? By what band would the Members of Parliament have been united together, in the design of lessening the King's power? How should such a thought have come into their minds? It may therefore be affirmed, that these projects were founded on very real and true facts, but which the Presbyterians artfully improved, to the accomplishment of their private ends. Nevertheless it must be owned, that most of these facts were aggravated, misinterpreted, and even inflamed with groundless insinuations.

I shall further observe, that they who say, these Petitions, presented to the House of Commons, were all begged, seem to say it very justly, or at least, with great probability. It is difficult to believe, that the people to whom these petitions were ascribed, could have used a language so agreeable to the aim and intentions of the Commons, if they had not been drawn up by persons fully informed of their designs. Indeed, in answer to this objection, it is alleged, that these Petitions were not formed upon the views of the Commons, but that the House framed their resolutions upon these Petitions, which informed them of the Nation's desires. But we do not find they ever framed their resolutions upon other Petitions, directly contrary to these, which were also presented to them from time to time, and which agreed not with their principles. On the contrary, we see that for the most part these last were rejected or not regarded by the House.

The Commons were so pleased with Mr. Pym's Speech, that Mr. Speaker was ordered to give him thanks for it, The King and desire him to print it, that it might be dispersed among the People. But the King took great offence at it, particularly, at what Mr. Pym said concerning Passes granted for Ireland, That since the stop upon the Ports against all Irish Papists, by both Houses, many of the chief Commanders, now in the head of the Rebels, have been suffered to pass by his Majesty's immediate warrant. The King said, it was a black calumny, and demanded by a message, that the House should make him a solemn reparation, and disavow what Pym had asserted; but the Commons, who were not then disposed to oblige the King, answered, that 1641-2. what Mr. Pym had said was agreeable to the sense of the House. That it was true, since the flop upon the ports by both Houses, several persons who were now commanders among the rebels, had passed into Ireland with his Majesty's immediate warrant, some of whom they named. The King replied, that these Passes were obtained whilst he was in Scotland, and before he knew of the order of Parliament, and insisted upon the vindication he had already required. The Commons answered by a declaration, maintaining what they had advanced, and adding that his Majesty's Passes were not only for those they had before named, but also for such a one (1) and his Company, for such a one (2) and four other persons. The King replied, these were only inferences drawn from the Pass-ports, which could not serve for foundation to Pym's assertion in his Speech. He insisted again upon reparation: but the Commons thought not proper to return any answer.

But this dispute between the King and the Parliament was of little importance, in comparison of another at the same time, concerning the Militia and command of the forts. But for the better understanding this affair, which is one of the principal of the present Reign, it is absolutely necessary to know what had already passed about it.

After the King's return from Scotland, it was easy for him to perceive, that the Commons intended to deprive him of great part of his authority. The Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom, presented to him at a time, when, without such a design, it seemed very needless, was as the signal of the war preparing against him. Whatever had been since done, tended to the same end, that is, to discredit the King's Government, and to impute to him sundry designs, under the name of his Counsellors, of the Papists, and of an ill-affected party. It is not very strange, that finding himself in this ill situation, he thought betimes of providing against the attacks to which he was likely to be soon exposed. But who can affirm, that if he had succeeded in putting himself in a condition to resist, he would have remained upon the defensive? However this be, the precautions he would have taken against his enemies, served but to render their accusations more plausible.

In January 1641-2, when the affair of the Members accused, and the breach of privileges, was warmly debating, the King, not knowing how it might end, formed the design of securing Hull. This place was very considerable, as well by its situation, as a large magazine of arms and ammunition (3), which could procure a great advantage to him, that should have it in his power, in case of a rupture. To this end, [William Cavendish] Earl of Newcastle, by the King's order, came to Hull under a counterfeit name (4), to consult with some of the King's friends, and amongst others with Captain Legg, how to oblige the Mayor to deliver to him the Town and Magazine, or to obtain it by force, if the Mayor would not give his consent. The secret being discovered, the Peers ordered the Earl of Newcastle to attend the service of the House, which he did, after receiving the King's pleasure, without being asked at his return, where he had been. But some days after, the Commons, as I have said, moved that Sir John Hotham might be sent to Hull, to which the Lords agreed the more readily, as they were not ignorant upon what design the Earl of Newcastle had been dispatched thither. The order was therefore given to Hotham by both Houses, to command in Hull, without the King's being acquainted with it.

Shortly after, the affair of the Militia being now commenced, the King formed once more the design of securing Hull and Portsmouth. To that purpose, Colonel Goring Governour of Portsmouth, whom the King had secretly gained, was to receive the Queen into Portsmouth, after which, he had orders to go and take the command of Hull. Probably, there was some course taken for the surrender of that place to him. This design was discovered, though it was communicated but to three persons, and the King thought not proper to pursue it, for fear of a disappointment.

If to this be added the suspicions entertained by the Parliament, that the late Assembly at Kingston was in order to surprize Portsmouth, and the Queen's intended journey thither had the same motive: that the Lieutenantcy of the Tower given to Lunsford, might be in pursuance of the King's design to secure at once the three strongest places in the Kingdom, it will not be surprising hereafter, to see the Parliament full of fears and jealousies. For though the Commons had given the King but too much reason to take precautions for his defence, these very precautions, had they succeeded, would have been no less prejudicial to the publick, than if they had been without a plausible foundation. So, as the King had reason to fear that the Parliament intended to deprive him of his authority, the Parliament had no less cause to suspect that the King was privately labouring to subdue them. In this disposition, neither the one nor the other took any step which was not suspected to cover some ill design. Consequently every thing tended to a rupture. The sole concern of both parties was to gain the people to their interest. The Parliament strenuously endeavoured it by rendering the King odious, and cherishing the fears and suspicions already infused into the people: Their aim was to convince the Nation of the necessity of extraordinary proceedings, in a case so uncommon. The King, on his part, carefully represented that the Parliament did nothing but violate the Laws, and subvert the constitution of the Government, under colour of maintaining them. Thus much it was necessary to premise, before I entered upon the affair of the Militia, that the Reader may understand the motives of the King's and the Parliament's proceedings.

Eight days after young Hotham's departure for Hull, where his Father Sir John came within a few weeks, the King sent a message to both Houses, with the following proposal:

"That they will with all speed fall into a serious consideration of all those particulars, which they should hold necessary, as well for the upholding and maintaining of his Majesty's just and regal authority, and for the settling of his Revenue, as for the present and future establishment of their privileges; the free and quiet enjoying of their estates and fortunes; the liberties of their persons; the security of the true Religion now professed in the Church of England, and the settling of ceremonies in such a manner, as may take away all just offence; which, when they shall have digested, and composed one entire body, that so his Majesty and themselves may be able to make the more clear judgment of them, it shall then appear by what his Majesty shall do, how far he hath been from intending, or designing any of those things, which the too great fears and jealousies of some persons seem to apprehend, and how ready he will be to exceed the greatest examples of the most indulgent Princes in their acts of grace and favour to their people."

It is evident the King had three views in making this proposition. The first, to find the Houses employment, and procure himself time to prepare. The second was, to know at once how far the designs of his enemies reached, which could not but be advantageous to him and injurious to them, with regard to the people. His third view was, to show his Subjects, how willing he was to consent to whatever should be capable of procuring a perfect reconciliation between him and his Parliament. As to his saying, How ready he should be, &c. it was only a general promise, liable to numberless restrictions and explications, and which properly bound him to nothing.

The Commons fully perceived the snare laid for them by the King; but they perplexed him no less by their answer to his proposition. They told him in a Petition, "That they returned to his Majesty their most humble thanks, resolving to take this message into speedy and serious consideration; and, to enable them with security to discharge their duties therein, they desired the Peers to join with them, in humbly beseeching his sacred Majesty to raise up unto them a sure ground of safety and confidence, by putting the Tower and other principal forts of the Kingdom, and the whole Militia thereof, into the hands of such persons as the Parliament might confide in, and as should be recommended unto his Majesty by both Houses of Parliament (5)."

By this answer, the Commons made a preliminary of the most important point, to be settled between the King and the Parliament, and which being granted, would have put it in the Parliament's power to do whatever they pleased. In the second place, they insinuated to the people, that the Parliament's distrust of the King, must have been grounded upon strong presumptions, since there was no way to labour a reconciliation, and settle the rights of the nation, so long as the King should be master of the forts and militia.

3611-2. The King answered, concerning the Tower of London; That having preferred a person of a known fortune, and unquestionable reputation to that trust, he did not expect he should be pressed to remove him, without any particular charge against him: That notwithstanding, if upon due examination any particular should be presented to his Majesty, whereby it might appear, that he was mistaken in his opinion of Byron, and that he was unfit for the trust committed to him, he would make no scruple of discharging him. But otherwise, he was obliged in justice to himself, to preserve his own work, left his favour and good opinion might prove a disadvantage and misfortune to his Servants, without any other accusation.

"For the Forts and Castles of the Kingdom; he was resolved they should always be in such hands, (and only such) as the Parliament might safely confide in: but the nomination of any persons to those places (being so principal and inseparable a flower of his Crown, vested in him, and derived unto him from his ancestors, by the fundamental laws of the Kingdom) he would reserve to himself: and in bestowing of them, he should not be induced to express that favour so soon to any person, as to those whose good demeanour should be eminent in, or to his Parliament; and if he should at any time confer such a trust upon an undeserving person, he would always be ready to leave him to the wisdom and justice of his Parliament.

"As for the Militia of the Kingdom, which by the Law was subject to no command, but of his Majesty, and of authority lawfully derived from him, when any particular course for the ordering the same should be considered and digested by his Parliament, and proposed to him, he would return such an answer, as should be agreeable to his honour, and the safety of his People, being resolved only to deny those things, the granting whereof would alter the fundamental Laws."

So general an answer was not capable of satisfying the Commons. Nay, it seemed to intimate very clearly, that the King would not grant what was intended to be asked, and yet he removed Sir John Byron from the Lieutenantancy of the Tower, and gave it to Sir John Conyers, recommended to him by the Commons. But this was a favour he readily granted, as it did not prejudice his rights. Nevertheless, a few days after, the following Petition was presented to him by both Houses.

To the King's most excellent Majesty, The humble Petition of the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament.

Most gracious Sovereign,

THE present evils and calamities wherewith your Kingdoms are most miserably entangled, the imminent dangers which threaten your royal person, and all your People, have caused us, your most faithful and obedient Subjects, the Lords and Commons in this present Parliament, with thankfulness to entertain, and with all earnestness of affection and endeavours to pursue, the gracious proposition and direction, which not long since we have received from your Majesty. And we have thereupon taken into our most serious consideration the ways and means of securing the safety of your royal Person, preserving the honour and authority of your Crown, removing all jealousies betwixt your Majesty and your People, suppressing the rebellion in Ireland, preventing the fears and dangers of this Kingdom, and the mischievous designs of those who are enemies to the peace of it. And that we may with more comfort and security accomplish our duties herein, we most humbly beseech your Majesty, That you will be pleased forthwith to put the Tower of London, and all other Forts, and the whole Militia of the Kingdom, into the hands of such persons as shall be recommended to your Majesty by both Houses of Parliament (1). Which they assure themselves, will be a hopeful entrance into those courses, which (through God's blessing) shall be effectual for the removing of all diffidence and misapprehension betwixt your Majesty and your People, and for establishing and enlarging the honour, greatness and power of your Majesty and royal posterity, and for the restoring and confirming the peace and happiness of your loyal Subjects in all your Dominions. And to this our most necessary Petition, we in all humility expect your Majesty's speedy and gracious answer, the great distractions and distempers of the Kingdom not admitting any delay.

The Parliament always supposed the Kingdom to be in extreme danger, and the Papists and disaffected party, or rather the King himself, to have ill designs; though, after all, their supposition was founded only upon conjectures, of which the King had given some occasion, by endeavouring to secure Hull, as the House had been well informed. The King's answer to this Petition was as follows:

His Majesty having well considered of this Petition, and being desirous to express how willing he is to apply a remedy, not only to your dangers, but even to your doubts, and fears, he therefore returns this answer, That when he shall know the extent of power, which is intended to be established in those persons whom you desire to be commanders of the Militia in the several Counties, and likewise to what time it shall be limited, that no power shall be executed by his Majesty alone, without the advice of Parliament, then he will declare, That (for the securing you from all dangers or jealousies of any) his Majesty will be content to put in all the places, both of Forts and Militia in the several Counties, such persons as both the Houses of Parliament shall either approve or recommend unto him, so that you declare before unto his Majesty the names of the persons whom you approve or recommend, unless such persons shall be named, against whom he shall have just and unquestionable exception.

The King seemed, by this answer, to grant entirely the desire of both Houses, and yet the sequel showed it was neither his intention nor thoughts. For the better understanding this answer, it will be necessary to know how the King then stood disposed. His design was to withdraw to Tork and levy troops in those parts, in order to seize Hull, with the magazine there. So that, very likely, from that time he thought of war, whether defensive or offensive. And therefore he had determined to send the Queen into Holland, under colour of conducting thither the Princess Mary her Daughter, who had espoused the Prince of Orange, and of going to the Spa. But withal, he had put into her hands the crown-jewels, which were afterwards used in buying arms and ammunition (2). When the Parliament presented this Petition to him, he was upon the point of sending away the Queen, after which he intended to retire to Tork. It was not therefore his interest absolutely to reject the Parliament's request in such a juncture, for fear of raising a storm too soon, which might have obstructed the execution of his two designs, and especially that relating to Hull. For this reason, he returned the Parliament seemingly so satisfactory an answer, but which however was not an absolute consent, because of some additional restrictions, from whence he meant to draw afterwards a pretence to render his engagement ineffectual. Nevertheless the terms of this engagement were so well chosen, that though of themselves, they signified not that the King reserved to himself a power to recede from his word, such a sense however might by inference be fixt upon them. So in the King's intention, this answer was solely designed to gain time. A few days after, he gave the Lieutenantancy of the Tower to Sir John Conyers (3), the better to persuade both Houses, he intended to satisfy them.

The Parliament did not doubt, the King was resolved to put the Militia into the hands of such as should be recommended to him. And therefore they ordered the draught of an ordinance for regulating the Militia, to be prepared, with the names of the commanders in each County, on a separate paper, and presented it to his Majesty, with a Petition to desire his consent.

The King answered, the Queen and Princess being upon their departure for Holland, he had not time to consider of so important an affair, but would send an answer at his return. He was then upon the road accompanying the Queen to Dover.

Mean while, the Parliament believing to have reason to suspect, the King only sought to amuse them, and fearing he had formed some private design, which he intended to execute before the regulation of the Militia, presented this other petition to him:

"May it please your most excellent Majesty, your humble and loyal Subjects, the Lords and Commons, have with a great deal of grief received your Majesty's answer to their just and necessary petitions, concerning the Militia of this Kingdom; which your Majesty, by a gracious message formerly sent unto them, was pleased to promise should be put into such hands as your Parliament should approve of, or recommend unto you; the extent of their power, and the time of their continuance being likewise declared. That being done, and the persons by both Houses nominated, your Majesty, nevertheless, refers your resolution herein to a longer and a very uncertain time, which (the present dangers and distractions so great and pressing) is as unsatisfactory and destructive as an absolute denial.

"Therefore we once again beseech your Majesty, to

(1) The Lieutenantancy of the Tower was not yet given to Sir John Conyers.

(2) She was reduced to so great wants, that she was compelled to coin, or sell, her Chamber-plate, for the supply of her most necessary occasions. Clarendon.

(3) February 11th, as appears by a short Message that day from the King to the House of Peers. Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 519.

1641-2. "take our desire into your royal thoughts, and to give us such an answer, as may raise in us a confidence that we shall not be exposed to the practices of those, who thirst after the ruin of this Kingdom, and the kindling of that combustion in England, which they have in so great a measure effected in Ireland; from whence (as we are daily informed,) they intend and endeavour to invade us, with the assistance of the Papists here amongst us.

"Nothing can prevent these evils, nor enable us to suppress the rebellion in Ireland, and secure ourselves, but the instant granting of that humble Petition, which we hope your Majesty will not deny to those, who must in the discharge of their duties both to your Majesty and the Commonwealth, represent unto your Majesty what they find so absolutely necessary for the preservation of both, which the Laws both of God and Man enjoin them to see put in execution, as several Counties by their daily petitions have desired of us, and in some places begun already to do it of themselves."

The Parliament wished to have the King's consent to this regulation of the Militia. This would have been advantageous to them upon all accounts. But however, in the case they supposed the Kingdom to be, they did not mean, that the King's consent was so absolutely necessary that this regulation could not be done and executed, without his approbation. And therefore to shew the King, it would be in vain to oppose it, they had so ordered it, that in some places the People had, of their own accord, divided themselves into companies, chosen officers; in a word, had begun to regulate the Militia, without staying for the King's orders. It is not likely, the People would have ventured upon such an undertaking, had they not been sure of the Parliament's approbation.

The King seeing himself thus pressed, sought other evasions to amuse the Parliament, without openly declaring however that his intention was to deny the desire of both Houses. His answer to the last petition was as follows (1):

"His Majesty having, with his best care and understanding, perused and considered, that which was sent him from both Houses, for the ordering of the Militia, presented unto him to be made an ordinance of Parliament, by the giving of his Royal assent; as he can by no means do it for the reasons hereafter mentioned, so he doth not conceive himself obliged, by any promise made in his answer of the second of this month to the petition of both Houses, to yield the same.

"His Majesty finds great cause to except against the preface or introduction to that order, which confesseth a most dangerous and desperate design upon the House of Commons, of late supposed to be an effect of the bloody counsels of Papists and other ill-affected persons, by which many may understand (looking upon other printed Papers to that purpose,) his coming in person to the House of Commons on the 4th of January, which begat so unhappy a misunderstanding between him and his People; and for that, though he believes it upon the information since given, to be an apparent breach of their Privilege, and hath offered to repair the same for the future, by any act that shall be desired of his Majesty, yet he must declare, and require to be believed, that he had no other design upon that House, or any Member of it, than to require (as he did) the persons of those five Gentlemen his Majesty had the day before accused of High-Treason; and to declare, that he meant to proceed against them legally and speedily, upon which he believes that House would have delivered them up; and his Majesty calls the Almighty God to witness, that he was so far from any intention or thought of force or violence; although that House had not delivered them according to his demand, or in any case whatsoever, that he gave those his Servants, and others, that waited on his Majesty, express charge and command, that they should give no offence to any man; nay, if they received any provocation or injury, that they should bear it without return; and his Majesty neither saw or knew, that any person of his train had any other weapons, but his pensioners and guards those with which they usually attend his Majesty, and the other Gentlemen, swordsmen. And therefore his Majesty doubts not, but his Parliament will be respectful of his honour herein, that he shall not undergo any imputation, by the rash or indelicate expressions of any young men then in his train, or by any desperate words uttered by others, who might mingle with them without his consent or approbation.

"For the persons nominated to be Lieutenants of the several Counties of England and Wales, his Majesty is contented to allow that recommendation; only concerning the City of London, and such corporations, as by

"antient charters have granted unto them the power of the Militia, his Majesty doth not conceive, that it can stand with justice or polity to alter their Government in that particular.

"And his Majesty is willing forthwith to grant every of them, (that of London, and those other corporations excepted,) such commissions, as he hath done during this Parliament, to some Lord-Lieutenants by your advice; but if that power be not thought enough, but that more shall be thought fit to be granted to those persons named, than by the law is in the Crown it self; His Majesty holds it reasonable, that the same be by law first vested in him, with power to transfer it to those persons, which he will willingly do; and whatever that power shall be, to avoid all future doubts and questions, his Majesty desires, it may be digested into an Act of Parliament rather than an ordinance; so that all his loving Subjects may thereby particularly know, both what they are to suffer, and what they are not to suffer, for their neglect, that there be not the least latitude for his good Subjects to suffer under any arbitrary power whatever.

"As to the time desired for the continuance of the powers to be granted, his Majesty giveth this answer, that he cannot consent to devest himself of the just power, which God and the Laws of this Kingdom have placed in him for the defence of his People, and to put it into the hands of any other for any indefinite time.

"And since the ground of this request from his Parliament, was to secure their present fears and jealousies, that they might with safety apply themselves to the matter of his message of the 20th of January: His Majesty hopeth, that his grace to them, since that time, in yielding to so many of their desires, and in agreeing to the persons now recommended to him by his Parliament, and the power before expressed to be placed in them, will wholly dispel those fears and jealousies; and assure them, that as his Majesty hath now applied this unusual remedy to their doubts, so (if there shall be cause) he will continue the same, to such time as shall be agreeable to the same care he now expresseth toward them.

"And in this answer, his Majesty is so far from receding from any thing he promised, or intended to grant in his answer to the former petition; that his Majesty hath hereby consented to all was then asked of them by that petition concerning the Militia of the Kingdom, (except that of London, and those other corporations) which was to put the same into the hands of such persons as should be recommended unto him by both Houses of Parliament: And his Majesty doubts not, but the Parliament upon well weighing the particulars of this his answer, will find the same more satisfactory to their ends, and the peace and welfare of all his good Subjects, than the way proposed by this intended ordinance, to which, for these reasons his Majesty cannot consent.

"And whereas his Majesty observes by the petition of both Houses, presented to him by the Earl of Portland, Sir Thomas Heal, and Sir William Savile, that in some places some persons begin already to intermeddle of themselves with the Militia, his Majesty expecteth that his Parliament should examine the particulars thereof, it being a matter of high concernment and very great consequence.

"And his Majesty requireth, that if it shall appear to his Parliament, that any persons whatsoever have presumed to command the Militia without lawful authority, they may be proceeded against according to law."

There were in this answer, several things which could not but displease the Parliament. 1. The exception of London and such other corporations, as by Charters had the power of the Militia, which was taking away with one hand, what he seemed to give with the other, since there were very few Towns of any note, but what had the like Charters. Besides, it did not appear that either London or any other Corporation desired to be maintained in this privilege. The King supposed it without consulting them. 2. The King, in complaining there was no fixed time for the continuance of the powers of the Lieutenants, offered none himself. So it was a point to be debated which might long amuse. 3. As to his promising to prolong the time, if there should be cause, it was properly nothing, since it is certain his general promises were not relied on, especially when attended with such restrictions. 4. The King did not mention the Government of the forts, which was however a point of great moment. 5. He absolutely rejected the ordinance, and in persuading the Parliament to change it into an Act, he would have indi-

In suppressing the ordinance and turning it into an Act, the Bill must have been drawn his own way, otherwise, he tacitly referred to himself the power of rejecting it, a power that hitherto had been indisputable. It was therefore very easy to perceive, that by all these restrictions the King fought only to gain time, and put off the Parliament with bare words. Accordingly both Houses having taken his answer into consideration, voted that it was not satisfactory, and presented a third Petition to him at Thetford, where he then was.

Most gracious Sovereign,

*Desired of both Houses of the King,
March 1.

IV. p. 323.
Clarendon,
T. I. p. 343.*

YOUR Majesty's most loyal and obedient Subjects, the Lords and Commons in Parliament, do find their just apprehensions of sorrow and fear, in respect of the public dangers and miseries like to fall upon your Majesty and the Kingdom, to be much increased, upon the receipt of your unexpected denial of their most humble and necessary Petition, concerning the Militia of the Kingdom, especially grieving, that wicked and mischievous Counsellors should still have that power with your Majesty, as in this time of imminent and approaching ruin, rather to incline your resolutions to that which is apt to further the accomplishment of the desires of the most malignant enemies of God's true Religion, and the peace and safety of your self and your Kingdom, than to the dutiful and faithful Counsel of your Parliament: Wherefore they are enforced in all humility to protest, that if your Majesty shall persist in that denial, the dangers and distempers of the Kingdom are such as will endure no longer delay: But unless you shall be graciously pleased to assure them by these messengers, that you will speedily apply your royal assent to the satisfaction of their former desires, they shall be enforced, for the safety of your Majesty and your Kingdom, to dispose of the Militia by the authority of both Houses, in such manner as hath been propounded to your Majesty, and they resolve to do it accordingly.

They likewise most humbly beseech your Majesty to believe, that the dangerous and desperate design upon the House of Commons, mentioned in their preamble, was not inferred with any intention to cast the least aspersion upon your Majesty, but herein they reflected upon that malignant party, of whose bloody and malicious practices they have had so often experience, and from which they can never be secure, unless your Majesty will be pleased to put from you those wicked and unfaithful Counsellors, who interpose their own corrupt and malicious designs betwixt your Majesty's goodness and wisdom, and the prosperity and contentment of your self, and of your people: And that for the dispatch of the great affairs of the Kingdom, the safety of your person, the protection and comfort of your Subjects, you will be pleased to continue your abode near to London, and the Parliament, and not to withdraw your self to any the remoter parts: which if your Majesty should do, must needs be a cause of great danger and distraction (1).

That your Majesty will likewise be graciously pleased to continue the Prince his Highness in these parts at St. James's, or any other of your Houses near London (2), whereby the designs which the enemies of the Religion and Peace of this Kingdom may have upon his person, and the jealousies and fears of your people, may be prevented. And they beseech your Majesty to be informed by them, that by the Laws of the Kingdom, the power of raising, ordering, and disposing of the Militia, within any City, Town, or other place, cannot be granted to any Corporation by Charter, or otherwise, without the authority and consent of Parliament; and that those parts of the Kingdom which have put themselves in a posture of defence against the common danger, have therein done nothing but according to the Declaration and direction of both Houses, and what is justifiable by the Laws of the Kingdom.

All which, their most humble Counsel and desires, they pray your Majesty to accept, as the effect of that duty and allegiance which they owe unto you, and which will not suffer them to admit of any thoughts, intentions, or endeavours, but such as are necessary and advantageous for your Majesty's greatness and honour, and the safety and prosperity of the Kingdom, according to that trust and power which the Laws have reposed in them."

Before I relate the King's answer, it will not be improper to make some remarks on this Petition. My design being in this second part of the Reign of Charles I., to give the Readers a true idea of the differences between the King and the Parliament, that they may the better perceive the real grounds of the ensuing Civil Wars, I hope it will not be taken amiss, that by remarks on the Papers of both sides, I point out some things which perhaps would not be generally observed.

In the first place, the imminent danger, the approaching ruin so much talked of by the Parliament, was not so evident as they pretended. But they always supposed, there was a Popish and malignant party, who had formed a design to ruin the Kingdom and the Protestant Religion, and that the King's evil Counsellors advised him to whatever could be advantageous to that party. I do not say this supposition was entirely false: But it may be said at least to be grounded upon bare conjectures. Besides, these were only Generals, under which the Parliament concealed the true cause of their fears. They were apprehensive, that the King by secret practices, would secure the forts and magazines, as it was well known he intended it, and raise an army. Nay, it could not be doubted, that considering his present state, he would have done it, had it been in his power. It will be seen hereafter that he had thought of it, before the time I am speaking of. But when this Petition was presented to him, he was only suspected to have some great design in hand. He was therefore to be prevented by disposing of the Militia, by the authority of both Houses, in order to be ready to oppress such as should declare for him, or to hinder them from declaring. But all this was coloured with the pretence of putting the Kingdom in a posture of defence against the plots of the malignants. For this reason, the pretended design of this malignant party was always expressed in general terms, without mention of any particulars, and great care was taken to refer to it all the King's actions, and all the events which could have any relation thereto. But it must be remembered, as I have often said, that the Parliament's intention was to divert the King of the greatest part of his authority, and that the King's design was to screen himself from the impending misfortunes, and in so doing, he would have put himself also in a state of attacking, had he been suffered to do it. This is properly the Key to the Papers which were published on both sides, concerning the Militia, though the King and Parliament endeavoured to varnish their respective proceedings with pretences capable of dazzling the people.

I shall remark in the second place, that the Parliament in this Petition, took no notice of the reasons alledged by the King in his former answer. They were contented with always supposing the design of subverting Religion and the Laws, and with referring to that design the removal of the Prince of Wales, and the absence of the King from his Parliament, to insinuate, that the King's restrictions to his promise, were intended only to gain time, in order to favour the malignants.

Thirdly, the Parliament's fears, that the King's absence concealed some hidden design, were not groundless, as I said, and as will appear hereafter.

All this shows, that the King and the Parliament had but too much cause to mistrust one another. If the Parliament, under colour of imminent danger to the Kingdom, thought it incumbent on them to require, that the Militia should be put into such hands as they could confide in, the King had no less reason to endeavour to hinder both Houses from usurping a power, which was to serve to oppress him.

The King returned the following answer to the Parliament's last Petition:

"I am so much amazed at this message, that I know not what to answer: You speak of jealousies and fears: Lay your hands to your hearts, and ask your selves, whether I may not likewise be disturbed with fears and jealousies: And if so, I assure you this message hath nothing lessened them.
"For the Militia, I thought so much of it before I sent that answer, and am so much assured, that the answer is agreeable to what in justice or reason you can ask, or I in honour grant, that I shall not alter it in any point.
"For my residence near you, I wish it might be so safe and honourable, that I had no cause to absent myself from Whitehall; ask your selves whether I have not.
"For my Son, I shall take that care of him, which shall justify me to God as a Father, and to my Dominions as a King."

(1) Before the King left London, Sir Richard Gurney Lord-Mayor, and some of the principal Citizens, waited upon him, and engaged, if he would stay, to guard him with ten thousand Men. If occasion were, and told him, if he went, he would leave the City open for the Members to go as they pleased, and that they were sure to be with him; the King told them, he was resolved. R. Cole, p. 341.
(2) The King, upon his coming to Greenwich, had sent to William Seymour, Marquis of Hertford (lately made Governor to the Prince, in the room of the Earl of Newcastle), to bring the Prince to him, at which the Parliament it seems took exception. Clarendon, Tom. I. p. 333, 340.

1641-2. "To conclude, I assure you upon my honour, that I have no thought but of peace and justice to my People, which I shall by all fair means seek to preserve and maintain, relying upon the goodness and providence of God, for the preservation of my self and rights."

Remark on this answer

It must be observed upon this answer, that the reason alleged by the King to justify his absence from Whitehall, namely, the riotous assemblies of the people of London, was plausible. But it was extremely weak, to prove the necessity of his residing at York. However, he artfully confounded, under one and the same reason, his removal to York, and his absence from London. We shall see presently the true reason of his retiring to York.

2. It is very likely, the King wished for peace, provided his Prerogatives were untouched. But the Parliament thought, in order to a lasting peace, the King's power was to be curbed.

Upon this answer, it was resolved by the House of Commons:

Notes of the Commons.

Rothw. rth.

IV. p. 524.

Clarendon,

T. I. p. 345.

"1. That this answer of his Majesty is a denial to the desires of both Houses of Parliament concerning the Militia.

"2. That those that advised his Majesty to give this answer, are enemies to the State, and mischievous projectors against the defence of the Kingdom.

"3. That this denial is of that dangerous consequence, that if his Majesty shall persist in it, it will hazard the peace and safety of all his Kingdoms, unless some speedy remedy be applied by the wisdom and authority of both Houses of Parliament.

"4. That such parts of this Kingdom as have put themselves into a posture of defence against the common danger, have done nothing but what is justifiable, and is approved by the House.

"5. That if his Majesty shall remove into any remote parts from his Parliament, it will be a great hazard to the Kingdom, and a great prejudice to the proceedings of the Parliament.

"6. That this House holds it necessary, that his Majesty may be desired, that the Prince may come unto St. James's, or to some other convenient place near or about London, and there to continue.

"7. That the Lords be desired to join with this House in an humble request unto his Majesty, that he will be pleased to reside near his Parliament, that both Houses may have a convenience of access unto him upon all occasions.

"8. That the Lords be moved to join with this House in some fit course of examination, to find who were the persons that gave his Majesty this advice, that they may be removed from his Majesty, and brought to condign punishment.

"9. That no Charter can be granted by the King, to create a power in any Corporation over the Militia of that place, without consent of Parliament.

"10. That the Lords shall be moved to join with this House in these votes.

"11. That the Lords shall be desired to appoint a select Committee, that may join with a Committee of a proportionable number of this House, to consider and prepare what is fit to be done upon these votes, or upon any thing else that may arise upon this answer of his Majesty concerning the Militia, and concerning the Prince.

The same day it was resolved in the House of Commons,

"That the Kingdom be forthwith put into a posture of defence, by authority of both Houses, in such a way as is already agreed upon by both Houses of Parliament."

In pursuance of this resolution, both Houses published the following Ordinance for settling the Militia.

"Whereas there hath been of late a most dangerous and desperate design upon the House of Commons, which we have just cause to believe to be an effect of the bloody counsels of Papists, and other ill-affected persons, who have already raised a rebellion in the Kingdom of Ireland, and by reason of many discoveries, we cannot but fear they will proceed not only to stir up the like rebellion and insurrections in this Kingdom of England, but also to back them with forces from abroad.

"For the safety therefore of his Majesty's person, the Parliament and Kingdom, in this time of imminent danger; It is ordained by the Lords and Commons now in Parliament assembled, That Henry Earl of Holland shall be Lieutenant of the County of Berks, Oliver Earl of Bullingbrook shall be Lieutenant of the County of Bedford, &c. and the said Lord Lieutenants shall severally and respectively have power to assemble and call together all and singular his Majesty's Subjects, within the said several and respective counties and places, as well within liberties as without, that are meet and fit

"for the wars, and them to train and exercise, and put in readiness, and them, after their abilities and faculties, well and sufficiently from time to time, to cause to be arrayed and weaponed, and to take the muster of them in places fit for that purpose. And that they shall severally and respectively have power, within the several and respective counties and places aforesaid, to nominate and appoint such persons of quality, as to them shall seem meet, to be their Deputy-Lieutenants, to be approved of by both Houses of Parliament. And be it further ordained, That Sir John Goyre, Sir Jacob Garra, Knights, &c. shall have such power and authority within the City of London, as any of the Lieutenants before-named, are authorized to have by this ordinance, within the said several and respective Counties, (the nomination and appointment of Deputy-Lieutenants only excepted.) And it is further ordained, That such persons as shall not obey in any of the premises, shall answer their neglect and contempt to the Lords and Commons in a parliamentary way, and not otherwise, nor elsewhere; and that every the powers granted as aforesaid, shall continue, until it be otherwise ordered or declared by both Houses of Parliament, and no longer."

These forces from abroad, mentioned in the ordinance, were a chimera, framed to amuse the People, and make them believe, the King would cause the Kingdom to be invaded by foreigners. For though, very probably, the Pope and Cardinal Richieu countenanced the Irish Rebellion, it could not however be affirmed, they had formed a design to invade England in favour of the King.

March the 9th, the King being at Newmarket, both Houses presented the following Declaration to him, which served for reply to his answer.

Declaration of both Houses presented to the King at Newmarket, March 9. 1641-2.

May it please your Majesty,

"Although the expressions in your Majesty's message, of the 2d of this instant March, do give just cause of sorrow to us, your faithful Subjects, the Lords and Commons in Parliament, yet it is not without some mixture of confidence and hope, considering they proceeded from the misapprehension of our actions and intentions, which having no ground of truth or reality, may, by your Majesty's justice and wisdom, be removed, when your Majesty shall be fully informed, that those fears and jealousies of ours, which your Majesty thinks to be causeless, and without any just ground, do necessarily and clearly arise from those dangers and distempers, into which the mischievous and evil counsels about you have brought this Kingdom; and that those other fears and jealousies, by which your favour, your royal presence and confidence have been withdrawn from your Parliament, have no foundation or subsistence in any action, intention, or miscarriage of ours, but are merely grounded upon the falshood and malice of those who, for the supporting and fomenting their own wicked designs against the religion and peace of the Kingdom, do seek to deprive your Majesty of the strength and affection of your People, them of your grace and protection, and thereby to subject both your royal person and the whole Kingdom to ruin and destruction.

"To satisfy your Majesty's judgment and conscience in both these points, we desire to make a clear and free declaration of the causes of our fears and jealousies; which we offer to your Majesty in these particulars:

"1. That the design of altering Religion in this, and in your other Kingdoms, hath been potently carried on by those in greatest authority about you, for divers years together: the Queen's agent at Rome, and the Pope's agent or nuncio here, are not only evidences of this design, but have been great actors in it.

"2. That the war with Scotland was procured to make way for this intent, and chiefly invited and fomented by the Papists, and others popishly affected, whereof we have many evidences, especially their free and general contribution to it.

"3. That the rebellion in Ireland was framed and contrived here in England, and that the English Papists should have risen about the same time, we have several testimonies and advertisements from Ireland; and that it is a common speech amongst the rebels, wherewith concur other evidences and observations of the suspicious meetings and consultations, the tumultuary and seditious carriage of those of that Religion, in divers parts of this Kingdom, about the time of the breaking out of the Irish rebellion; the deposition of O Conelly; the information of Mr. Cole, Minister; the letter of Tristram Whitcombe; the deposition of Thomas Grant, and many others, which we may produce, do all agree in this: The publick declarations of the Lords, Gentlemen, and 1641-2. "others of the Pale, that they would join with the rebels, whom they call the Irish army, or any other, to recover unto his Majesty his royal prerogative, wrested from him by the Puritan faction in the Houses of Parliament in England, and to maintain the same against all others, as also to maintain Episcopal Jurisdiction, and the lawfulness thereof: These two being quarrels, upon which his Majesty's late army in the North should be incited against us.

"The great cause we have to doubt, that that late design, filed the Queen's pious intention, was for the alteration of Religion in this Kingdom; for success whereof, the Pope's Nuncio, the Count Rejetti, enjoyed fasting and praying to be observed every week by the English Papists, which appeared to us, by one of the original letters, directed by him to a Priest in Lancashire.

"The boldness of the Irish rebels in affirming they do nothing but by authority from the King; that they call themselves the Queen's army; that the prey or booty which they take from the English they mark with the Queen's mark; that their purpose was to come to England after they had done in Ireland, and sundry other things of this kind, proved by O Conelly, and divers others, especially in the fore-mentioned letters from Tristram Whitcombe, the Mayor of Kingsale, to his brother Benjamin Whitcomb, wherein there is this passage, that many other strange Speeches they utter about Religion and our Court of England, which he dares not commit to paper.

"The manifold attempts to provoke your Majesty's late army, and the army of the Scots, and to raise a faction in the city of London, and other parts of the Kingdom; that those who have been actors in those businesses, have had their dependance, their countenance and encouragement from the Court; witness the treason whereof Mr. Jermin and others stand accused, who was transported beyond Sea, by warrant under your Majesty's hand, after your Majesty had given assurance to your Parliament, that your Majesty had laid a strict command upon all your servants, that none of them should depart from Court; and that dangerous Petition delivered to Captain Legg by your Majesty's own hand, accompanied with a direction signed with G. R.

"The false and scandalous accusation against the Lord Kimbolton, and the five Members of the House of Commons, tendered to the Parliament by your Majesty's own command, endeavoured to be justified in the city by your own presence and persuasion, and to be put in execution upon their persons by your Majesty's demand of them in the House of Commons, in so terrible and violent a manner, as far exceeded all former breaches of privileges of Parliament acted by your Majesty or any of your predecessors; and whatsoever your intentions were, divers bloody and desperate persons which attended your Majesty, discovered their affections and resolutions to have massacred and destroyed the Members of that House, if the absence of those persons accused, had not, by God's providence, stopped the giving of that word which they expected, for the setting them upon that barbarous and bloody act; the lifting of so many officers and soldiers, and others, putting them into pay, and under command of Colonels; feasting and carousing them in an unusual manner at Whitehall, thereby maintaining them in the violent assaults and other injuries which they offered to divers of your Subjects, coming that way in a lawful and peaceable manner; the carrying them out of town, after which they were told by the Lord Digby, that the King removed on purpose that they might not be trampled in the dirt; and keeping them so long in pay, endeavouring to engage the Gentlemen of the Inns of Court in the same course; the plotting and designing of a perpetual guard about your Majesty; the labouring to infuse into your Majesty's Subjects an evil opinion of the Parliament through the whole Kingdom, and other symptoms of a disposition of raising arms, and dividing your people by a civil War; in which combustion Ireland must needs be lost, and this Kingdom miserably wasted and consumed, if not wholly ruined and destroyed.

"That after a vote had passed in the House of Commons, declaring, that the Lord Digby had appeared in a warlike manner at Kington upon Thames, to the terror and fright of your Majesty's good Subjects, and disturbance of the public peace of the Kingdom; and that therefore the Lords should be moved to require his attendance, he should nevertheless be of that credit with your Majesty, as to be sent away by your own warrant to Sir John Pennington, to land him beyond the sea, from whence he vented his own traitorous conceptions, that your Majesty should declare your self, and retire to a place of strength in this Kingdom, as if your Majesty could not be safe among your people; and withal took that transcendent boldness to write to the Queen, offering to entertain correspondence with her Majesty by cyphers, intimating some service which he might do in those parts, for which he desired your Majesty's instructions, whereby in probability he intended the procuring of some foreign force to strengthen your Majesty in that condition, into which he would have brought you; which false and malicious counsel and advice, we have great cause to doubt, made too deep an impression in your Majesty, considering the course you are pleased to take of abetting your self from your Parliament, and carrying the Prince with you, which seems to express a purpose in your Majesty, to keep your self in a readiness for the acting of it.

"The manifold advertisements which we have had from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts, that they still expect, that your Majesty has some great design in hand, for the altering of Religion, the breaking the neck of your Parliament, that you will yet find means to compass that design; that the Pope's Nuncio hath solicited the Kings of France, and Spain, to lend you Majesty four thousand men a-piece, to help to maintain your Royalty against the Parliament; and this foreign force, as it is the most pernicious and malignant design of all the rest, so we hope it is, and shall always be farthest from your Majesty's thoughts, because no man can believe, you will give up your People and Kingdom, to be spoiled by strangers, if you did not likewise intend to change both your own profession in Religion, and the public profession of the Kingdom, that so you might still be more assured of those foreign States of the popish Religion, for your future support and defence.

"These are some of the grounds of our fears and jealousies, which make us so earnestly to implore your Royal authority and protection for our defence and security, in all the ways of humility and submission, which being denied by your Majesty, seduced by evil Counsel, we do with sorrow, for the great and unavoidable misery and danger, which thereby is like to fall upon your own person, and your Kingdoms, apply our selves to the use of that power, for the security and defence of both, which by the fundamental laws and constitutions of this Kingdom resides in us; yet still resolving to keep our selves within the bounds of faithfulness and allegiance to your sacred person, and your Crown; so as to the second sort of jealousies and fears of us expressed by your Majesty, we shall give a shorter, but as true and as faithful an answer.

"Whereas your Majesty is pleased to say, that for your residence near the Parliament, you wish it may be so safe and honourable, that you had no cause to absent your self from Whitehall; this we take as the greatest breach of privilege of Parliament that can be offered, as the heaviest misery to your self, and imputation upon us, that can be imagined, and the most mischievous effects of evil counsels: It roots up the strongest foundation of the safety and honour which your Crown affords; it seems as much as may be to cast upon the Parliament such a charge, as is inconsistent with the nature of that great Council, being the body, whereof your Majesty is the head; it strikes at the very being both of King and Parliament, depriving your Majesty, in your own apprehensions, of their fidelity, and them of your protection, which are the mutual bands and supports of Government and Subjection.

"We have, according to your Majesty's desire, laid our hands upon our hearts; we have asked our selves in the strictest examination of our consciences; we have searched our affections, our thoughts; considered our actions, and we find none that can give your Majesty any just occasion to absent your self from Whitehall, and the Parliament; but that you may with more honour and safety, continue there than in any other place.

"Your Majesty lays a general tax upon us; if you will be graciously pleased to let us know the particulars, we shall give a clear and satisfactory answer; but what hope can we have of ever giving your Majesty satisfaction, when those particulars which you have been made to believe were true, yet being produced, and made known to us, appeared to be false, and your Majesty notwithstanding, will neither punish, nor produce the authors, but go on to contract new jealousies and fears upon general and uncertain grounds, affording us no means or possibility of particular answers to the clearing of our selves? For proof whereof, we beseech your Majesty to consider these instances:

"The Speeches alleged to be spoken in a meeting of divers Members of both Houses at Kensington, concerning a papal order restraining the Queen and France, which 641-2. "which after it was denied and disavowed, yet your Majesty refused to name the authors, though humbly desired by both Houses.

"The report of Articles framed against the Queen's Majesty, given out by some of near relation to the Court; but when it was publicly and constantly disclaimed, the credit seemed to be withdrawn from it; but the authors being kept safe, will always be ready for exploits of the same kind, wherewith your Majesty and the Queen will be often troubled, if this course be taken to cherish and secure them in such wicked and malicious slanders.

"The heavy charge and accusation of the Lord Kimbolton, and the five Members of the House of Commons, who refused no trial or examination, which might stand with the privilege of Parliament; yet no authors, no witnesses produced, against whom they may have reparation, for the great injury and infamy cast upon them; notwithstanding three several petitions of both Houses, and the authority of two Acts of Parliament, vouched in the last of those Petitions.

"We beseech your Majesty to consider in what State you are, how easy and fair a way you have to happiness, honour, greatness, plenty, and security; if you will join with the Parliament, and your faithful Subjects, in defence of the Religion and publick good of the Kingdom. This is all we expect from you, and for this we shall return to you our lives, fortunes, and uttermost endeavours to support your Majesty, your just sovereignty and power over us; but it is not words that can secure us in these our humble desires: We cannot but too well, and sorrowfully remember, what gracious messages we had from you this summer, when with your privacy, bringing up the army was in agitation; we cannot but with the like affections recall to your minds, how, not two days before you gave directions for the above-mentioned accusation, and your own coming to the Commons House; that House received from your Majesty a gracious message, that you would always have a care of their privileges, as of your own prerogative, of the safety of their persons, as of your own children. That which we expect, which will give us assurance that you have no thought but of peace and justice to your People, must be some real effect of your goodness to them, in granting those things, which the present necessity of the Kingdom doth enforce us to desire: And in the first place, that your Majesty will be graciously pleased to put from you those wicked and mischievous counsellors, which have caused all these dangers and distractions, and to continue your own residence, and the Prince's, near London, and the Parliament, which we hope will be a happy beginning of contentment and confidence betwixt your Majesty and your People, and be followed with many succeeding blessings of honour and greatness to your Majesty, and of security and prosperity to them.

"The Lords and Commons have commanded us to present unto your Majesty, this farther addition to their former declaration.

"That your Majesty's return and continuance near the Parliament, is a matter in their apprehension of so great necessity and importance, toward the preservation of your royal person and your Kingdoms, that they cannot think they have discharged their duties, in the single expression of their desire, unless they add some farther reasons to back it with.

"1. Your Majesty's absence will cause men to believe, that it is out of design to discourage the undertakers, and hinder the other provisions for raising money for defence of Ireland.

"2. It will very much hearten the rebels there, and distressed persons in this Kingdom, as being an evidence and effect of the jealousies and divisions betwixt your Majesty and your People.

"3. That it will much weaken and withdraw the affection of the Subjects from your Majesty, without which a Prince is deprived of his chiefest strength and lustre, and left naked to the greatest dangers and miseries, that can be imagined.

"4. That it will invite and encourage the enemies of our Religion, and the States in foreign parts, to the tempting and acting their evil designs and intentions towards us.

"5. That it causeth a great interruption in the proceedings of Parliament.

"These considerations threaten so great danger to your Majesty's person, and to all your Dominions, that, as your Majesty's great Council, they hold it necessary to represent to you this their faithful advice, that so what"soever followeth, they may be excused before God and man."

It is needless to make any particular remarks on this Declaration. The following answers and replies, will best explain the nature of the quarrel between the King and the Parliament, and the arguments of both.

It must only be observed in general, that, according to the custom of contending Parties, each insisted largely upon the points that were favorable, and lightly touched upon such as were disadvantageous, or even passed them over entirely in their answers and replies.

Thus much is certain, that in the present situation of affairs, the King and the Parliament had but too much cause to mistrust one another, and that each laboured to procure such advantages, as might enable them to attack or defend. As for the declarations, messages, answers, replies, these were only for the people, it being the interest of each to gain and amuse them. But herein the Parliament had a great advantage, by reason of the People's prejudice against the King, to which he opposed only general promises, whereof he could give no assurance. This was very advantageous to the Parliament, who pretended, that in order to trust in such promises, it was necessary the King should begin with divesting himself of what enabled him to break them. Hence may be seen, how perplexed this affair was.

When the Committees of both Houses presented to the King the foregoing Declaration, and after it was read in his presence, he returned this extempore general answer.

"I Am confident that you expect not I should give you ^{The King's Answer given on March 9.} a speedy answer to this strange and unexpected Declaration; and I am sorry (in the distraction of this Kingdom) you should think this way of address to be more convenient, than that proposed by my message of the 20th of January last, to both Houses. ^{Rushworth, IV. p. 532. Clarendon, T. I. p. 312.}

"As concerning the grounds of your fears and jealousies, I will take time to answer particularly, and doubt not but I shall do it to the satisfaction of all the world. God in his good time, will, I hope, discover the secrets and bottoms of all plots and treasons; and then I shall stand right in the eyes of my people; in the mean time I must tell you, that I rather expected a vindication for the imputation laid on me in Mr. Pym's Speech, than that any more general rumours and discourses should get credit with you.

"For my fears and doubts, I did not think they should have been thought so groundless or trivial, while so many seditious pamphlets and sermons are looked upon, and so great tumults are remembered, unquished, unquered into: I still confess my fears, and call God to witness, that they are greater for the true Protestant profession (1), my people, and laws, than for my own rights or safety; though I must tell you, I conceive that none of these are free from danger.

"What would you have? Have I violated your Laws? Have I denied to pass any Bill for the ease and security of my Subjects? I do not ask you, what you have done for me.

"Have any of my People been transported with fears and apprehensions? I have offered as free and general pardon, as your selves can devise. All this considered, there is a judgment from Heaven upon this nation, if these distractions continue.

"God to deal with me and mine, as all my thoughts and intentions are upright, for the maintenance of the true Protestant profession, and for the observation and preservation of the Laws of this land; and I hope God will bless and assist those Laws for my preservation.

"As for the additional Declaration, you are to expect an answer to it, when you shall receive the answer to the Declaration itself."

On the morrow, the King gave the general answer to the Committee in writing, which he had delivered by word of mouth the day before. ^{The King gives the Answer by word of mouth.}

After that, the Earl of Pembroke, one of the Committee, asking him, whether he would grant the Militia, as was desired by the Parliament, for a time? No, answered the King, by God, not for an hour (2). This answer did him great injury. His principal concern was to satisfy the People, that his word might be relied upon, and yet he showed he had no intention to keep his promise to the Parliament, to grant the Militia, when he should know for how long a term, since he refused to grant it even for an hour. ^{Rushworth, IV. p. 533. The King's reply Answer to the Earl of Pembroke. Ibid. Clarendon, T. I. p. 312.}

If the Parliament had hitherto placed but little confidence in the King's promises, this did not help to increase it. On the other hand, the harsh and disrespectful treatment of the King by both Houses, in their Declaration,

(1) He meant the Church of England, in opposition to Presbyterianism. Rapin.

(2) Adding, You have asked that of me in this, was never asked of any King, and with which I will not trust my Wife and Children. Rushworth, Tom. 4. p. 533.

very much incensed him, and rendered a rupture unavoidable. For my part, I verily believe, that the hard things said by the Parliament to the King, in the Declaration, were inferted by the direction of some of the leaders of the party, on purpose to widen the breach, and make a reconciliation impracticable. For, it is to be presumed, if the King had then granted the Militia for two or three months, both Houses would have scarce known what use to have made of it. They would have had no pretence to employ it against him, since he would have clearly showed, it was not his fault that their fears were not removed. But it is certain, he had to deal with abler heads than himself, and his Council. Besides, he was then full of his design to seize Hull, which hindered him, doubtless, from seriously attending to what was most for his advantage.

Dec. 10

Yorks.

Romworth,

IV. p. 533.

Clarendon,

T. I. p. 353.

March the 15th, the King being at Huntington, sent a message to both Houses, to inform them, that he intended to reside at Tork for some time. He recommended to them withal the affairs of Ireland. As to the Militia, he told them, "That as he had always been so tender of the privileges of Parliament, that he had been ready and forward to retract any act of his own, which he had been informed had trench upon their privileges; so he expected an equal tenderness in them, of his known and unquestionable privileges; amongst which, he was assured it is a fundamental one, that his Subjects cannot be obliged to obey any Act, Order, or Injunction, to which his Majesty hath not given his consent: That therefore, he expected and required obedience from all his Subjects, to the Laws established, being resolved to keep the Laws himself, and to require obedience to them from all his Subjects."

Next day, the Commons passed the following Votes, which were approved by the Lords.

"That the House should insist upon their former Votes concerning the Militia.

"That the King's absence, so far remote from his Parliament, was not only an obstruction, but might be a destruction to the affairs of Ireland.

"That when the Parliament (a), which is the supreme Court of Judicature in the Kingdom, shall declare what the Law of the Land is, to have this not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted; and a command, that it should not be obeyed, is a high breach of the privilege of Parliament. (1.)

REMARK (1.) The Commons use here the equivocal Word [Parliament] in an improper sense. It is true, the Parliament which consists of the King and the two Houses, has a right to declare what is Law; to make New and repeal Old Laws, because the Authority of both Houses, with the royal assent, is deemed the authority of the whole Kingdom. But before now, the two Houses alone had never enjoyed this Right. Nay, in strictness, the two Houses cannot be called the Parliament, because the Parliament is a body composed of three Members, and not two only, [namely, King, Lords, and Commons.]

"That a Committee shall be appointed by the House to join with a Committee of Lords, to enquire where this message was framed.

"That those persons, that did advise his Majesty to absent himself from the Parliament, are enemies to the peace of this Kingdom, and justly suspected to be favourers of the rebellion in Ireland, as are also those that advised his Majesty to this message.

It was at the same time unanimously resolved upon the question by the Lords in Parliament, of the

Clarendon,

T. I. p. 354.

"That the ordinance of the Lords and Commons in Parliament, for the safety and defence of the Kingdom of England and Dominions of Wales, is not any way against the oath of allegiance.

"That the several commissions granted under the Great Seal to the Lieutenants of the several Counties, are illegal and void.

"That whosoever shall execute any power over the Militia of this Kingdom and Dominion of Wales, by colour of any commission of Lieutenantcy, without consent of both Houses of Parliament, shall be accounted a disturber of the peace of this Kingdom.

Moreover, both Houses voted with one common consent, That the Kingdom hath been of late, and still is in so evident and imminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and a Popish party at home, that there is an urgent and inevitable necessity of putting his Majesty's Subjects into a posture of defence, for the safeguard both of his Majesty and his people.

"That the Lords and Commons fully apprehending this danger, and being sensible of their own duty, to "provide a suitable prevention, have in several Petitions addressed themselves to his Majesty, for the ordering and disposing of the Militia of the Kingdom, in such a way, as was agreed upon by the wisdom of both Houses to be most effectual and proper for the present exigents of the Kingdom; yet could not obtain it, but his Majesty did several times refuse to give his royal assent thereunto. "That in this case of extreme danger, and of his Majesty's refusal, the ordinance agreed on by both Houses for the Militia, doth oblige the people, and ought to be obeyed by the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom. "That such persons as shall be nominated Deputy-Lieutenants, and approved of by both Houses, shall receive the commands of both Houses to take upon them to execute their offices (b)."

These resolutions were taken with great precipitation, for the two Houses had not yet received the King's answer to their Declaration of the 9th of March. But as by his last message the King had sufficiently shown, he intended not to depart from his right concerning the Militia, they thought it needless to wait for a more particular notification. Some time after, the King sent them this answer in form of Declaration.

The King's Declaration to both Houses of Parliament, in Answer to that presented to him at Newmarket, March 6. 1641-2 (c).
